Unhappy New Year

Steelworker Jason Williams and 10,000 of his fellow USWA members were given the unhappy New Year's news that Bethlehem Steel Corp. would be shutting down its steelmaking operations in Lackawanna, N.Y., and combining its plants in Johnstown, Pa., by the end of 1983. The result will be a loss of 7,300 jobs in Lackawanna and 2,700 in Johnstown. The ill-timed news hit workers in the middle of the Christmas holidays. Of Bethlehem's 82,000 employees, 30,000 are currently on layoff.

Job issues head agenda as new Congress opens

The new 98th Congress convened on Jan. 3 with a summons for "action now" to get America back to work, but it will be long weeks before the House and Senate come to grips with legislation to achieve that goal.

A post-election session of the outgoing 97th Congress, which ran until Dec. 23, saw hopes for enactment of a jobs bill crushed by a presidential veto threat.

The effort will be renewed in the new and presumably more liberal Congress, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. promised.

O'Neill took the floor after his re-election as presiding officer of the House to call for federal programs to put "millions of unemployed Americans back to work."

He reminded his colleagues that 4 million more Americans are out of work than two years ago, when the previous Congress convened. "The time for waiting has passed," he declared.

But when the opening formalities were complete, Congress adjourned until Jan. 25, when President Reagan will deliver his State of the Union message.

The President's address traditionally sets out the Administration's legislative goals for the year. The more significant message is due on Jan. 31, however, when Reagan is scheduled to submit his budget proposals to Congress.

The budget involves spending and revenue decisions, allocation of resources among competing programs, and the set-

Court order bars move to undercut wage protections

By David L. Perlman

A federal court has issued a permanent injunction blocking Labor Dept. regulations that building trades unions and the AFL-CIO charged would undercut Davis-Bacon Act wage protections on federally funded construction.

The trade union movement had accused the Labor Dept. of flouting the intent of Congress, and U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene agreed.

His decision nullified all but one of the Davis-Bacon Act regulatory changes the Labor Dept. sought to put into effect, and Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine termed the ruling a "significant victory for all workers."

Proof needed

Judge Greene's action was a follow-up to the preliminary injunction he issued last July, which prevented the regulatory changes from taking effect until the issues raised by the building trades and the AFL-CIO had been resolved.

His final order made it clear that the Secretary of Labor can't simply overturn half a century of administrative precedents without making a strong showing that the intent of Congress has been misinterpreted over the years.

As Judge Greene saw it, "the basic issue governing this lawsuit is relatively simple." Congress enacted the Davis-Bacon Act and a related law involving submission of payroll records on government contracts some 50 years ago, and the Labor Dept. then issued regulations "to implement the words and purposes" of the legislation.

"In spite of substantial public debate concerning both the laws and the regulations in the years since then, the Congress has not amended the law and it has not expressed its displeasure with the regulations."

Hollow excuse

Further, the decision noted, "15 Secretaries of Labor serving under eight Presidents have never altered the regulatory scheme." Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan's "claim to have discovered a wholly different congressional intent rings hollow in the light of that history."

Judge Greene allowed to stand only the regulation amending the previous definition of the prevailing wage as the rate paid to the largest number of workers in a job classification within the geographical area being surveyed, provided that at least 30 percent of the workers in that classification receive that rate. Otherwise, a weighted average is used.

The new regulation changes the 30 percent requirement to 50 percent. Georgine protested that this would more often result in establishing "a prevailing rate which in actual fact is paid to no one."

But he welcomed the nullification of other regulatory changes, including a rule that would have allowed contractors almost unlimited freedom to substitute low-paid, semi-skilled "helpers" for both skilled journeymen and apprentices in training.

A byproduct of such a change, Georgine noted, would have been to close off the apprenticeship route that has brought an increasing number of blacks and other

Houston project lays solid base for organizing

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO's Houston Organizing Project has laid a "good foundation" for current and future organizing among the rapidly growing Houston workforce, the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services reported.

Imaginative collective bargaining agreements are helping union shops step up competition against non-union contractors, the report notes. And new services are helping unemployed workers cope with the economic downturn.

A significant statistic that doesn't show up in "net gain" figures, the department said, is the large number of workers who have reaffirmed union membership despite the state's "right to work" law, lack of collective bargaining protections for public employees and a general anti-union business and political climate.

The department's director, Alan Kistler, points out that "major pluses and gains" for the project include new election wins, and a substantial amount of "internal organizing where the AFL-CIO is working to spread membership with units already

Kirkland asks change in course

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on the new Congress to launch the nation on the "decisive change in course" that the voters chose last November.

Kirkland's New Year's statement noted the deterioration of America's economy over the past 12 months, the product of the "great leap backward" taken by the Reagan Administration.

"There are 2.7 million more men and women searching desperately for jobs" than a year ago, Kirkland said. And the total number unemployed, including so-called "discouraged" workers, exceeds the record set in the worst year of the Great Depression.

Kirkland called for a "return to sanity" in 1983, and an abandonment of the "destructive" doctrine that America should be governed by the marketplace and that its government should play no significant role.

He urged the new Congress to start to "undo the damage already brought about" through past collaboration with "a self-righteous Administration" that proceeded on the assumption that "all previous administrations since 1932 were wicked or foolish."

America's trade union movement helped elect "a Congress capable of resisting and reversing the Administration's course," Kirkland said. And the AFL-CIO is "proud of the role our unions play in the defense of economic equity and justice at the bargaining table."

The task in 1983 and the years ahead, he urged, is "to build on those foundations through collective bargaining and through legislative and political action."

Management consultants

Union-busters thrive under Reagan

Is it any wonder why management consultants are doing a thriving business in the midst of the Reagan Recession. They're getting promoted all over the place.

President Reagan, who seems to find anti-union attitudes a prime qualification for nominees to head the National Labor Relations Board, first tried to put management consultant John Van de Water in the job, but Congress objected to his union-busting record.

Reagan's next choice, Donald L. Dotson, has spent his brief career in the Labor Dept. building up an investigatory task force in pursuit of unions. His agency's 1983 schedule calls for boosting investigations of unions to a "minimum 50 percent" of its worktime.

Dotson has an added qualification. He won't enforce the Landrum-Griffin Act's requirement that consultants must file reports on their union-busting activities. The time allotted for looking into management consultant activities had already been cut in half—from 10 percent to 5 percent.

To make sure his agency's union-investigation time is filled, Dotson secured 150 new slots for investigators who will be poring over union books in 1983 and beyond. The additions to the agency's staff come at a time when the Labor Dept. is laying off experienced employees to conform with Administration budget cutbacks.

Fifth in a series

All of this is a record worthy of White House attention.

The record befits the Administration whose sympathies, and even its pocketbook, are on the side of the anti-union management consultant. Consider the following:

- The Reagan Administration's handling of the Air Traffic Controllers dispute extended to hiring a union-busting law firm at a typically staggering fee. The Federal Aviation Administration put under contract Morgan, Lewis & Bockius at a cost of $376,000 "to afford an independent viewpoint and analysis concerning the issues raised during the current collective bargaining negotiations with PATCO."

White House advice

At the time of the PATCO dispute, Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis revealed that he had sought legal advice from White House Counsel Fred Fielding, who was a Morgan, Lewis partner before joining the Reagan staff. What advice Fielding's former law firm had for Lewis is unknown. But the Administration's liquidation of the union and the destruction of PATCO members' jobs was a score that would arouse the envy of most management consultant firms.

- The Administration's persistent support for using Medicare funds to pay management consultants in their union-busting campaigns at hospitals was finally blocked in the 1982 tax bill, but only after major efforts by organized labor and a series of windfalls for consultants paid out of public funds.

Modern Management, one of the most active union-busting firms, has drawn its share of Medicare funds while helping hospitals fight employee efforts at union representation.

In its probe of management consultants several years ago, the House Labor-Management subcommittee found that Modern Management had picked up a tidy $250,000 in Medicare funds to run anti-union campaigns for six hospitals in Massachusetts.

That was just one example. The subcommittee reported evidence "that many publicly funded institutions such as schools, hospitals, the Federal Reserve Bank and others have hired consultants to direct their anti-union efforts."

Expressing its dismay, the subcommittee said "public subsidization of anti-union activity violates well-established federal policy of neutrality on the issue of unionization."

Violation of neutrality

"Moreover," it added, "the use of government funds in this manner is not sanctioned by the public, nor is it likely that the public is aware of expenditures of tax dollars for such purposes."

- The Reagan Administration's anti-union stance is especially ironic in the Labor Dept. which is supposed to foster the interests of the worker. Instead, Dotson's Labor-Management Services Administration (LMSA) has made unions and union members his agency's number one target.

In its left-over time, LMSA is espousing the cause of labor-management cooperation in the workplace, promoting the theme of "positive" relations between employer and employee. All the while, it shows a strong operational preference for management consultants over workers' right to organize.

True labor-management cooperation traditionally has had the full support of organized labor. But, as the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services has warned, "Without the union exercising its role as advocate and protector of the workers, it is very likely that the final emphasis will be on improving productivity and profitability at the expense of the workers."

In assessing the Administration's intent in labor relations, the record is a better gauge than public avowals of impartiality. Dotson's LMSA, in siding with management consultants in their efforts to avoid reporting under Landrum-Griffin, is faced with defending its position in the courts.

The Auto Workers filed suit to require Dotson to order the union-busting law firm of Tates, Sykes & Brucker to submit reports as a result of the campaign that it conducted for Kawasaki Motorcycle in Lincoln, Neb. The UAW charges Tates, as the agent, and Kawasaki, as the employer, both engaged in reportable activities in attempting to keep the firm's employees from joining the union.

Despite the Landrum-Griffin Act's stipulations that "direct or indirect" activities to persuade employees to resist unions are reportable, Dotson's LMSA refused to require either Kawasaki or Tates, Sykes to file reports.

This, despite evidence presented by the UAW of such reportable activity as (1) a speech prepared and presented by consultant agent Sykes, (2) organization of an anti-union committee by the consultant, (3) one-on-one contact between employees and the consultant about union-conducted surveys to determine employee attitudes, (4) spying on employees through planted agents and (5) assisting in the preparation of a bomb-threat notice.

Orchestrated assault

The Reagan Administration's direct assault on unions through the Labor Dept. accentuates, and encourages, the management consultant's union-busting posture.

From pre-employment screening to decertification of established unions, employees are being prevented from their legal right to organize and be represented by unions.

From the collection of private data on employees to required polygraph tests, the tactics of management consultants are spread across the employment scene.

Pre-employment screening, the first step in the employment process, was described by the House Labor-Management subcommittee as providing the initial anti-union opening for consultants. They advise employers on how to elicit attitudes of prospective workers about unions, despite the fact it is a violation of the NLRA to "intefere with, restrain, or coerce employees" in the exercise of their rights to concerted activity.

Pre-employment screening

The subcommittee noted, "The refusal to hire a job applicant because of union sympathies has been held clearly unlawful. Yet, these pre-employment screening methods are explicitly aimed at accomplishing this illegal objective."

In its investigations, the subcommittee also found consultants were sharing information on employees among companies planning to expand their workforce. Should the employees have union experience or sympathies, the word was quickly passed on.

One such organization providing employee personnel data was the Industrial Foundation of the South (IFS). Witnesses at the hearings testified that IFS "provides oil industry employers with data on prospective employees, including: evaluations by former employers, union activities, and whether they have filed workers' compensation or other personal injury claims against employers."

Employer scrutiny of workers' activities starts with workplace surveillance by supervisors, the management consultant's primary agents and, as the subcommittee noted, "the best source of information as to who are union supporters."

But the investigations found evidence of more blatant surveillance activities in employer use of undercover agents and detectives. The Wackenhut Corp., for example, has developed worldwide notoriety as a strike-breaking firm. It is a familiar on-scene participant in the most difficult organizing campaigns. Its activities have included provding spies for the Florida Steel Corp. in a Steelworkers campaign, supplying chain-wielding guards in the Wilkes-Barre newspaper strike, and "strike service" in the Madison, Wis., newspaper disputes.

Management complicity

Even with the Reagan Administration condoning management consultant practices, they could not infiltrate the workplace to such a degree without the support of management.

The National Association of Manufacturers, whose blue chip corporate members include many with long-established union contracts, has its own union-busting division. Designated as the Council on Union-Free Environment, the subsidiary was founded to "promote . . . information efforts in support of union-free employers, or other employers who wish to establish union-free status of segments of their workforce."

As an association, the NAM reflects the attitudes of its member companies who on the one hand continue long-established relationships with unions and on the other seek to undercut the rights of their workers to organize and bargain collectively.

The management consultant encourages the union-busting side by fomenting decertification steps by employers, even while the NLRA specifically prohibits employers from initiating such moves. Consultant seminars, the subcommittee investigation found, "not only inform employers about the steps involved in the decertification process, but go beyond to suggest how employees might be encouraged to initiate decertification petitions."

Sheriff with a heart

Pittsburgh—Jobless homeowners in this area, where the unemployment rate is near 14 percent, live in fear of foreclosure on their homes. They have now found a friend in Allegheny County Sheriff Eugene Coon who withdrew 42 homes from a list of properties that were to be sold to pay back taxes and past-due loans.

His action was hailed by Steelworkers District 15 Director Andrew Palm and District 20 Director Walter Bachowski. Both noted mortgage foreclosures are one of the biggest problems facing 50,000 unemployed members in the area.

Sheriff Coon said he was delaying the sale of most private homes while County Judge Nicholas Papadakos tried to arrange a moratorium on foreclosures. County Commissioner Tom Foerster had asked the area banks to establish a fund that would help the unemployed keep their homes.

Kirkland assails South Africa for attack on Lesotho

The AFL-CIO expressed outrage over the recent attack by South African armed forces on civilians in the Lesothan capital of Maseru and renewed its call for an end to the system of apartheid.

"Your flaunting of power against a defenseless people does not improve your image before the world," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a telegram to South African Prime Minister P. W. Botha.

"You chose to strike and rain death on innocent victims, including children, at a period traditionally devoted to promoting good will in the world and in defiance of the yearning all over the world for peace."

Forty-two people died in the Dec. 9 pre-dawn attack. The South African government said the raid was provoked by intelligence reports that trained terrorists were in Maseru with orders to assassinate leaders of Transkei and Ciskei, two nominally independent black "homelands" adjacent to Lesotho.

Lesotho, an independent black nation, is entirely surrounded by South Africa.

Giant steps backward

OSHA waters down more rules, policies

By Arlee C. Green

Safety in the workplace took two giant steps backward with the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's wholesale exemption of nearly a half-million employers from recordkeeping requirements and its decision to stop publishing a quarterly list of potential cancer-causing substances found in the workplace.

George H. R. Taylor, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, charged that the recordkeeping exemption is a reward to industries that have resisted OSHA enforcement. He said OSHA's decision to exempt large classifications of occupations is aimed at diminishing the effectiveness of the act.

Industries qualifying for exemption are those with injury and illness rates at least 75 percent below average and which are not "targeted" for general inspections.

Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., warned that OSHA's method of exempting general classifications of "safe industries" resulted in the exemption of hazardous occupations. In a letter to Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, Harbrant said, that the OSHA rule change affects "workers in such hazardous workplaces as laundries, dry cleaning establishments, large restaurants and commissaries."

24 million workers lose

More than 24 million workers will be excluded from standard OSHA coverage by the exemptions, which Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan hailed as "one of the primary aims of the President's intent to get the government off the backs of people."

Taylor noted that workers in various service trades, such as those in hospitals, laundries, bakeries, warehouses and machine shops were exempted, although these occupations have had above average accident rates.

The rule change also eliminated the requirement that employers post an annual tally of occupational illnesses and injuries in the workplace.

Under the new rule, the exempted firms will remain subject to OSHA inspection in case of employee complaints, incidents of fatal or multiple hospitalization accidents or imminent danger situations.

OSHA's decision to halt the listing of potential cancer-causing substances until the agency finishes revising its policy on carcinogens was branded a "watering down" of the federal cancer safeguards by Sheldon Samuels, safety director of the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

Candidates now secret

The agency's policy required it to publish non-regulatory lists of potential carcinogens—a preliminary "candidate list" of substances for further review and a more limited "priority list" of substances for which standards likely would be developed. Only one "candidate list" has been published and no priority lists since the policy came out in January 1980.

Samuels warned that without the lists, "there's no way to measure what they're doing in this area. It's a relapse to the pre-OSHA days when research and regulatory targets were chosen literally in secret."

In other developments affecting worker safety and health:

- Legislative language barring the labor-opposed move of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health staff members from Rockville, Md., to offices in Atlanta and Cincinnati was dropped in the closing days of the 97th Congress.

The NIOSH unit of Local 44 of the American Federation of Government Employees said the union has been negotiating with NIOSH to "assess the impact of the proposed transfer on the employees" and will submit a proposal to the agency to push the transfer back to next summer.

- Attempts by OSHA to reduce the number of safety and health enforcement officers required in state programs were beaten back in the continuing appropriations bill adopted by the lame-duck Congress.

A rider attached to a continuing appropriations bill would have reduced the aggregate number of enforcement officers in the 24 state-run programs to 752. At issue is the federal "benchmark" figures which would set the level of personnel and funding a state program must have in order to get federal "final approval."

Eula Bingham, OSHA director during the Carter Administration, established a benchmark of 2,837 state safety inspectors.

Yes, West Virginia ...

There really is a Santa Claus. He is Randal S. Smith, of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union Local 550 in Fairmont, W. Va. As Santa, he visits a patient at Fairmont General Hospital, where he works in the pediatrics housekeeping section. In 1980, Smith was proclaimed the "official" Santa Claus by West Virginia Sec. of State A. James Manchin.

South African death probe termed 'whitewash' of police

Johannesburg—Bitter charges of "whitewash" were leveled by the family and friends of Dr. Neil Aggett against a South African magistrate's ruling that security police bore no responsibility for Aggett's death while he was in their custody.

Aggett, who was 28, was found hanging in his cell last Feb. 5. He had been held without charge since November 1981 and subjected to intensive interrogation.

Aggett worked for the African Food & Canning Workers, a largely black trade union, and thousands of blacks turned out for his funeral, enshrining him as a martyr in their cause. He was the 46th person and the first white to die since 1963 while being detained by South African security police.

He shared the AFL-CIO's 1982 George Meany Human Rights Award with Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi, head of the largest black liberation movement in South Africa.

During the eight-month inquiry into Aggett's death, lawyers for his family did not contest a finding that he had hanged himself. But they produced evidence that in the last 168 hours, or seven days, of his life, he spent 110 hours in police interrogation rooms. They charged that the pressure of such prolonged questioning had made Aggett suicidal, and they urged that two security officers responsible for his treatment be charged with culpable homicide, a crime comparable to manslaughter in American law.

Magistrate Petrus Kotze found, however, that the "balance of probabilities" supported the contentions of the police that Aggett had consented to the long interrogation sessions. Kotze, a former prosecutor, refused to accept as true a statement dictated by Aggett to a police officer on the morning of his death charging that he had been assaulted. The magistrate also dismissed as "biased" the testimony of Aggett's companion, Dr. Elizabeth Floyd, who had been arrested and detained with him.

Family's futile fight

"Everyone said we were crazy to fight the government," the dead physician's mother, Joyce Aggett, commented to reporters. Her 70-year-old husband, Aubrey, said he was still convinced that his son took his own life only to avoid further torture and mistreatment by the police.

Jan Theron, general secretary of the Food & Canning Workers, said Kotze's findings amounted to a license for the security police to engage in continued harassment of black trade unions.

"The treatment of the evidence was so selective that one cannot but believe that it was motivated by a strong concern to whitewash the police," Theron was quoted by the New York Times.

As Transvaal regional secretary for the union, Aggett was viewed by authorities as a threat because of his association with an independent group of black trade unionists and his unremitting battle against the oppressive conditions imposed by South Africa's official system of racial separation known as apartheid.

Jobs key issue confronting Congress

ting of spending ceilings that must be adhered to in legislation that comes before Congress.

This also is the Congress that must deal with repairs to the social security system, which has been battered by the combination of severe unemployment and the high inflation of recent years. A bipartisan commission is still far from a consensus on the steps that should be taken.

As in the previous two years, the Senate remains under Republican control, while the House has a Democratic majority. The 26-seat Democratic gain in the House gave the party more than a 100-vote majority, sufficient for the leadership to put pressure on some of the boll weevil conservatives whose votes in the last Congress enabled Reagan to slash programs for the needy and push through big tax windfalls for the wealthy.

Switch to GOP

As a result, boll weevil Phil Gramm of Texas will have to get his coveted Budget Committee assignment from the Republican side of the aisle.

Gramm had been Reagan's Democratic floor leader in the last Congress and the House leadership voted to deny him reappointment to the Budget Committee. Gramm then announced his resignation from the House and said he will run as a Republican in the special election to be held in the conservative-leaning 6th district of Texas. He has been promised one of the Republican seats on the Budget Committee if he is re-elected. But his change of parties will enable a mainstream Democrat to be added to the committee.

Gramm's defection will change the numerical balance of the House, but will not have any substantive effect. On labor's scorecard, he voted "right" on only 12 percent of the key votes during his tenure in Congress. That was the lowest of any Texas Democrat.

New vacancies

There are two other House vacancies in the first days of the 98th Congress.

Representative-elect Jack Swigert, the former astronaut who was elected as a Republican from a new district in Colorado, died on Dec. 27. And on Jan. 4, after having been sworn in for an 11th term at his hospital bed, Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.) died, also of cancer. Rosenthal had a career COPE record of 218 "right" votes and only 12 "wrong" votes.

Not counting the three vacant seats, the House lineup is currently 267 Democrats and 165 Republicans. The Senate remains 54 Republicans, 46 Democrats.

The House Democratic leadership did pull back on one proposed rules reform in the face of a split in party ranks on the issue. It decided not to seek House approval of a modification in the procedure for discharging a committee and bringing legislation directly to the House floor on petition of a majority of House members. The proposal that was dropped would have required signatures of two-thirds of the House in the case of a proposed constitutional amendment, since that is the margin that would be needed to adopt it.

The aborted move for a change was prompted by last session's battle over a proposed balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. A discharge petition signed by 218 members forced the Senate-passed amendment to the House floor, but it was defeated when it failed to obtain a two-thirds vote.

Democrats did push through, over Republican opposition, a rules change that makes it more difficult to add legislative restrictions to appropriations bills.

Johnson, Green join AFL-CIO staff

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Information has added two new staff members: Candice Johnson as a public relations representative and Arlee C. Green as an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News.

Johnson was formerly a writer-researcher for the Center to Protect Workers' Rights, a research institute associated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Earlier, she was an administrative assistant with the Service Employees and an organizer with the Ladies' Garment Workers. A native of Monessen, Pa., she is a graduate of Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations.

Green was a reporter with the Graphic Arts Union's newspaper, Union Tabloid, for six years.

Prior to joining GAIU, he had been a reporter with the Montgomery Journal in Bethesda, Md., a bureau chief for the Elmira (N.Y.) Star Gazette, and editor of the Maryland Independent and the Times-Crescent, weekly newspapers located in La Plata, Md. He is a native of the Washington, D.C. area and a journalism graduate of the University of Maryland.

Reagan names Miller acting NLRB chief

John C. Miller was sworn in as acting chairman of the National Labor Relations Board following a recess appointment by President Reagan.

Miller, a Republican, will serve as a caretaker head of the agency pending Senate action on the nomination of Assistant Labor Sec. Donald L. Dotson to a full five-year term as chairman.

The White House announcement of Miller's appointment came within hours of the adjournment of the 97th Senate on Dec. 23. Miller had been nominated earlier to the post of general counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, which has functions in the federal sector similar to those of the NLRB.

During the lame-duck session of Congress, the Senate took no action on Miller's appointment to the FLRA nor on Dotson's nomination. Both nominations are being resubmitted to the Senate in the new Congress that convened Jan. 3.

One member short

With Miller's accession to the five-member board, the agency still is one member short. Howard Fanning, the senior member, retired Dec. 16 after completing a record 25 years' service.

Miller's appointment increases the Republican majority at the agency. Other GOP members are Howard Jenkins and Robert P. Hunter. Don A. Zimmerman, the fourth member, is listed as a political independent.

Reagan has nominated Patricia Diaz Dennis, a Democrat who is a labor lawyer for the American Broadcasting Company, as the fifth member, but the Administration is not expected to seek confirmation of Dennis until the Senate approves the selection of Dotson.

Former chief counsel

Miller has served in many capacities at the NLRB. Most recently, he was chief counsel to Chairman John Van de Water, who left office Dec. 17. Van de Water, also a Republican, served 16 months under a Reagan recess appointment but was never confirmed by the Senate.

Miller previously served as the board's acting general counsel for three months in 1975, as its solicitor, and as an administrative law judge. In the early 1970s, he served as GOP counsel to the House Labor Committee.

Aiding flood victims

Interest payments outgain wages as source of income

The wage earners' share of U.S. personal income dropped sharply over the last three years while interest income rose, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research disclosed.

Federation Economist William Cunningham's analysis showed wage and salary income, including benefits, fell from 69.2 percent of personal income in 1979 to 66.5 percent in the third quarter of 1982.

Interest income over the same period rose from 11.3 to 14.7 percent. Dividend income accounted for 2.6 percent in both years.

Cunningham noted the drop in the wage and salary earners' share of personal income has been part of a trend over the past decade, but has been sharpest since the start of the Reagan Recession in July 1981. In 1972, wages and salaries accounted for 71.3 percent of personal income and interest income accounted for 8.5 percent. Dividend income share has risen slightly from 2.5 percent in 1972.

Cunningham attributed the shift in income to "misguided" attempts of the Federal Reserve Board to combat inflation with tight credit and high interest rates. The policy did not address the inflationary pressures caused by housing, energy, food, and medical care, and the high interest rates themselves became a major inflationary factor by pushing up homeownership costs and the cost of business borrowing, he observed.

"High interest rates also retarded investment and productivity, which help offset inflationary pressures," he pointed out, "and in human terms the high interest rates have caused enormous hardship to those who have lost their jobs as a direct result of the recessionary Federal Reserve Board policies."

The Fed controls interest rates by regulating the amount of money banks have to lend and the interest rate of funds it loans to banks. In 1979, the Fed restricted credit availability sharply, and began raising the rate charged on its loans. These actions caused interest rates to soar.

The prime lending rate, the interest banks charge their best corporate borrowers, peaked at 21.5 percent in January 1981 and remained above 20 percent for much of last year. Rates began to fall in late 1982, reflecting the depressed condition of the economy and greatly weakened demand for credit.

Unionists aid flood relief in five-state area

Thousands of union volunteers in a five-state area bordering the Mississippi River are working with the Red Cross in aiding victims of the worst floods in the Mississippi Valley this century.

Members of the Food & Commercial Workers, Auto Workers, Steelworkers, Machinists, Communications Workers and other unions are helping obtain equipment, doing damage assessment, loading and unloading trucks, providing emergency repairs and feeding flood victims.

Walter Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, reported that at least 10 members of the CSA liaison staff with the Red Cross have been assigned to the emergency project.

To assist the more than 34,000 persons forced from their homes by the flooding, the Red Cross set up 28 service centers—one of them in the UAW Local 136 union hall in Fenton, Mo.

Regional staffs pitch in

AFL-CIO Regional Directors James Freeman and L. D. Porter, have assigned their staffs to work with the AFL-CIO Community Services representatives. The Red Cross and state labor federations also have been involved in aiding disaster victims in Arkansas, Illinois, Missouri, Louisiana and Mississippi.

As a part of volunteer efforts, at least one CWA local helped in preparing Christmas stockings for children whose homes were flooded.

Revised proposal on grain dust rule called inadequate

A second draft of a proposed federal safety standard for grain elevators and mills falls short of recommendations by the National Academy of Sciences on grain dust control to minimize explosion hazards, the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. said.

The new draft issued by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration was written to address numerous suggestions and criticisms of an earlier OSHA proposal.

The latest version sets an "action level" of one-eighth inch grain dust—eight times greater than the level prescribed by the NAS.

In a letter to Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant pointed out that NAS has called for a grain dust accumulation limit of 1/64 inch.

Deep disappointment

"We feel strongly that this level of grain dust—as supported in the NAS study—is what must be included in any protective standard governing fire and explosion hazards in grain facilities," Harbrant wrote the OSHA administrator. "We are deeply disappointed this level has not been included in the current draft proposal."

Harbrant pointed out that the recommendation for a 1/64-inch level was not only based on credible scientific evidence, but that the NAS also considers the dust limit economically feasible.

After a series of grain elevator explosions in 1977 that killed 61 workers and injured 53 others, OSHA hired the NAS to determine the cause and to recommend ways of preventing explosions in grain facilities.

The NAS report was to be the basis of the OSHA standard, Harbrant noted, "and thus all standard-writing activity was geared to begin after the release of the NAS report."

Grain dust can be as volatile as gun powder. In the last five years, 132 explosions at grain facilities across the country have killed 108 workers and injured 310, according to the FBTD.

minorities into the skilled trades and create a "permanent second-class status" in the construction trades.

In estimating the "savings" that would be achieved by its new regulations, the Labor Dept. said last spring that a contractor could hire a helper for an average of $6.70 an hour less than would be paid to a journeyman. And if helpers were used to replace experienced construction laborers, the contractor could save from $4.75 to $5.71 an hour on a laborer's rate.

Other regulatory changes nullified by the injunction would have:

- Allowed contractors to certify that they have complied with prevailing wage requirements instead of requiring weekly payroll reports for verification. Judge Greene held that this change would render the Copeland anti-kickback law "largely unenforceable."
- Excluded wage data from a metropolitan area from being considered on rural projects and the reverse.
- Lowered the wage average by not counting rates paid on existing federal contracts in the area.

When the Reagan Administration took office, revisions in Davis-Bacon Act regulations developed after extensive hearings and consultations with unions and contractors were scheduled to take effect Feb. 17, 1981.

President Reagan, however, froze all pending regulations, and the Labor Dept. undertook a review of Davis-Bacon regulations keyed to "cost-effectiveness" standards.

Weakened protections

It came up with proposals that unions protested would weaken the law's protections and the Chamber of Commerce said moved "in the right direction."

But the final version announced last June moved virtually all the way to the position advocated by open-shop contractors. The Chamber of Commerce expressed "pleasant surprise" and the AFL-CIO Executive Council voiced "shock and anger."

It was these rules, scheduled to take effect last July 27, that the BCTD and the AFL-CIO challenged in federal court.

The union position was reinforced by both House and Senate votes rejecting amendments to pending bills that would have curtailed Davis-Bacon Act protection. And the highway bill passed just before the 97th Congress adjourned clarified a Davis-Bacon requirement along lines urged by unions.

Social security wage tax ceiling rises

The ceiling on earnings subject to the social security payroll tax increases to $35,700 in 1983 from last year's $32,400.

Since the tax rate for workers and their employers remains unchanged at 6.7 percent, only those earning more than $32,400 will be affected by the change.

Persons with maximum taxable earnings —$35,700 or more—will pay a total of $2,391.90 during 1983 for their social security coverage, including the Medicare tax. That's $221.10 above the 1982 ceiling.

In return for paying on a higher wage base, they become eligible for higher future retirement benefits and greater family protection in the event of death or disability.

The wage base also goes up for self-employed persons, who pay a 9.35 percent tax rate.

These changes also take effect in 1983:

- Persons 70 or older will not have their social security benefits reduced because of outside earnings. Previously, only persons 72 or older were allowed unlimited earnings without reduction of benefits.
- Retirees between the ages of 65 and 69 may earn $6,600 in 1983 before benefits are reduced at the rate of $1 for each $2 of earnings in excess of that amount. The 1982 limit was $5,500.
- Early retirees, 62 to 65, will be allowed to earn $4,920 during 1983 without reduction in benefits.

JOBS: THE AGENDA FOR RECOVERY

Introduction

SINCE JULY 1981, the American economy has been in a nosedive: Unemployment has reached post-depression depths, human suffering has spread across the land and growing numbers of plants and factories have been idled.

Twelve million American workers are now officially jobless. Almost half the labor force is feeling the impact of the Reagan recession-depression with lost jobs, reduced worktime and earnings, and lost opportunities. And the Administration's programs offer no hope for the jobless in 1983.

Early last year, the AFL-CIO pointed out the need for large-scale anti-recession job-creation measures to put America back to work. This February the AFL-CIO Executive Council will carefully review the economic situation and present a detailed program to end the recession, protect its victims, and deal with fundamental problems that are adversely affecting living standards and the basic strength of the nation. An effective and permanent end to the tragedy, waste and hardship of unemployment is our goal. This issue of the Federationist contains an outline of the AFL-CIO agenda as prepared by the Department of Economic Research.

Today's recession-depression is further complicated by a major turndown in the world economy. Further aggravating the economic downturn are unfair trade practices and an overvalued dollar.

Technology is also changing the structure of the U.S. economy, the mix of industries, the location of industries and jobs, occupations and education and skill requirements, often displacing workers with a long history of regular employment. Robots in the factory, word processors in the office, scanners at the check-out counter, push-button banking, gene-splicing in the laboratory, and computers in the home—all of these are hitting white-collar and blue-collar workers, workers in goods-producing industries and workers in service-producing industries.

Many minority and disadvantaged workers still suffer from discrimination and inadequate education, little work experience, and few job skills.

Public investments have fallen far behind in providing basic support facilities critical to private-sector jobs, investment and productivity like roads, bridges, water and sewer systems, transportation and port facilities. America's infrastructure is rapidly deteriorating and seriously holding back economic progress.

The misallocation of money and capital is exemplified by the merger mania of big corporations, big banks, and other financial institutions and the speculative fever of the stock and commodity markets. Without any effective control big business mergers soak up credit and along with the tight money policy of the Federal Reserve bid up interest rates. The result is a loss of capital for productive private and public enterprise, and housing. Conglomerate mergers increase the concentration of wealth while the power of workers and other taxpayers to maintain a healthy, pluralistic, democratic society is weakened.

The gaps and disparities in income between families have widened considerably and poverty is on the rise. A two-tier economy at home and an energy cartel abroad have inflated prices for limited supplies of scarce resources, including necessities, such as fuel and food. Traditional weapons of monetary policy to fight inflation, with high interest rates as the cutting edge, have been counterproductive. Short-term gains on the price front have been bought at a huge cost of unemployment and loss of national product and income.

New economic policies are needed to cope with the recession-depression.

An Anti-Recession Program

First of all, America must have a dramatic expansion of job opportunities. The job situation is a catastrophe and large-scale direct job generating programs must be the first priority of governmental economic policy.

Job creation is a moral, social, political, and economic imperative. Unemployment generates tremendous social losses which include physical and mental illness, family disorganization, social alienation and crime.

For every one million jobless workers, America foregoes the production of $100 billion in goods and services and the federal treasury loses $30 billion.

Job opportunities must be made available to unemployed men and women who cannot find jobs in the private sector. This means there must be direct, targeted and adequately funded large-scale public employment programs. It also means quick action to get essential public works under way immediately.

When the private sector cannot provide enough jobs, the federal government must step in. That is the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946, reaffirmed in 1978 by the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.

The Reagan Administration's response to joblessness is essentially a hands-off approach —let the market take care of the problem. Supposedly, people will find jobs by relocating or by looking harder. Mismatches in skills and location are indeed problems. However, it must be recognized that the number of unemployed persons far exceeds job opportunities now available or likely to become available under the policies of this Administration.

Public works jobs can be generated through renewing the urban infrastructure of sewers, water systems, streets and bridges and upgrading the nation's transportation network so people and goods can move efficiently. Railroads, highways, port facilities, and airports are in desperate need of rehabilitation. Urban mass transit systems need support and modernization.

Community service and public investment projects can provide opportunities for unemployed workers that expand services and facilities needed for a healthy economy and a healthy society. Workers should also receive training in skills that are in short supply.

Housing is essential to the anti-recession job-creation effort. More government support will increase the supply of housing for low and middle-income families. Expansion of existing housing programs will create jobs in the construction industry where one in five workers are unemployed and help reduce inflation in housing by expanding the supply of affordable homes.

Inflation must be fought through attacking directly the key sectors of inflationary pressures, and this includes specifically an attack on high interest rates.

Lower interest rates are essential. Congress must press the Federal Reserve to ease the money supply and lower interest rates. Legislation should be enacted to assure availability of existing credit and to selectively allocate credit. Lower borrowing costs are necessary to stimulate the housing, automobile and other hard-hit industries, investment in productive plant and equipment, state and local public investment.

Unfair international trade policies must be dealt with effectively as well as the adverse effects of the overvalued dollar, international technology transfer and financial transactions on American workers, American industries, and national security.

Unemployment insurance and trade adjustment assistance are essential to alleviate the suffering of the unemployed and other victims of the Reagan recession-depression, Congress should improve and extend unemployment insurance benefits and restore trade adjustment assistance for workers who lose jobs because of imports.

Health insurance protection for the unemployed must be secured through congressional action. And Congress should reverse the Reagan Administration's attack on the nation's system of Medicaid and welfare, food stamps, and human services.

These basic programs help people who are unemployed, weak, or helpless. They maintain income and the consumer buying power which gives stability and resilience to the economy.

The stimulus and support of those programs for the economy would be timely. Record overall unemployment and record construction industry joblessness now prevail. High unemployment and slow real growth in GNP are expected to remain for many years even under the most optimistic assumptions and economic projections. Overall unemployment and construction unemployment will decline very slowly as new entrants into the job market seek jobs while record numbers are presently jobless. Any recovery in the economy is expected to be slow and weak. The recent declines in interest rates though welcome will not translate into a boom nor generate high levels of employment.

To meet longer-term fundamental issues, a comprehensive reindustrialization program should be undertaken to bolster the nation's growth and productivity.

Business, labor, and government, working together, can strengthen America by helping to generate and channel private and public investment to modernize basic and essential industries, public infrastructure, and lagging geographic areas. This long-run reindustrialization program would include effective employment and training programs.

All these programs—those for quick anti-recession job-creation and alleviation of human suffering and those to deal with long-term fundamental problems—are aimed at social justice and economic progress.

Public Works

Investments in public works provide jobs and an essential underpinning for economic growth and a critical complement to private sector investment, and productivity. For years this nation short-changed investments in public facilities related to health, education, energy, safety, solid waste removal, water supply, parks, highways, bridges, ports, railroads, and urban transit. The result is a huge backlog of public capital needs and a major impediment to growth and the attainment of the nation's productive potential.

An efficient public transportation system significantly enhances private sector productivity. Conversely, the current state of disrepair in our highways, bridges and transit system causes delays which in turn limit growth and raise costs. The job of rebuilding the nation's transportation network has begun with the highway and mass transit program enacted last year. It is expected to provide about $5.5 billion dollars in 1983 and over five years some $33 billion dollars for repair and improvement of highways, bridges and mass transit facilities.

While a step in the right direction, it falls far short of needs. Over the next ten years, one trillion dollars are needed to rehabilitate highways and bridges, and another forty billion dollars are required for urban transit systems. Obviously, the transportation program could be expanded to fill a basic public need as well as provide needed jobs.

The crucial role of public capital formation and public investment is all too frequently forgotten. The Reagan Administration's 1981 tax cut is, of course, a prime example of a one-sided attempt to promote private capital investment and ignore needed public improvements. The effect was a diversion of huge amounts of money that could have been channeled and directed to public investments essential to jobs and revitalizing and rebuilding the nation's cities, industries and distressed areas. The huge revenue drain also drove up interest rates to a level that sharply restrained private investment and public sector improvements.

Well-known analysts of the sources of productivity growth have tried to highlight the often overlooked but crucial role that public capital formation plays in increasing the nation's output. They have pointed out that the role of private capital formation is far less important in fostering growth than is popularly believed. In his major study of the sources of economic growth, Edward F. Denison found that private investment accounted for only 15 percent of the nation's long-term growth. At 40 percent, the largest single source of growth was the general advance of knowledge, much of which is a product of public investment in research and education. More recently Denison has observed that the revised GNP data should help policymakers recognize the ineffectiveness of tax cuts designed to stimulate productivity growth. He adds "that government support for investment in human capital, infrastructure, and research and development, are currently receiving short shrift" (Business Week, September 13, 1982, p. 22).

The deterioration in highways, bridges, and transit systems is not unique. Serious inadequacies exist in every other type of public capital stock.

- Waste-water treatment facilities are so overburdened that a large number of communities cannot allow firms to build new plants or expand existing plants. A recent Joint Economic Committee study points out that cities like Newark are on a sewer replacement cycle that would result in new facilities in 300 to 500 years.
- Water supply systems are slowly decaying. In many older cities like Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago, more than 15 percent of the water supply simply leaks out of the system due to corroded pipes. This worsens water shortages, raises water bills, and can even cause street cave-ins.
- A study conducted a few years ago by the Interior Department found that extensive rehabilitation of recreational facilities is needed in older cities and suburbs. In eight of 21 core cities surveyed, the cities' rehabilitation costs were greater than their annual park and recreation expenditures.
- Over one-half of the nation's 3,500 jails are more than 30 years old, and it is estimated that between 1,300 and 3,000 of these must be either totally rebuilt or substantially rehabilitated during the 1980s. In addition, resources will be needed to expand these facilities.

Not only has this neglect of public construction reduced the services that flow directly from public facilities, as well as the private output these facilities support, but it has contributed to the underutilization of human resources, particularly in construction. The 1982 trough in public construction expenditures coincided with a peak for total construction unemployment at 23 percent. The construction unemployment rate is normally higher than the rate for all industries. The only years during the past two decades in which construction unemployment did not exceed eight percent were the four years from 1966 through 1969. Not coincidentally, those were the only years in which total public investment in structures and equipment exceeded $300 per person, measured in 1972 dollars. It is evident, therefore, that public investment creates jobs as well as an environment conducive to economic growth.

The experience in the 1960s and 1970s demonstrates that accelerated public works programs can be effective in providing jobs and restoring economic growth. An evaluation of the 1976 Public Works Act clearly illustrates the potential of these programs. The program was a large success in aiding the recovery from the deep 1974-1975 recession. The $6 billion spent as part of the Local Public Works Program generated 110,000 direct onsite jobs and 66,000 jobs in firms supplying building materials. The added income of these workers resulted in additional sales and production, and is estimated to have generated an additional 249,000 jobs throughout the economy. The total—425,000 job years—represents an average cost of $14,000 per person year of employment.

This experience also refutes the claim that such programs are "procyclical"—that is, by the time public works projects get started, the recession is over and they then cause inflation. In the 1976 programs, except for isolated incidents, decisions on applications were made within 60 days and construction started within 90 days. Projects can also be small and of short duration. The average project funded under Round II of the program was under $500,000 and the average project duration was only 10.4 months. Finally, funds were successfully targeted to the areas that were most in need. The average unemployment rate for areas receiving Round II funds was 9.4%, substantially higher than the national average.

Within the framework of an ongoing program of public capital formation, projects specifically designed to be brought on stream quickly to generate jobs and counteract recession, could be easily identified without in anyway detracting from the long-term continuing program to revitalize the nation's private capital.

The expense of these jobs would, of course, be offset to some degree by the resultant reduction in welfare benefits and unemployment insurance payments. In addition, the government would gain tax revenues both from the direct and indirect jobs and economic activity generated by the projects. Equally important is that these projects are investments—they produce the facilities that are of continuing value to society with payoffs far into the future.

The AFL-CIO Agenda for Progress through Jobs

Public Investments to Create Jobs and:

- Renew and rebuild the nation's infrastructure.
- Expand and improve local community services.
- Train workers in skills that are in short supply.
- Increase the supply of housing for low- and middle-income families.
- Begin restructuring and revitalizing the nation's industrial base.
- Protect the unemployed and boost consumer purchasing power with extended unemployment insurance benefits and health care coverage.

Monetary Policies to Create Jobs and:

- Lower interest rates to stimulate the economy.
- Channel available credit to job-creating, economy-building, productivity-increasing investments.

International Trade Policies to Create Jobs and:

- Advance U.S. interests in fair international trade and investment.
- Stop job-destroying, economy-damaging outflows of U.S. technology, capital and productivity advantages.
- Restrict imports that are adding to recession, joblessness and erosion of U.S. industrial base and set auto domestic content requirements.
- Carefully manage foreign grant, insurance and loan programs to safeguard U.S. interests.
- Enforce existing trade laws which promote fair trade.

Anti-Inflation Policies to Create Jobs and:

- Attack the specific causes of inflation.
- Prevent tight-money, high-interest rates which place the anti-inflation burden on workers and the poor.
- Meet revenue needs through a healthy economy and a fairer and more productive tax structure.

Community Development Jobs

A large-scale, federally financed community development jobs program is needed to provide jobs and meet community development needs. Past experience has demonstrated the effectiveness of job expansion programs based on local community public service employment programs. Job expansion based on public employment was accomplished within a short time frame under prior law, and the current fiscal crises of local communities underscores the need for such programs.

It is clearly in the economic and social interest of the nation to put Americans who are able and willing to work into productive jobs which generate taxes, produce useful community services and community improvements, and stimulate the economy in communities with high unemployment.

In every community, there is work to be done that is vital to that community's economic health and public well-being, but which has been neglected. Because of declining tax revenues and federal budget cuts, many of these communities need help to repair, maintain, and rehabilitate essential public facilities. There is also a recession-generated increase of people who need the help of services which the local government cannot provide because of a shortage of funds. Federal funds should be provided to communities with high unemployment to put local unemployed people to work immediately.

Examples of needed community repair and service activities include:

- Helping working mothers with child care;
- Police and traffic control to free regular police for full-time street duty;
- Increased staff support for adult and juvenile correctional facilities;
- Security guards for schools and housing projects;
- Staff support for community health centers and preventive health screening and immunization programs;
- Rat and mosquito control;
- Surveys of potentially dangerous conditions in local communities.
- Bridge painting;
- Patching potholes and other minor road repair;
- Traffic control signs and removal of road sign obstructions;
- Park and streams clean-up;
- School crossing and intersection markings;
- Home security for elderly and low-income people;

At the urging of the Carter administration, Congress passed the Economic Stimulus Appropriations Act of 1977, providing $8 billion for public service employment. The legislation was signed in mid-May of 1977 and almost 600,000 workers entered public service jobs by September 30. Despite some examples of administrative misjudgment and abuse, 600,000 formerly jobless workers—many of them low-income, long-term unemployed persons—had jobs. And much useful and needed community public service work was done.

Ironically, many who argue that community service jobs are inefficient, cost too much and create "dead end" jobs are quick to advocate the proven wasteful and inequitable gimmick of tax credits to private employers for hiring workers. Despite the numerous failed experiments with this approach and the obvious built-in wage suppression bias of such devices, the idea still has its proponents.

The evidence indicates that job tax credits have failed in generating new jobs while paying employers tax money for what they were doing on their own. The CETA public service employment program was highly successful despite popular claims to the contrary. The rate of displacement of local funds that would have been spent anyway actually was very low. The counter-cyclical effects of the program were positive, with the money spent quickly by local sponsors. The quality of services performed by the program's workers was usually equal to that of regular employees in the same occupation. Finally, funds were used successfully to leverage access for minorities and women to higher job classifications.

In sum, previous experience with community development job programs shows that they can be a highly successful means of fighting unemployment, helping individuals and getting needed community work accomplished.

Housing

The nation is in the midst of a deep and prolonged slump in housing production. This has worsened the underlying problems of housing inadequacy and affordability. The immediate crisis is the direct result of the Reagan Administration's tight money policy, budget cuts, and recession. In 1982, housing production has fallen to half of the 1978 building rate.

Construction industry unemployment was 23 percent in November 1982, a record high level for these figures which have been collected since the 1940s. Industries which depend on housing, such as forestry and mining, and manufacturers and suppliers have been adversely affected by the housing slump as well.

The housing shortfall, which has grown as housing production declined from a level of 2 million units in 1978, has created shortages in many areas and rising housing prices. Over the year ended October 1982, for example, residential rents rose faster than general price levels. The result has been unaffordable homes, a near-record low national rental vacancy rate, a bidding up of rents, families forced to double up and a rising number of homeless people. The recession has devastated many communities and whole states, leading to rising defaults and foreclosures as people who are laid off are unable to keep up the payments on their homes.

A combination of pent-up demand, and a decline of mortgage interest rates to a 12-13 percent range, caused the seasonally adjusted annual housing starts rate to rise to 1.4 million in November. However, this rate is still far below national housing requirements and reflects only the upper income layer of the home sales market and the tail end of the government-assisted program pipeline in the rental segment. More positive action will be needed to achieve a sustained higher level of housing construction.

In past recessions, housing was revitalized through such programs as below-market interest rate subsidies and rental assistance for low-income households. The Reagan Administration is moving in the opposite direction, however, calling for cutbacks or elimination of such basic supports.

In early 1982, the Administration set a 1983 budget with sharply reduced government support for home building and has advocated replacing direct housing programs with a voucher system. This would add nothing to the supply of available housing, and at the same time add to the inflationary demand pressures in the many local communities where housing is in short supply.

The number of additional new and rehabilitated housing units built with government assistance was reduced to a trickle under the fiscal 1983 continuing resolution enacted into law in December 1982. Under the stopgap funding law, the Congress provided funds for 1983 mainly to support existing units, including units already assisted but shifted from one program to another. Meanwhile, no funds went for new construction under the low-rent public housing program, while there were only 14,000 units of new housing for the elderly and a couple thousand units for Indians.

Funds for public housing were left out with the understanding that there would be an agency speedup to bring already funded projects in the processing pipeline to construction and that added funds for public housing new construction would be considered for the next fiscal year.

A good start can be made on catching up with housing needs while at the same time contributing to a broader anti-recessionary economic program.

A program which provided 250,000 new assisted housing units annually, which was about the level of assisted housing starts prevailing in the 1970s, could make a significant contribution to closing the gap. The assistance for 250,000 units annually would be for rental and homeowner units for lower income families in urban and rural areas. It would include assistance under already authorized programs in addition to activity under a modified homeownership assistance program, a new rental housing production program, and a new initiative for the expansion of housing and related facilities for the elderly.

Type of Assistance	Units
Homeownership Assistance	50,000
Rental Housing Assistance for Elderly	20,000
Low Rent Public Housing	55,000
Rental Housing Production Program	40,000
Rural Housing	65,000
Elderly Housing Initiative	20,000

Funds to begin a mortgage foreclosure relief program for conventional financed homes is a needed element of a housing stimulus program. This program is needed to protect people and to assure that home values and the market for housing does not collapse under an avalanche of foreclosures. Similarly, rental emergency funds should be available to forestall evictions.

In addition, we oppose legislation that would completely "privatize" the Federal National Mortgage Association and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation.

Each of the rental programs could have limited authorizations, so that the number of units could be allocated, in projects not to exceed 100 units each, among local housing authorities and other agencies with know-how for present programs and for the new rental housing production program. HUD might also give priority for rental housing projects to those sponsors who already have a locally approved site.

In addition, funds should be provided for a much needed, large public housing modernization effort, which could serve the purpose of preserving and upgrading low-rent public housing projects which need refurbishing to extend their economic life, and have an immediate jobs impact.

The new construction would provide thousands of man-years of work in construction and supplier industries. Public housing modernization would provide about 37,000 jobs per $1 billion in outlays. The multiplier effects, as wages and profits from construction and materials production are spent on other products and services, would almost double the number of jobs initially generated.

Monetary Policy and Interest Rates

The tight money policies pursued by the Federal Reserve Board pushed interest rates to record 20th Century levels in the 1980s. The result was the major curtailment in economic activity, pushing the economy into the recession. The impact was felt, first and most severely, in residential and local public construction. The automobile and farming sectors were also depressed. The high unemployment and reduced income generated in these sectors spred their effects upon sales, incomes and output in other parts of the economy.

The harmful effects of persistent, prolonged tight money and high interest rates have been amply demonstrated during the past two years.

Business bankruptcies numbered 44 percent more in 1981 than in 1980, and in 1982 they are 49 percent above 1981. The unemployment rate rose from 7.4 to 10.8 percent, leaving 12 million unemployed. Manufacturing capacity utilization was reduced from about 80 percent to 68 percent. And, as the high interest rates took their toll, men and machines were idled in manufacturing, in construction, in extractive industries, and in farming. The effects have spread to other economic activities.

In March 1980, under authority of the Credit Control Act of 1969, there was a departure from the overall tight-money policy by way of a brief implementation of credit controls. This was helpful in bringing down interest rates and pulling the economy out of the short recession which began in January 1980.

The downturn in aggregate economic activity in 1980 had been preceded by a decline in the interest rate-sensitive housing sector, as interest rates kept rising. However, after credit controls were instituted, interest rates on new mortgages for which loan commitments were made rose one more month to a peak of over 16 percent in April and then declined to about 12½ percent in July. The annual housing starts rose from the May low of 938,000 to about 1,550,000 toward the end of 1980. The prime rate charged by banks declined from 19½ percent in April to 11 percent in July when the decline in industrial production was reversed and the economy began to pick up.

Authority for credit control implementation, which expired this past June 30, is essential to have as an alternative or supplement to monetary policy. It is needed, so that it can be used to help restore economic recovery with stability and help the country become more productive and internationally competitive. The President should have the authority, and legislation to reestablish it should be enacted.

In addition, there is a need to reconstitute the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, so that there will be a broader representation of economic interests. Four of the present seven governors were employees or officials in the Federal Reserve Bank system during their careers; one had been a commercial bank officer; one had been in private finance and also Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and one had been an economics professor. These members cannot adequately share the perspective or represent the interests of labor, agriculture and small business which are subject to the risks and hardships brought on by prolonged periods of high interest rates. Legislation should be enacted to reconstitute the Board of Governors, so that a wider spectrum of interests and concerns will be represented.

Trade

Unfair trade practices and an overvalued U.S. dollar have added to the recession's severity and sharply clouded the outlook for recovery.

In 1982, imports will exceed exports by over $40 billion and for 1983 a deficit almost double that amount is expected.

In manufactured products, the U.S. trade surplus in 1981's first 9 months shifted to a $7.7 billion deficit of more imports than exports during the first nine months of 1982. Exports have fallen off in the industries which were America's pride: Capital equipment—industrial machinery, computers, communication, autos and aerospace, showed a drop in the trade surplus of $10.4 billion—a 50 percent fall-off in a single year. Imports have been growing in all of these categories. There was for example, a doubling of semi-conductor imports in the first 8 months of 1982.

A high and rising dollar (up 30 percent against major trading partners' currencies) has spurred imports of manufactured products and made it even more difficult for the U.S. to sell abroad. The Japanese yen has declined by 21 percent and the German mark by 22 percent against the dollar between January 1981 and November 1982.

Fair trade must become a reality. A first step toward achieving that reality requires a recognition that misguided U.S. international trade, monetary and investment policies have been key factors contributing to the destruction of basic U.S. industries.

A clear relationship between growth of imports and job displacement is evident in a number of industries. For example, imports of automobiles rose 41.5 percent between 1979 and 1982, while employment dropped 46.9 percent. Imports of apparel rose 25.9 percent, while employment dropped 23.3 percent. Footwear imports rose 12.8 percent and employment went down 23.9 percent.

A loss of almost 3 million jobs in manufacturing from July 1979 to November 1982 included hundreds of thousands of jobs related to these trade facts of life. They cannot be ignored.

In rich countries and poor, the U.S. ability to export is retarded and imports to the U.S. encouraged as the combination of other nations' trade barriers and this nation's open markets squeezes the U.S. economy.

Industrialized nations have cut back on imports as a result of the recession and developing countries have cut back on their imports to meet their financial problems. The result is fewer American exports and fewer export-related jobs.

Unless the government takes action, however, the chance to "Buy American" may fade entirely. A domestic content bill for automobiles is a major goal because it is fair and because it tries to assure that Americans will have a chance to benefit from the U.S. auto industry—as workers, as consumers, and as business suppliers. For every one job in autos, for example, there are over two jobs in supplier industries.

The Administration must also recognize that trade-related job losses are rapidly spreading beyond manufacturing and into service industries. Exports of jobs in services have already begun through the runaway shop, the runaway ship, and the runaway film and computer service. Imports of services have cost construction jobs and theatrical jobs, while other types of service jobs also have been eroded. But as important, this nation's economy and industries are interrelated, and for every manufacturing plant there is a set of service jobs, and each affects the other.

These are not old problems, but new ones in a changing world. What is old is the simplistic dialogue of "free trade" vs. "protectionism." Governments of other nations often regulate imports as a matter of course. The U.S. needs clear limits on certain imports until the nation's future is assured.

Other issues arise from U.S. laws that are geared to encourage investment abroad and technology outflows. At a time when the nation must rebuild its industrial base and improve its "competitiveness" the newest processes are up for sale to the closed economies of the world. Brand new technological processes invented in the U.S. are sold or licensed for production and use abroad. Employment is often created for foreign workers who make products such as steel and auto parts that compete in the U.S. markets with firms and industries that can no longer afford to invest in new production here.

Productivity of the U.S. economy is still the highest in the world, but other nations are rapidly catching up. Technology outflows and capital outflows are swift and in most economies subject to a variety of controls, monitoring and regulation. Closed economies abroad invite producers and investors who build the jobs of tomorrow. The U.S. market is now flooded with the result as today's jobs and those of the future are constantly being exported.

Because of these factors, fair trade accompanied by efforts to slow down the outflow of technology and capital are essential elements in an anti-recession program. Both tax and trade provisions are needed to accomplish this goal, including:

- Placement of temporary restrictions on harmful imports during periods of recession and high unemployment to prevent increased joblessness, added penetration of U.S. markets by foreign producers and a further weakening of the U.S. industrial base.
- Enactment of an auto domestic content law to protect the continued U.S. capability to produce autos. Buy American must be more than a slogan. It must be an achievable result.
- Action to assure that a portion of U.S. raw material exports, including grain, logs and other commodities, is processed in this country.
- Establishment of bilateral shipping agreements and adherence to cargo preference laws.
- Commitment that foreign grant, insurance and loan programs, such as the Export-Import Bank, are carefully managed to safeguard U.S. interests at home and abroad. Despite defects of the Ex-Im Bank, funds must not be slashed until other countries cut or eliminate their subsidy programs. Ex-Im Bank funds and guarantees must not be extended to any communist countries.
- Vigorous enforcement of reciprocity provisions of the Trade Act.

Unemployment Insurance Benefits

Millions of jobless workers are in disastrous circumstances because they are without the protection of the unemployment insurance system. Only 45 percent of the 12 million workers officially counted as unemployed are receiving unemployment compensation benefits. In contrast, during the 1974-1975 recession 75 percent of unemployed workers received benefits. Since July 1981, over 5 million workers have exhausted their regular benefits and another 1 million long-term jobless workers have lost their extended benefits. Of the 900,000 unemployed workers receiving federal supplemental benefits, 135,000 have already exhausted or will exhaust these benefits soon. The remaining 765,000 will run out of benefits in the coming weeks.

Since the program of federal supplemental benefits is temporary, hundreds of thousands of additional unemployed workers will receive either no benefits or benefits of reduced duration under the program.

The extended benefit program which provides up to 13 weeks of benefits to unemployed workers who have exhausted regular benefits has been drastically cut back. The elimination of the national trigger, the one percent increase in state triggers and the exclusion of extended benefit recipients from the trigger calculation demanded by the Reagan Administration means that extended benefits are available only in those states experiencing catastrophic unemployment levels.

Congress must restore immediately the protections of the extended benefit program that have been eliminated so that all unemployed workers have the benefits to which they are entitled. The extended benefits program provides income protection for long-term jobless workers and is an effective countercyclical mechanism in blunting some of the adverse effects of recession. The combined duration of regular and extended benefits is inadequate for long-term jobless workers who are unable to find jobs commensurate with their skills. The present program of federal supplemental benefits will expire on March 31, 1983.

A permanent program of supplemental unemployment insurance, funded by general revenues, with a maximum duration of not less than 65 weeks is needed.

Health Insurance for the Unemployed

One of the more tragic, yet often forgotten, consequences of unemployment is the loss of health insurance coverage for unemployed workers and their families.

Eligibility for health insurance coverage is usually tied to an individual's place of employment. When workers are laid off they also lose health care coverage. Department of Labor statistics indicate that 50 percent of laid-off workers covered by employer-employee benefit plans lose health care protection immediately or one month after layoff. Only 20 percent can expect coverage for three months or more. Since the average duration of unemployment is a little over four months, most jobless workers can expect to be completely without health insurance protection.

When jobless workers lose their health insurance protection, they delay seeking medical care for themselves or their families. Ironically, because of the social and economic malaise associated with joblessness, this is also a time when they have a special health care need. Dr. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University has determined, for example, that for each one percent rise in unemployment, suicides increase 4.1 percent and homicides 5.7 percent. Excessive smoking, high blood pressure, insomnia and heightened anxiety are symptoms frequently associated with joblessness. Thus, during unemployment minor health care problems grow larger and the chance of laid-off workers falling victim to chronic conditions increases dramatically. At the same time, most unemployed workers are denied Medicaid coverage because they have not been poor enough for a long enough time to meet the medical criteria of most states.

This situation would, of course, not have existed if the AFL-CIO's long-standing proposal for a universal, comprehensive national health insurance program were in effect. We continue to strongly support this goal. However, unemployed workers and their dependents should not be deprived of health insurance protection until it is achieved.

The only effective solution to this serious and far-reaching problem is legislation to assure that unemployed workers are not forced to go without needed health care treatment. Catastrophic protection and a basic benefit package of hospital care and physician services must be provided so that workers and their families are eligible for basic medical care services and do not postpone preventive care, put off obtaining needed diagnostic services or increase their risk of developing more serious illness.

Inflation

Inflation-fighting policies should be directed toward the basic causal factors—particularly "supply shocks" in basic commodities, such as energy and food and sectoral problems in housing and health. Such specific actions would contribute to maintaining an orderly supply of goods and services needed for industries to grow and people to prosper.

The inflation deceleration of the past two years was partly fortuitous and mostly the result of the recession. Food price increases slowed dramatically as bumper crops in 1981 and 1982 replaced the shortfalls of 1979 and 1980 and energy price increases slowed to 11.7 percent in 1981 and to only a 1.9 percent increase rate in the 12 months ended October 1982. The crucial elements were the emergence of a world glut in petroleum supply early in 1981 followed by falling demand as a worldwide economic recession took hold.

Shelter price increases also slowed with a virtual halt of house price increases in 1981 as sales fell off. Under the burden of high interest costs, sales of new and existing housing slumped almost 20 percent from 1980 levels, and the number of new private housing starts dropped to the lowest figure in 35 years. In the year ended October 1982, the increase in shelter prices slowed to 5.2 percent.

Medical care prices, however, have not responded to recessionary influences. They were still running at a 10.7 percent increase rate in October 1982.

Most of the drop in the consumer price inflation rate—nearly 93 percent—arises from the very factors that caused the original runup. About 22 percent of the decline results from abatement of food price increases and about 31 percent from the drop in energy prices. A very large portion—nearly 40 percent—comes from a sharp drop in shelter cost increases. These were occasioned by the falloff in price increases for houses which accompanied the deepening recession. Toward the end of the period, mortgage interest rates declined, from close to 16 percent at mid-1982 to about 12-13 percent in the last quarter.

Wages have had little to do with the runup in prices or in the subsequent abrupt price deceleration. In 1979 and 1980, average hourly earnings rose 8.0 percent and 8.8 percent respectively—far below the rate of inflation. Wage increases have trended downward in 1981 and 1982, again in response to recessionary developments. In the year ended December 1981, average hourly earnings rose 7.3 percent, and average weekly earnings 6.1 percent. In the year ended October 1982, average hourly earnings were up 4.9 percent while average weekly earnings—reflecting a recessionary contraction in weekly hours of work—were up only 3.7 percent, well below the diminished consumer price inflation rate of 5.0 percent. The downward movement of real wages does, however, feed into the general reduction in purchasing power which deepens the recession and prolongs economic stagnation.

The tight money, high interest rate solution of the Administration has been largely irrelevant to the nature of the inflation and has had disastrous consequences for the economy.

The AFL-CIO anti-inflation proposals are based upon the experience of recent years which conclusively demonstrates the need for programs that will avoid possible commodity supply shocks in the future.

Energy inflation must be dealt with through conservation and stockpiling as well the development of alternative types of energy.

Natural gas prices should continue to be controlled. A standby energy program including provisions for allocation, rationing and energy price controls, if needed, should be enacted to deal with possible future emergencies.

Food inflation should be moderated by pursuing supply-and-demand policies that mitigate inflation and overcome the violent swings in farm commodity prices with their "boom and bust" results for American farmers. With so much of agricultural production destined for export, the nation should restrain agricultural exports in times of inflationary shortage and stockpile in times of abundance. The establishment of a National Grain Board is needed to protect the interest of the United States in foreign markets and to provide price and supply stability in U.S. markets.

Housing inflation should be fought by expanding the supply of housing and allocating more money specifically to finance mortgages. Government programs to promote increased housing construction, particularly for low- and moderate-income families, should be expanded rather than curtailed.

Medical care inflation would most effectively be dealt with by enactment of a universal and comprehensive national health insurance system. Pending such reform, health care cost containment legislation, properly structured, should be enacted as an important interim step. The expansion of preventive health care—thereby reducing pressures on hospital usage — should be encouraged through further development of "health maintenance organizations" (HMOs).

Looking toward the future, the matter of specific price pressures which may be generated by the national defense buildup must be accompanied by appropriate economic policies. The defense sector can drain capital away from civilian industries and away from other government programs. It can bid away key human resorces, such as scientists, engineers and skilled trades workers, as well as scare material away from the civilian economy. A materials allocation program, for example, would become a necessity if shortages and bottlenecks should develop.

A sector-by-sector anti-inflation policy should be undertaken that concentrates on dealing with the causes of inflation and rejects efforts to "cure" inflation by engineering recessions and unemployment.

Reindustrialization

The need for a national industrial policy in the United States is becoming more and more evident. The American economy is experiencing the highest and most extended period of unemployment since the Great Depression. The growth of the economy has stopped in the 1980s and the U.S. position in world trade has deteriorated dramatically. In both the private and public sectors, the modernization of physical capital has been inadequate. The industrial base of the American economy is eroding and, there is no coherent national policy to reverse the trend.

Current levels of unemployment and idle capacity are causing the loss of hundreds of billions of dollars in product and income that can never be recovered. To carry forward a rational national industrial policy, a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board should be created which would include representatives of labor, business, and the government. The Board would develop a balanced economic program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities, while at the same time encouraging the development of new industries with promise for the future. The Board would encourage productivity growth, dissemination of research and development findings, and a balanced use of the nation's resources. It would target industrial sectors and regions that particularly need help. The National Reindustrialization Board would also be directed to consult with, and be consulted by, the Administration and the Federal Reserve Board. The composition of the Reindustrialization Board should automatically provide Congress with a liaison with labor and industry.

This Board would also provide policy and priority guidance for the activities of a financing agency, patterned after the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the 1930s and 1940s. It would be authorized to make and guarantee loans to finance approved reindustrialization ventures. Private pension funds could be encouraged to make investments in such financing arrangements to support and expand industrial employment in the United States.

The Reindustrialization Board would bring together all of the elements in economic society. It would insure that the interests of workers, industry, consumers—all the people—are an integral part of the economic decision-making process.

The AFL-CIO has recognized for some time that both private and public capital facilities are deteriorating. The proposed new RFC would make, participate in, or guarantee loans to private business and local governments in the industrial sectors and geographic regions designated by the Reindustrialization Board. The actual lending and other financing functions carried on by the RFC would be under the Reindustrialization Board.

The RFC could handle loans to private business and to state and local governments. Each of the two lending "windows" would be operated under an executive officer appointed by the Board of Directors. The Board of Directors would also be required to see that there was coordination between the two lending units to maximize economic development in areas where new construction or improvement of public facilities is needed to enhance the efficiency of the private business activities being assisted. Public facility loans should also be available to other areas in need of such loans to renew or expand public facilities required in the local economy. The issuance of capital stock to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the RFC would be authorized by legislation, with authority for the RFC to issue bonds.

Pension funds should be used for reindustrialization and expansion that provides employment, as long as there are adequate protections for the pension funds. The legislation should provide that all obligations of the Corporation which are purchased by employee pension benefits plans shall be guaranteed—backed by the full faith and credit of the U.S.

Conclusion

The policies that AFL-CIO is calling for are ambitious. They add up to a repudiation and a dramatic reversal of the policies of the Reagan Administration. We firmly believe, however, that such action is the key to progress. We also recognize that many of the job creating programs we call for will cost money and in the near term would enlarge the budget deficit even further. Deficit increases, however, could be blunted or avoided through tax policies that prevent some of the more inequitable and costly provisions of the Reagan Administration's tax cut from taking effect and by plugging some of the long-standing loopholes that hurt the economy and destroy jobs.

America needs jobs. There is no higher economic priority and no more urgent economic agenda.

Solid organizing base laid in Houston established. That doesn't show up on National Labor Relations Board figures, but it does show up in internal figures which contribute to a union's strength."

Deputy Director Don Slaiman said the Houston Organizing Project has helped contribute to new levels of activity and enthusiasm within the area's labor movement. The Harris County AFL-CIO and the Houston & Gulf Coast Building Trades Council conducted highly successful registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns prior to last November's elections, among their other achievements.

"We look forward to the second year of the project as one which will be built on an already established solid foundation, and we look forward to a much greater accomplishment in terms, not only of numbers, but of new areas of the labor force," Slaiman said.

Executive Council's standing committee on organizing assesses Houston project's progress and goals.

Old and new methods

The project marked its first anniversary last October, posting gains of between 5,000 and 6,000 new members. Twenty-eight unions are participating in the campaign that is combining the use of advanced computer technology and media programs with traditional person-to-person organizing techniques.

Kistler said the project is aimed at winning bargaining rights for some 800,000 workers in Houston and five surrounding counties, but he stresses that this is a long-range program marked only by the date it was begun, "not when it will end."

His department points out that building trades unions organizing in Houston have signed up 228 formerly non-union contractors and have been recruiting new members among skilled journeymen, in addition to their already extensive apprenticeship programs.

The unions also set up committees to work on special agreements to apply to utility work, the cement supply and delivery industry and residential construction to help union firms penetrate these virtually non-union sectors.

Contractor benefits, too

Among the results, a union contractor recently beat 24 non-union shops in a bid for a $36 million waste water treatment plant. More than 300 local building trades union members will work on that job.

Houston, which had only a 3.2 percent jobless rate when the organizing program was kicked off, was attractive to many unemployed workers from other states lured by the prospect of jobs in the booming Sunbelt city.

But the jobs began to dry up when the recession deepened, and the project's building trades division set up a "travelers' assistance program" to aid jobless workers from other states. The program helps demonstrate that unions are concerned about working people regardless of their membership status.

Under the program, a seminar was held to train business agents and other local union representatives to help "stranded" workers find housing, solve credit problems, apply for unemployment benefits or other assistance, obtain health care and even to find jobs.

Future organizers

Slaiman points out that in recognition of the business climate in Houston and these workers' problems, the program has even found union members jobs with non-union contractors. But it's made clear they will be asked to help with organizing should that contractor become the target of a campaign.

The project's public sector and health care division has seen a near doubling of membership among teachers and other workers in the city's school system, including the rejoining of their unions by current union members. That action was necessary when a court decision allowed the school board to rule that all members on check-off would have to be re-enrolled after a dues structure change was made by the union.

Texas has no collective bargaining law to protect public employees and no provision for a union to get exclusive recognition to bargain for public workers. The Teachers and the State, County & Municipay Employees have no collective bargaining agreements with the school system. They do have the right to sign members for dues check-off, to represent them in grievances and to confer with local authorities before wage increases are determined.

Public sector potential

Slaiman emphasizes that given those conditions, the record numbers of AFT and AFSCME members who rejoined the unions, along with the sizable increase in new members, points to public workers' growing recognition of the value of a union and indicates a healthy future for organizing in that sector.

The AFT and AFSCME are already organizing among area college teachers and other city and local workers.

Other encouraging developments along with outright election wins, the department said, include successful campaigns that are reversing previous losses, such as a 175-11 victory by the Service Employees in a second election at a nursing home last December.

A growing number of voluntary agreements for representation in manufacturing and services have also been posted, including shops organized by the Service Employees, the Sign Painters and the Graphic Arts International Union.

The department report points out that in late December, organizing activities in these industries was showing a marked increase after "an initial depressing psychological effect" from the recession and fear tactics used by management including layoffs and the hiring of union-busting consultants.

New teamwork

Typical of the enthusiasm unions are showing, the department said, is the teamwork developed by the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees and the Service Employees in joining forces to organize some 1,400 workers at the Houston Astrodome.

HERE has targeted the food service workers who took a pay cut when a new food vendor took over the concession at the sports complex, and SEIU will organize the parking lot attendants, ushers, security guards and cleaning workers, many of whom are paid the minimum wage with no benefits.

The unions said they plan "intensified activity" in March and April when the baseball season begins.

Kistler stresses that the campaign is recognized as a new force in the city.

"People in the area recognize the Houston Organizing Project as their own, like the Houston Astrodome is their own," Kistler declared.

Senate rollcalls on 3 key labor, jobs measures

These three key rollcalls are from the final days of the 97th Congress, when the Senate acted on a labor-supported highway and mass transit bill and on an appropriations resolution to continue funding for government agencies.

VOTE NO. 1 shows the 48-46 rejection of a labor-opposed amendment that would have weakened Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage requirements for highway repairs.

VOTE NO. 2 is the 50-46 defeat of a union-opposed motion to delete funds for a public works jobs program from the appropriations resolution. However, a House-Senate conference later dropped the jobs program in order to avoid a presidential veto.

VOTE NO. 3 shows the 56-34 Senate passage of the highway and transit bill.

On the rollcalls, R indicates "right" votes for labor's position; W shows "wrong" votes, and A stands for "absent."

Sagging economy top 1982 labor story

Recession came perilously close to depression during 1982. The turnabout Administration economists had predicted never arrived. Instead, unemployment climbed to the highest level in more than four decades, a devastating 10.8 percent.

America's voters sent a "change the course" election message. The actions of the new 98th Congress in the months ahead will tell whether the message was heeded.

And Poland's military rulers found that Solidarity has deep roots.

These are gleanings from the 51 issues of the AFL-CIO News published during 1982.

January

Unemployment rate as new year begins is 8.9 percent—the fifth successive monthly increase. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland blames Administration's "failed experiments on voodoo economics" and calls on Congress to shape "responsible alternatives." . . . Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers pact with Gulf Oil paves way for industry settlements covering 55,000. . . . At call of International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, worldwide rallies are held Jan. 30 demanding restoration of trade union rights in Poland. In the United States, there are demonstrations and rallies in Chicago, Washington and a score of other cities. . . . Labor joins observance of centennial of Franklin D. Roosevelt's birth. . . . Washington State AFL-CIO brings 15,000 to rally for "jobs and justice" at the state capitol grounds in Olympia.

People: Andrew J. McLellan, AFL-CIO inter-American affairs director, dies at 70. Murray Seeger becomes AFL-CIO information director on Saul Miller's retirement.

February

New Reagan budget proposals ask further cuts in programs for the needy and foresee a record deficit resulting from continued high unemployment and tax cuts . . . At AFL-CIO Executive Council session, labor unveils its alternative program of job creation, repair of safety-net programs and lowering budget deficits by repealing "the worst giveaways" of the 1981 tax bill and paying for any defense spending increases with a special surtax. . . . Council urges prompt Senate action on House-passed extension of Voting Rights Act, scores Reagan's "new federalism" scheme, and urges rejection of nomination of John Van de Water to head NLRB. . . . Unemployment rate dips to 8.5 percent, but jobs are also down as discouraged workers shrink labor force. . . . Reagan asks Republicans in Congress to "hold firm to the course we have charted." In Idaho, Gov. John Evans (D) vetoes "right-to-work" bill passed by the Republican legislature. An override attempt fails.

People: Gerald W. McEntee, president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, is elected to an AFL-CIO Executive Council vacancy resulting from the death of Jerry Wurf. . . . BRAC's James J. Kennedy, Jr., is named executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. Wes Reedy retiring from post.

March

New wave of layoffs push unemployment rate back up to 8.8 percent with 9.6 million jobless. . . . At joint House-Senate hearings, AFL-CIO and panel of union witnesses urge Congress to restore job training and job development programs. . . . International Labor Organization calls on Poland to free imprisoned union leaders . . . AFL-CIO spring series of regional conferences gets under way with Kirkland and Donahue active participants in discussions of grass-roots lobbying and the coming election campaign. . . . Chairmen of four House committees concerned with health care costs join labor in protesting Administration decision to allow hospitals and nursing homes to include fees paid to union-busting consultantts as reimbursable expenses under Medicare. . . . At congressional hearings, AFL-CIO charges Labor Dept. has put corporate profit ahead of worker safety in its administration of the Occupational Safety & Health Act. . . . Clothing & Textile Workers negotiate pay, pension gains for 70,000 in men's apparel on eve of strike deadline.

April

Unemployment rate cilmbs to 9 percent, matching the peak of the post-World War II era. Conferences of Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Industrial Union Dept. reinforce labor's call for a change in economic course. Message from both conferences is that if Congress doesn't respond to the nation's needs, voters will elect a Congress that will do so. . . . Coalition of Labor Union Women launches two-year project to help women move into leadership roles in their unions. . . . At House hearings, unions press for additional weeks of unemployment compensation for recession victims. . . . Unanimous NLRB upholds union access to worker health and safety records. . . . Rubber Workers set industry pattern with B. F. Goodrich pact retaining cost-of-living index. . . . AFL-CIO testimony scores Caribbean Basin Initiative as threat to jobs. . . . Dip in consumer price index linked to recession and oil glut. . . . CWA and IBEW negotiate job security pact covering workers affected by American Telephone & Telegraph Co. divestiture of local operating companies. . . . National Football League Players Association affiliates with AFL-CIO central bodies in all 28 NFL cities and in 14 states. . . . Budget cuts force closing of four of the eight Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service regional offices.

Bad Lessons

CALIFORNIA'S state university system and American University, a private institution in the District of Columbia, have been doing their utmost to give higher education a bad name.

They are succeeding, mightily.

The University of California board of regents took a leaf from union-busting private employers when it became aware of union organizing activities at various university campuses. It mounted a campaign to keep unions out.

Since union-busting costs money, the regents voted 11-9 to earmark for the campaign $157,000 in federal funds given to the university for the administrative costs of overseeing government contracts.

A sample of the anti-union campaign being waged with this money is a "fact sheet" distributed to employees at the UCLA campus. It declares bluntly that the university administration "does not want its employees to unionize" and does not consider collective bargaining "desirable."

In words surely taken from some management consultant's handbook of union-busting, the university warns its workers that voting for union representation means high dues, along with the likelihood of "fines and assessments . . . if you miss union meetings or refuse to go on strike."

THE "FACT SHEET" scoffs at the notion that "unions will succeed in obtaining better and faster salary increases than management can obtain for you" and warns that the collective bargaining process "leads to an inevitable increase in tension, confrontation and conflict."

One of the outraged minority on the board of regents was John F. Henning, the executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO. What the majority of the regents has done, he protested, flouts both state and federal labor relations policies of encouraging collective bargaining.

California's basic labor law advocates "negotiation of terms and conditions of employment" and declares that the workers' choice of bargaining representative should be free from employer "interference."

The state law is modeled on the National Labor Relations Act, in which Congress declared "the policy of the United States" to be one of "encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining."

Is it too much to ask that a publicly supported university system follow public policy in dealing with its employees?

ACROSS THE CONTINENT, at American University, a group of employees learned through Christmas season dismissal notices how fully they can rely on the benevolence of management in a union-free environment.

American University was looking for ways to economize and it settled on its cleaning staff, some of whom had been employed longer than most of the professors.

The university had been paying the cleaners $6 an hour and providing retirement benefits. But it found a cheaper way of dealing with its cleaning needs. It fired the university employees and contracted with a private firm to do the work.

The university proposed to help some of the dismissed workers get jobs with the private contractor, but there was just one small hitch.

It seems that the private contractor paid only $4 an hour and provided no retirement benefits. Nor would length of service with American University count for vacation time, which for new hires would be one week a year.

Such shabby treatment of workers would be an offense to decency coming from any employer. It is doubly shocking that in this case the employer is a university, supposedly a beacon of enlightenment, a guardian of knowledge.

Surely, somewhere in American University's thick catalog of courses there is one titled "Ethics." The university's administrators should enroll.

Reagan cuts create tide of homeless Americans

By Press Associates, Inc.

An estimated two million people are homeless in the United States. They overflow emergency shelters. They live in the streets, in cars, under bridges, in caves along river banks, beneath highway overpasses.

Shocking stories of the homeless in America were reported to a congressional hearing in December.

Mayor Ted Wilson of Salt Lake City, representing the U.S. Conference of Mayors, described the situation as a "national tragedy, a national disgrace" and "a hell of a mess."

Colonel Ernest A. Miller, national public affairs director for the Salvation Army, said requests for assistance are running 25 to 40 percent higher than last year.

Victims of recession, cutbacks

All the witnesses experienced in dealing with the needy said the "new homeless" no longer fit the skid-row stereotype. They are victims of the recession and cutbacks in social services. They are young men, families, women and children.

Carol Bellamy, president of the New York City Council, said recent studies show the average age of men in shelters there is 36 years. Some 40 percent said they sought shelter due to job loss.

Miller described those turning up in Salvation Army shelters as "people who were on the edges of the middle class, if not in the middle class, within the last half decade." He said, "they are often skilled workers whose skills have become obsolete by social conditions they cannot control," like the permanent shutdown of basic manufacturing industries.

Sister Loretta Schulte, who founded a Catholic shelter for women in Cleveland, said she had observed "a direct relationship between the numbers we are getting and the amount of money that has been cut" from mental institutions and other social programs.

Backing up the testimony from expert witnesses were stories from homeless victims:

- Victoria Mason and her two children have been homeless since last August when her apartment building was turned into condominiums. She has been looking, but hasn't found work or another apartment she can afford. Since she has lost her home, she has been living "from shelter to shelter."
- Clarence West, a 56-year-old native of Washington, D.C. lost his job as a truck driver last March after he was hospitalized for several weeks for a serious illness. Since then, he has been unable to find work, except for a few days of temporary, part-time employment. He has been homeless for eight months.
- George Andrews, 26, has a bachelor's degree in physics. Since he was graduated two and a half years ago, he has lived in his car, searching in different parts of the country but unable to find work. "I will take any kind of job," he said.
- Pearline Pegues worked ten years in a West Virginia factory until it closed last July. Since then, she hasn't been able to find work and she lost her house, car and furniture. With five children, she can't find an affordable apartment large enough for her family.

If the 98th Congress responds to the crisis of the homeless, it will have to break through President Reagan's dreamworld.

While the victims of his policies were looking for their next meal and bed, Reagan broadcast a Christmas message from the White House. Americans are gathered around the family hearth, the President said, and "we Americans are still uniquely blessed, not only with the rich bounty of our land, but by a bounty of the spirit."

MEMO FROM COPE

Helms Talkathon—Testing Waters For New Right's Populist Crusade?

There are two theories for all the huffing and puffing Sen. Jesse Helms did in his filibuster that delayed for two weeks the recent lame-duck Senate session from considering the proposed five-cents-a-gallon-of-gas tax hike.

1. He was playing a heroic Horatius at the Bridge for the benefit of home consumption in North Carolina, where he faces a tough re-election campaign in 1984.

2. He was building name recognition for a push for the GOP presidential nomination in 1984 should President Reagan not run again. (Helms already gets more ink than most of his colleagues, mostly for obstructionism.)

Here's a third notion the press didn't touch, floated for those who get their highs on political speculation and don't mind adding two and two and running the risk of coming up with three. Sequence:

► Step One—The October issue of Conservative Digest, monthly bible of the new right, announces the ultra-conservative movement is shifting priorities. It's not dropping the single-issue appeals that get its troops all lathered up. Instead, it is going beyond them to reach for the hearts, minds and support of average Americans with a populist appeal on economic issues, among them taxes.

► Step Two—Jesse Helms takes on the proposed gas tax boost, revenue from which will create several hundred thousand jobs and make possible badly needed repairs on roads, bridges and mass transit systems.

Helms, certainly the most visible and constant public spokesman for the new right, took the populist approach that the proposal—subsequently enacted—was unjust because it taxed everyone equally—rich and poor alike. He was echoed in the talkathon by a small supporting cast, all creatures of, and beholden to, the new right: Senators East (N.C.), Nickles (Okla.), Humphrey (N.H.).

(Bleeding, as they did, for the poor and for working people, was a new experience for them. This is the gang that's out front slashing food stamps and other nutrition programs, health and housing—and it's hardly been a bulwark of support for workers.)

In paralyzing the Senate with their talk-fest, the four rightists defied the President they view as one of them and their party leadership. But they, and the right-wing leaders and groups they serve and are served by, now can claim they fought for the people.

There may or may not be a connection between the Helms filibuster and the announced new right launch of its version of populism. Certainly, it could be a testing of the waters.

Whether or not it turns out this two-plus-two of speculation adds up to four won't be known for a while. Meantime, given the abysmal record of Helms et al on people-helping issues in the past, it's prudent for average Americans to greet any overtures they may make with the same caution a cobra views the arrival of a mongoose.

Helms's filibuster was so dogged, and in the eyes of most senators, so wrong-headed, that the normal syrupy phrases senators use when referring to colleagues went out the window. One comment about Helms, from Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), himself a staunch conservative: "Seldom have I seen a more obnoxious and obdurate performance."

Odds 'n Ends

PRESIDENT REAGAN plays it close to the vest on his plans for 1984—whether or not to seek re-election—but some folks are going ahead on his campaign without him. Sen. Jesse Helms (N.C.), despite some recent legislative differences with the President (see story this page), writes a fund appeal for the Reagan re-election campaign on the letterhead of Americans for Reagan, a front for Helms's own National Congressional Club. The appeal seeks $1.2 million to buy TV time for Reagan (all the President has to do is call a press conference and he'll get all the TV time he wants). Helms isn't alone. A small band of right-wing New York Republicans opens "unofficial" campaign headquarters without Reagan's blessing and probably without his prior knowledge. They bill it as a "symbolic gesture of confidence and optimism." Among them is Roger Stone, one of the early new right leaders. Earlier, to Reagan's displeasure, his long-time associate, Lyn Nofziger, called together a bunch of GOP ultra-conservatives to start planning re-election campaign strategy.

WHILE ON THE SUBJECT, there's apparently some pulling and hauling between the GOP National Committee—now headed by Reagan's close friend Sen. Paul Laxalt (Nev.)—and White House political advisers. The GOP committee has circulated a memorandum proposing that it act as the Reagan re-election committee. But top political aides in the White House reportedly have already lined up long-time California campaign whiz Stuart Spencer as director of any Reagan re-election campaign, and will want to run the effort from the White House, itself.

JUST IN CASE there's no Reagan re-election effort, Rep. Jack Kemp (N.Y.) seems to be laying the groundwork for a run of his own for the nomination—at least if travel and favors to party people are any indication. Kemp turned up in 30 states and campaigned for 75 GOP congressional candidate leading up to November 2. His own political action committee, Campaign for Prosperity, kicked in $150,000 to GOP candidates for Congress. He is said to get more than 300 invitations a month to address GOP events.

Studies Show Income Shift—Upward

Two recent studies bear out the conviction that the Reagan Administration believes devoutly in the redistribution of wealth: In an upward direction.

Both the Congressional Budget Office and the Urban Institute conclude that as a result of Reagan's tax cuts and budget cuts, the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer.

Even a solid economic recovery, the reports indicate—a recovery for which there's yet been no sighting—would leave a widening gap between rich and poor as the net effect of Reagan programs.

The Urban Institute charges "a counter-revolution is underway," led by Reagan, after a half-century of efforts by the government to assure at least minimal acceptable levels of nutrition, housing and health care for all Americans.

The Congressional Budget Office study compares gains from Reagan's tax cuts—once the final cut comes this year—with losses as a result of federal spending slashes in cash benefits such as social security, jobless insurance and food stamps, and "in-kind" benefits like child nutrition, student loans and medical care for the poor and elderly. Here are CBO figures for five yearly income groups:

	Up to $10,000	$10-20,000	$21-40,000	$40-80,000	Over $80,000
Cash	−$270	−$140	−$90	−$70	−$70
In-kind	−$90	−$80	−$50	−$60	−$50
Taxes	+$120	+$440	+$950	+$1,830	+$15,250
Net	−$240	+$220	+$810	+$1,700	+$15,130

The Urban Institute's analysis shows much the same results and similar conclusions. It says, "Substantial gains will accrue to higher income families, while the 46 million families with incomes below $15,000 will have no significant change in their real after-tax income." Families just above the poverty line will suffer the greatest losses, it says.

Both studies were seconded by an economist at Wisconsin University's Institute for Research on Poverty, who said: "Even if the Administration's program generates a recovery, the gains that trickle down to those at the bottom of the income distribution aren't likely to be large enough to offset the direct losses from the reduced transfer and other social programs."

MEAN STREAK

Would this bunch keep E.T. from going home; throw Bambi out of the forest; stone cute, curly little Shirley?

Cumulatively, items in the news over the period of less than a month recently reveal anew the mean-spirited nature of the Reagan Administration.

It's enough to convince you the Administration would bump E.T. off the spaceship taking him home, would throw Bambi out of the forest, and would stone the early dimpled, curly-haired, toe-tapping, adorable Shirley Temple.

In review—starting with of all times Thanksgiving—these thoughts of the Reagan Administration have leaked to the public:

► With the highest unemployment rate in more than 40 years—10.8 percent, 11,987,000 out of work (not counting millions of discouraged workers and those on part-time seeking full-time jobs), it was revealed some in the Administration were tinkering with the notion of taxing jobless benefits.

► Meanwhile, others came up with a suggestion to tax workers' health insurance premiums paid by their employers.

► Still others in the Administration floated a proposal—hardly new to the Reagan group—to charge Medicare beneficiaries more for their health care.

► Another potential group of sacrificial lambs: food stamp recipients. Word leaked that the Agriculture Dept. considered proposing a further $1 billion cut in a program that's already been reduced by 20 percent below the pre-Reagan level. Also, several child nutrition programs might be lumped into one block grant, leaving it for states and localities to decide who gets less to eat than before.

► The Administration considers merging two grant-to-state programs—social services and community services—and slashing their funding while at it. Cut deeply would be funds for day care centers, homemakers for elderly and handicapped persons, emotionally disturbed children, transportation services for the elderly and services for the rural poor.

Most of these things aren't going to happen. Most were merely floated as possible ways to reduce the record-setting federal budget deficits the Reagan Administration is running up. Some were disavowed by the Administration—but only after public clamor hit the fan. Yet, some are bound to come up as serious proposals in the forthcoming Reagan budget.

He is confronting, by most projections, a budget deficit for Fiscal 1984 in the range of $180-$200 billion (1984, for folks with short memories, is the year presidential-candidate Reagan promised he would submit a balanced budget).

To keep the deficit around a still-whopping $160-$170 billion level, Reagan's proposed budget is expected to demand $30-$40 billion in further cuts in people-helping programs that have already suffered deep wounds from the slings and arrows of the Reagan Administration. He still looks to working people and the poor in his proposals for "sacrifice."

Taken together, these various proposals speak very unflatteringly of this Administration. Even to entertain such notions is tacky, harsh, spiteful. The Administration's instincts are all wrong. It looks in the wrong places and at the wrong people and the wrong programs to carve out its pound of flesh.

Like Wildfire

President Reagan's first concrete step to reduce unemployment caught on like wildfire. He proposed on Christmas that every business hire one unemployed worker. Promptly, the third largest bank in Pittsburgh got behind the President's program and hired exactly one jobless person. Reports around the country indicate that at least three or four other businesses followed suit—slashing joblessness from approximately 12 million to approximately 11,999,995.

Jobless rate 10.8% — and rising

They want jobs

More than 20,000 of Chicago's unemployed braved 26-degree temperatures to apply for 2,800 full-time and 1,000 part-time jobs being offered by the city in a $10-million program financed by allocations from the new federal gasoline tax. The program will provide jobs for only 10 weeks, but Mayor Jane M. Byrne said she hopes to find a way to continue it. A lottery will be used to determine who gets the jobs.

Policy shift demanded by Kirkland

By James M. Shevis

The 10.8 percent jobless rate recorded in December, the highest in more than 40 years, and the prospect of further increases make a correction in economic policy imperative, the AFL-CIO warned.

"Economic policy must be changed to make the national goal an early return to full employment," Federation President Lane Kirkland declared.

"The country has now endured two years of rising unemployment. Most forecasters believe there is more bad news to come. Clearly, now is the time for the President and the Congress to change course and put America back to work."

Needed protections

Kirkland also called on the Administration and Congress to extend unemployment benefits to protect those whose benefits are expiring, and to provide health care for the jobless and their families who have lost protection.

December's 10.8 percent jobless rate—up from a revised figure of 10.7 percent for November—would have reached 11 percent if the Bureau of Labor Statistics had stuck to its old methodology for calculating the influence of seasonal factors on unemployment.

BLS, which issues data on employment and unemployment monthly, used new seasonal adjustment factors in its routine, year's end revision of the previous 12 monthly rates, with the result that there were changes in eight.

'Discouraged' workers

Besides the 12 million Americans officially unemployed in December, BLS said there were 1,849,000 "discouraged" workers—persons who want jobs but do not bother looking because they believe none exists for them. The number was the highest since BLS began keeping records for such persons in 1967. There were 1,638,000 in the third quarter.

"The new record number of workers who have simply given up hope of finding jobs is an index of national misery and an

Court order hits OSHA stalling on gas standard

By Arlee C. Green

A federal court has ordered the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue an emergency temporary standard on ethylene oxide by Jan. 25 to sharply reduce worker exposure to the toxic gas.

U.S. District Court Judge Barrington D. Parker's ruling marked the first time that OSHA has been compelled to issue an emergency standard.

The State, County & Municipal Employees and the Public Citizen Health Research Group sued OSHA after it rejected their petition to lower the current exposure limit for workers to one part ethylene oxide per million parts air (1 ppm). They cited numerous studies showing the current 50 ppm limit produced "grave health dangers," including higher instances of leukemia, stomach cancers and chromosomal damage.

AFSCME and the Health Research Group were joined in the suit by the Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Work-

Labor spurs Congress to shape jobs program

Congress must step in immediately with effective jobs programs—including $10 billion in federal grants for community development projects—to halt the spread of human suffering caused by the Reagan Recession, the AFL-CIO declared at Senate hearings.

"It is clearly in the economic and social interest of the nation to put Americans who are able and willing to work into productive jobs which generate taxes, produce useful community services and community improvements, and stimulate the economy in communities with high unemployment," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald told a Senate subcommittee.

Job creation is a moral, social, political, and economic imperative, Oswald stressed. Unemployment generates tremendous social losses, which include physical and mental illness, family disorganization, social alienation, and crime, he added.

Furthermore, the loss to the economy is staggering, Oswald observed. For every one million jobless workers, the country foregoes the production of nearly $100 billion in goods and services and the federal treasury loses $30 billion.

Oswald noted that a year ago the federation proposed $5 billion for public service jobs. But the deepening recession and mounting unemployment has created the need for $10 billion to fund the program.

Twelve million Americans—nearly one out of every nine workers—are now job-

Management consultants

Stopping the modern union-buster

Union busting is a growth industry in the current political climate. It has attracted some 1,500 practitioners who prefer to be known as "management consultants." They are housed in law firms, corporations, management associations and businesses whose sole purpose is to prevent workers from exercising their right to union representation.

They're working behind the scenes in one of every two union organizing campaigns, protected by the Reagan Administration's refusal to enforce Landrum-Griffin Act rules requiring public exposure of their activities.

In the past decade, they've helped cause a nine-fold increase in unfair labor practice charges against employers for flouting the nation's labor laws that are supposed to "encourage" worker representation and collective bargaining.

In their wake, these management consultants have left labor-management relations in a shambles, requiring years of repair.

But they can be stopped. The biggest of them all, Modern Management, Inc., for example, has been defeated in several instances by effective union action.

Unions have successfully forced exposure of consultants, and their activities, through state legislation. At the federal level, they are challenging—directly and through the courts—the Labor Dept.'s attempts to conceal management consultant practices.

As management consultants widen their attack on union organizing and bargaining, unions are gaining experience and scoring successes in countering those activities. Some examples:

- Modern Management (2M), brought in by Kenosha Memorial Hospital, Kenosha, Wis., to prevent District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union from organizing its employees, ended up leaving town empty-handed. District 1199's exposure of 2M's union-busting tactics helped focus resistance by the rank-and-file workers and the community.

Union revelations included the source of the hospital's income—50 percent from union-negotiated health and welfare plan revenues and 30 percent from taxpayers' Medicaid and Medicare payments, from which the hospital paid exorbitant consultant fees. When the union disclosed that the president of the hospital was a director of Kenosha's largest bank and warned that unions might withdraw their funds, 2M disappeared from sight.

Stopping the modern union-buster

● Modern Management tasted an earlier defeat in attempting to block Auto Workers District 65 from organizing Boston University clerical employees. "We prepared our people for the barrage," says library clerk David Hofstetter who helped in the drive.

University employees making $4 to $5 an hour, looking at 2M's fee of a quarter of a million dollars, decided in favor of the union.

Make the first move

"As soon as you find out the union busters are on the scene," says Hofstetter, "go on the offensive. Don't wait for them to start scaring people."

● West Coast Industrial Relations Association (WCIRA), whose reputation rivals 2M's, was brought in by Humana Corp., Louisville, Ky., ostensibly to help in negotiations with the Operating Engineers. But the union discovered the true goal was decertification of the unit.

Following a series of unfair labor practices, IUOE Local 501 filed charges against both the company and WCIRA before the National Labor Relations Board. The violations were so flagrant that the board ordered WCIRA to refrain from interfering with workers' rights to self-organization—an order to be utilized by other unions encountering similar illegal actions by WCIRA.

● Craft, Barresi & Associates, hired to stop Local 40 of the Food & Commercial Workers from organizing employees at the Saginaw Medical Center, Saginaw, Mich., ran into a union committee fully briefed in advance on the firm's union-busting strategy. Forewarned meant being forearmed, and the union won.

The UFCW and the AFL-CIO researched company financial reports, previous Craft and Barresi campaigns, Labor Dept. reports and data on union strikes and other activities. The data covered union dues and salaries, strike records, UFCW's constitution and a breakdown on its membership, producing a lookalike to the upcoming consultant campaign. With everything previewed in advance, the employees were ready.

● Southeastern Employers Service Corp. (SESCO) led the decertification effort by East Tennessee Baptist Hospital, Knoxville, against Local 475 of the Office & Professional Employees. The union-busting firm opened with a letter-a-day scare campaign directed at the 230 nurses and technicians—the only union members among the 1,300 hospital employees.

SESCO's standard theme of union strikes, violence and dictatorship was countered by a 35-member organizing committee communicating with employees by telephone, house visits and handbilling. "We exposed SESCO and their terrorism openly," says an OPEIU organizer. "We 'immunized' employees in advance to SESCO tactics." The vote: 181 to 80 with three challenges, in favor of the union.

Collegiate collaboration

Management consultants lecture on union-busting tactics in high-priced seminars where they also advertise their services for employer campaigns. Frequently, the seminars are conducted under university sponsorship in an effort to cloak the subject matter with respectability.

Unions have discovered that exposing such seminars through worker demonstrations and picketing is often enough to cause their cancellation. Many would-be participants, it seems, are reluctant to be identified publicly with anti-worker, anti-union efforts.

Last spring, for example, the Nevada Chambers of Commerce cancelled a seminar on "Maintaining Non-Union Status and Going Non-Union" when the state AFL-CIO staged a 5,000-member protest outside the meeting hall. Union-busting Kirschman, Rich & Cohen had no one to instruct.

Seminar stopped

A month later in San Diego, Legal Financial Services cancelled a planned open-shop seminar rather than face a similar demonstration planned by area unions. The firm simply packed its bags for its home base in Massachusetts.

Demonstrations at other seminar sites—San Francisco, Seattle and Miami, among them—have brought sharp cutbacks in attendance or outright cancellation.

The penchant of management consultants for hiding their activities from public view can be successfully countered through legislation. The federal Landrum-Griffin Act requires consultants to file reports on "direct and indirect" persuader activities they engage in. But the Labor Dept. under the Reagan Administration has stymied proper enforcement of this section of the law.

At the state level, unions are working aggressively to expose consultant activity. The New York State legislature has conducted hearings on use of state funds to hire union-busters in health care institutions. The California legislature is dealing with the issue of consultant reports to the state labor board.

In Maine, the legislature has enacted a comprehensive law licensing activities of private security guards that includes prohibitions against interfering with workers involved in organizing, picketing, and collective bargaining. The Wisconsin legislature passed a law barring state funds to underwrite union-busting by health care institutions.

Management consultants can best be countered by aggressively exposing their activities.

In the previous Administration, a barrage of union complaints led the Labor Dept. to expand its investigations of management consultants who failed to file reports. The Reagan Administration is not likely to respond in similar fashion, but complaints will demonstrate a clear pattern of non-enforcement of the law in the event of subsequent litigation.

Well-known tactics

The union-busting tactics of management consultants contain few surprises despite their reluctance to comply with the reporting provisions of the law. This enables union organizers to advise employees of what's likely to transpire in the campaign.

Unions should "anticipate and defuse the issues brought up by supervisors," the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services advises. "It becomes almost a joke after the organizer calls out what's coming."

The department has produced a 15-minute film, "So Can You," which details the experiences of workers and their unions in countering past anti-union campaigns of various management consultants.

The upshot is that union-busters, like vampires, can't stand the light of public exposure.

Visitor from Bonn

West German political leader Hans-Jochen Vogel and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland discuss economic and political developments in West Germany during a visit to the federation's headquarters. Vogel recently succeeded Helmut Schmidt as head of the Social Democratic Party in West Germany. He and Kirkland also explored labor matters in their respective countries and international cooperation among free trade unions.

Airline unions reach terms with Pan American, TWA

Three AFL-CIO affiliates reached agreement with Pan American World Airways on new two-year contracts extending wage concessions they had agreed to earlier.

The unions agreeing "in principle" with the airline are the Transport Workers, representing 6,700 mechanics, Air Line Pilots and Flight Engineers.

The Pan Am accord, which also included the unaffiliated Teamsters and the unaffiliated Flight Attendants, came on the heels of another airline settlement involving some 10,000 mechanics and related employees represented by the Machinists. IAM negotiators agreed on a new pact with Trans World Airlines just minutes after a Dec. 22 strike deadline.

The Air Line Pilots have ratified the Pan Am pact. The Flight Engineers were still voting on it, and the other three unions planned to submit the agreement to members this month for ratification action.

Terms of the new contracts were not disclosed. Cost-saving agreements have been sought by the money-losing airline as part of its overall financial recovery plan.

Paul Chorbajian, chairman of the five-union joint council and president of the Flight Engineers Pan Am chapter, said that acceptance of the new agreement reaffirmed labor's commitment to support the company.

No details of the TWA agreement were released, but chief IAM bargainer William L. Scheri called the settlement "fair and equitable." The union recommended ratification of the TWA pact in a vote.

Pay and work rules were the major disputed issues in the TWA negotiations. Chairman Robert J. Brown and mediator Robert O. Harris of the National Mediation Board assisted in the talks.

Guild's Broun award cites series on abused children

A series of articles documenting how today's abused children will likely become tomorrow's criminals earned the Newspaper Guild's 1982 Heywood Broun Memorial Award for Stephen R. Morin.

Morin researched and wrote the series, "The Children of Crime," for the Providence (R.I.) Journal-Bulletin where he was a member of the Guild Local 41. He moved to a reporting job with the Wall Street Journal in mid-1982.

The award—$1,000 for Morin and a citation for the Journal-Bulletin—was presented at a luncheon at the National Press Club the opening day of the winter meeting of the Guild's executive board.

Morin's series was selected from 91 entries in the annual competition, established 42 years ago in memory of the Guild's founding president, Heywood Broun.

Contest judges said the prize-winning series was far more than an examination of police and court records.

"It pushes beyond, by digging deeply into case histories, and with sensitive writing it brings those victims alive for the reader," the judges observed. "This is the great strength of this project."

First-class complement

The judges also praised the photography of Anestis Diakopoulos, whose pictures accompanied the articles. Diakopoulos and John Mulligan, the paper's Washington bureau chief, accepted the award for Morin who was away on an assignment.

The judges also cited three other entries:

● Runner-up: Michael Kranish's "beautifully written series in the Miami Herald—beautifully illustrated by Bill Frakes"—describing the dying dreams of pensioners who had sought sunny refuge in Miami's South Beach area.

Honorable mention awards went to:

● Joel Brinkley for an expose of the Kentucky medical licensing board's failure to crack down on dangerous doctors, published in the Louisville Courier-Journal.

● John Hurst and Ron Taylor for a series in the Los Angeles Times exposing profiteering by operators of children's group foster homes in California.

Award-worthy

The judges agreed the "bright reputation of the Heywood Broun Award would have been upheld proudly by . . . any of the more than two dozen entries that survived the judges' first cut."

Judges for the 1982 contest were Ernest B. Furgurson, Washington bureau chief for the Baltimore Sun; Jim Lehrer, Washington anchor and associate editor of public television's MacNeil/Lehrer Report; Morton Mintz, reporter for the Washington Post. Contest chairman was William J. Farson, retired executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild.

Labor-employer panels eligible for FMCS funds

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service will make $500,000 in grant funds available in 1983 for the creation or expansion of labor-management committees, FMCS Director Kay McMurray announced.

The grants will be provided to labor-management committees to meet the needs of either the entire community, certain industries on a national or local level, or state and local governments.

Eligibility is open to state and local governments, private non-profit labor-management committees, and other groups who can document efforts to improve labor relations, the FMCS said.

FMCS has awarded more than $1.5 million in grants in the past two fiscal years.

Additional information is available from Peter Regner, director of Labor-Management Grant Programs at the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, 2100 K St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20427.

Fair representation case

Court holds union liable for lost wages

The Supreme Court ruled that a union, not just an employer, can be held responsible for lost wages if it fails to properly represent a fired worker.

In a 5-4 decision that overturned a ruling by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., the high court reinstated a trial court's determination that the Postal Workers Union is liable for $30,000 in lost wages to Charles Bowen, a Lynchburg, Va., postal worker who was fired in February 1976 following a scuffle with a fellow employee.

Bowen had filed a grievance with his local union over his discharge by the Postal Service. The local president investigated the matter and determined that Bowen had been the target of harassment and ridicule by both coworkers and his supervisors.

At each stage of the grievance process, union representatives recommended that the grievance be pursued, and the investigation file was transferred to APWU national headquarters where decisions to proceed to arbitration are made. Faced with a backlog of arbitration requests in which the contractual time limit for requesting arbitration had expired, the national union abandoned Bowen's grievance short of arbitration.

Awarded damages

Bowen filed suit charging that the Postal Service had fired him without just cause and that the union had breached its duty of fair representation. The court entered a verdict against both defendants and awarded Bowen nearly $53,000 in lost earnings. The employer was ordered to pay $22,954 in compensatory damages, the union $30,000.

On appeal, the 4th Circuit modified the judgment so that no portion of the lost earnings could be charged to the union.

Writing for the majority, Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., said that when a union assumes responsibility for handling employee grievances, it also "assumes a corresponding duty to discharge that responsibility faithfully." The majority reasoned that the union must share in the liability because its breach caused the grievance procedure to malfunction, thereby increasing the damages suffered by the employee.

APWU President Moe Biller termed the decision "shocking" and predicted that "it will create a workload problem for the arbitration system."

Dissenting opinion

The dissenters asserted that the employer should be primarily liable for all back pay. Justice White warned that under the court's ruling the bulk of the back pay liability will be borne by the union, not the employer, even though the employer could have kept the back pay from adding up at any moment by reinstating the discharged employee. He noted that although the Postal Service wrongfully discharged Bowen, it was held liable for less than $23,000 in back wages compared to the union's $30,000 liability.

White suggested, as did Biller, that the practical effect of the ruling is that unions will seek arbitration of many unmeritorious grievances rather than risk exposure to the greater liability mandated by the court's finding.

In another decision, the Supreme Court ruled 8 to 1 that a construction worker injured on a Hudson River barge while working on a New York City sewer project was eligible for compensation under the federal compensation law for maritime workers.

Overturns finding

The decision reversed a ruling by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Appeals Court in New York, which had held that the worker was not eligible for the special federal compensation because his job lacked a "significant relationship to navigation or to commerce on navigable waters."

In writing the court's opinion, Justice O'Connor said the worker qualified because he was "engaged in maritime employment" within the requirements of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Dartmouth stonewall

Bricklayers Joanne Troy and Patricia Eaton, right, maintain an informational picket line at Dartmouth College protesting that fellow union members, women and minorities are not being hired for the construction of the Nelson A. Rockefeller Center for Social Sciences in Hanover, N.H. The college is required by federal law to meet certain hiring goals for women and minorities, the BAC said. The union members charged that the use of non-union workers on the project defiles the late New York governor's record as a union supporter and they are using radio and newspaper advertising and a letter-writing campaign as part of their informational program.

Maurice A. Hutcheson dies, former head of Carpenters

Lakeland, Fla.—Maurice A. Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters from 1952 to 1972 and a former AFL-CIO vice president, died on Jan. 9 at a Lakeland hospital following a heart attack. He was 85.

Hutcheson also served as a vice president of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. and played an active role in merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955. For many years, he was chairman of the federation's standing committee on social security.

In a message to the Carpenters, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue cited Hutcheson's dedicated service to the trade union movement.

"We share with the Carpenters a sense of loss in the death of Maurice Hutcheson," Kirkland and Donahue said. "On behalf of the Executive Council and the entire AFL-CIO, we express our sympathy."

Their message to Carpenters President Patrick C. Campbell noted Hutcheson's 50 years of service to the labor movement and his demonstrated "commitment, concern and selflessness."

Dedicated service

"Hutcheson's many achievements and contributions to the Carpenters, the BCTD and the federation will be long remembered. His role in the merger convention and his participation on the AFL-CIO Executive Council are but two examples of his great dedication to the principles of trade unionism. He was a model of strength and resolve to friends and colleague alike," Kirkland and Donahue said.

Hutcheson began his career as an apprentice in 1914 with Carpenters Local 75 in Indianapolis. After serving in the Navy in World War I, Hutcheson worked as a construction carpenter, dock builder and ship builder until his appointment as an international representative in 1928. Ten years later, he was elected first vice president of the international, and succeeded his father, William L. Hutcheson, as president in 1952.

As leader of the 800,000-member union, Hutcheson was involved in pioneering multi-union agreements in factory-built housing and in programs to recruit, train and place minority youths in union jobs.

Hutcheson's wife Ethel died in 1977. There are no immediate survivors. Funeral services were held in Lakeland Jan. 12.

Mixed signals cloud economic outlook

While a government measure of future economic trends indicated the nation's economy may be teetering on the edge of recovery, other signs pointed in an opposite direction.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading indicators, which was designed to forecast recessions and recoveries, rose eight-tenths of 1 percent in November, the seventh increase in the measure in the past eight months. Two other Commerce Dept. reports reinforced the belief that some relief from the longest and deepest recession since World War II can be expected in coming months. Factory orders rose seven-tenths of 1 percent and construction spending rose 3.5 percent in November.

But at the same time, more layoffs were announced, retail sales were less than robust, and consumer confidence remained deflated.

The business-oriented Conference Board said its survey of consumer confidence in December registered 54.4, virtually unchanged from November's 54.8 reading.

"The consumer's ambivalent mood seems fully consistent with the alternating current of good news-bad news emanating from Washington," said Fabian Linden, executive director of the board's consumer research center. "The failure of consumer confidence to improve after the upswing in November is disappointing, but there is at least small comfort in the fact that it has not deteriorated."

Outlook unchanged

Consumer expectations for the next six months remained roughly unchanged. About 6 percent expect improved business conditions six months from now, about the same as in November. About 21 percent anticipate more jobs, also virtually the same as in the previous month.

Meanwhile, retailers' hopes for a swell in consumer spending early in 1983 receded further as weak December sales figures confirmed reports that Christmas was mediocre for the nation's largest merchants. Sears, Roebuck & Co., the largest U.S. retailer, reported a 2.9-percent sales increase for the five weeks ended Jan. 1. K Mart Corp., the No. 2 retailer nationwide, finished December only eight-tenths of 1 percent ahead of a year ago, and J.C. Penney Co. had a 2.4-percent gain in December and an increase of just 1 percent for the 48-week period ended Jan. 1.

The bad news was followed by reports that Volkswagen of America Inc. planned to lay off 1,500 hourly and salaried employees at its Pennsylvania car assembly plant and at its Troy, Mich., headquarters. When the plant reopens in two weeks, the firm said, production will resume at a 28-percent lower rate.

Other major concerns to announce layoffs were International Harvester Co., Amax Inc., Public Service Co. of Indiana, and Allegheny International Inc. Earlier, Bethlehem Steel announced plans to shut down mills in New York State and Pennsylvania that would wipe out 10,000 jobs.

As the layoffs mounted, the number of new claims for unemployment insurance benefits rose. During the week ended Jan. 1, initial claims for benefits totaled 550,000, an increase of 35,000 over the previous week's level, the Labor Dept. said.

During the week ended Dec. 25, the Labor Dept. said, there were 4,338,000 persons drawing unemployment compensation benefits under various state programs. This was an increase of 13,000 from the previous week.

There were 340,500 workers claiming extended benefits available in 12 states. The week before, there were 358,200 such claimants.

Some positive signs

In its report on the rise in its index of leading indicators, the Commerce Dept. said that seven of the indicators contributed to the measure's rise while three moved unfavorably. The positive indicators were the average workweek, initial claims for state unemployment insurance, new orders for consumer goods and materials, building permits, producer prices, stock prices, and money supply.

The three declining indicators were the number of companies receiving slower deliveries from vendors, contracts and orders for equipment, and total liquid assets.

Tom Miller plans to retire as NLRB information chief

Thomas W. Miller, Jr., director of information for the National Labor Relations Board since 1960, announced he will retire at the end of January.

Miller, 65, came to Washington in 1956 from Topeka, Kan., where he headed the news bureau for United Press. He is only the third information director in the NLRB's 48-year history.

Providers hold key to Medicare costs

Providers—not patients—are responsible for health care costs, so the Reagan Administration's contention that Medicare costs can be controlled by slashing benefits should be viewed with skepticism, the AFL-CIO told the Advisory Council on Social Security.

AFL-CIO Assistant Social Security Director Karen Ignagni testified at a hearing of the council that no health care cost reform is possible "until the real decision-makers, those who provide and sell health services, have strong incentives to help bring health care inflation under control."

An Advisory Council on Social Security is appointed every four years to report on the status of the system to the President and Congress. This council, which will deliver its report in July, was directed by Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to examine only the Medicare program to avoid duplicating the work of the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Ripped Off

Inflation concern

The Social Security Administration, which handles the Medicare program, has estimated that Medicare costs are increasing about 19 percent annually and at that rate could bankrupt the program by the end of the decade.

Ignagni charged that under Medicare today "the sicker you are, the more you pay." The program requires sizable cost-sharing by the patient, yet doesn't provide protection from catastrophic illness or pay for some services commonly needed by the elderly such as dental and foot care, eyeglasses, long-term care or prescription drugs.

These costs mean that in spite of Medicare many elderly people "are forced to go without essential health care services because they cannot afford the high cost of treatment," Ignagni said in her testimony.

She charged that cuts in the program recently enacted by Congress at the urging of the Reagan Administration have made the situation worse, and she was critical of even deeper cuts now proposed by the Administration, including a "voucher" system to permit the elderly to shop around for lower grade, less extensive health care coverage that could mean earlier death or unnecessary suffering for some older and disabled people.

Ignagni told the council the government's own figures show that two-thirds of the rise in Medicare expenditures since the program was enacted is due to inflation, and its "runaway costs" are a result of Congress' "unwillingness to make Medicare anything more than an open-ended program that has encouraged hospital expansion and excessive utilization of services."

No relief seen

"Until serious efforts are made to change the way providers are reimbursed," Ignagni said, "there is no relief in sight for the federal government or for the financially over-burdened beneficiary."

She urged the council to "play an active role in redesigning the Medicare reimbursement system" by proposing a comprehensive program that will reduce overall health care costs without hurting Medicare beneficiaries by further slashes in protections.

Jacob Clayman, chairman of the Leadership Council of Aging Organizations, told the council the average Medicare beneficiary now spends 20 percent of his or her generally limited income on health care, or about as much as pre-Medicare levels.

Clayman, who is also president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, stressed that in spite of escalating costs, Medicare covers only about 44 percent of the elderly's health expenses.

Incentives urged

Congress should enact "system-wide incentives which encourage cost savings and reduce the nation's total health bill" rather than shift more of the burden to Medicare recipients through bigger cuts in the program, Clayman said.

Mel Glasser, director of the labor-supported Health Security Action Council, testified that measures advocated by the Administration will only hurt the elderly and shift costs to the states and the private sector without harnessing costs.

He said the Administration plan would "punish the patient and pass the buck."

Glasser suggested constructive solutions should include both the public and the private sector and that all elements of the health care system—hospitals, providers, nursing homes, laboratory and x-ray services, health maintenance organizations, medical technology specialists and those providing long-term care—should be part of cost containment strategies.

Glasser called for a state-by-state program, with cost ceilings, to require health care institutions to set up prospective budgets for their Medicare costs. He recommended that states also establish negotiated rates for reimbursing doctors and other professional providers.

AFL-CIO Vice President Kenneth T. Blaylock salutes public employees.

Public employees counter critics on Appreciation Day

Government employees have "very little to celebrate," President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. told 500 workers gathered at a noontime rally to celebrate Public Employees Appreciation Day.

"Today, public workers are maligned and alienated," Blaylock said. "Their careers, system of pay, retirement and other working conditions are attacked and being slowly destroyed. They find themselves being blamed for everything that's wrong with government."

The Jan. 10 rally, sponsored by the Public Employees Roundtable, a coalition of 26 public employee advocates, featured speakers from unions, business and government.

Congress and President Reagan have proclaimed Jan. 17 as Public Employees Appreciation Day to salute the 16 million federal, state and local public employees. That date is the 100th anniversary of the U.S. civil service system.

Arthur Flemming, former chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and now president of the National Council on Aging, told the public employees to start demanding more respect and protection from elected officials, and pressure the two national parties to adopt platform planks that acknowledge the importance of public workers' contributions.

Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, said the occasion should be "joyous," but "sadly, it is marred by a reckless assault on the federal workforce under the bogus banner of economic restraint. The demagaguery and duplicity of the White House is disgraceful when it comes to federal employees and the work they do."

Former Iranian hostage L. Bruce Laingen described the nation's public employees as "unsung heroes."

He noted confidence in public employees had declined because some "would use us as a favorite whipping boy and urged the employees assert more "moral and personal discipline to make the bureaucracy "worthy of what this great democracy expects of us."

Wider union role stressed in pension fund investments

Birmingham, England—American trade unions are seeking a greater role in decisions on the investment of their collectively bargained pension funds, AFL-CIO Associate Social Security Director Larry Smedley told local government leaders here.

Smedley noted that in the United States, worker pension funds constitute the largest single source of private capital. Yet while these funds represent the deferred wages of workers and therefore belong to them, "workers do not exercise control over that which they own," Smedley observed.

He spoke at a conference on pension funds and investment held by the West Midlands County Council to explore methods for investing local public workers' pension funds to their best advantage.

In discussing American developments in this area, Smedley cited evidence that union pension funds had been invested by plan managers in predominantly non-union companies or even in firms with records of frequent labor law violations. This, he noted, led the AFL-CIO Executive Council to study the pension fund issue and develop recommendations to help unions achieve greater participation.

Economic goals

The objectives of the program, he explained, are to increase employment through reindustrialization of the American economy, to advance social goals, to help workers exercise more shareholder rights, and to exclude from union pension investment portfolios companies hostile to workers' rights.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates are establishing procedures, such as information programs and special training procedures, to implement these goals, Smedley noted.

He pointed out that assertion of more worker control over pension funds is complicated by the existence of different types of pension plans, among them multi-employer, single employer and public workers retirement funds.

Private plans, covered by the labor-supported Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), must measure up to strict investment standards that could pose legal problems for unions pressing for investments to achieve broader economic and social goals, Smedley pointed out. He stressed that the American labor movement has managed to comply with the law and demonstrate that prudent, alternative choices are available "within the area of equally acceptable investment risks" that still meet labor's policy objectives.

Smedley told the conference that determining which companies should be excluded from a plan's portfolio is complex and difficult because it is hard to establish criteria for "satisfactory" or "unsatisfactory" companies.

Computer project

He reported that the AFL-CIO is establishing a computer tracking project to analyze the stockholdings of the 100 largest union-influenced pension funds in the United States.

The computer records will enable a union interested in a particular company to receive information on "which of the largest pension funds are most likely to hold stock in a target corporation."

Smedley said this program, as well as the AFL-CIO's other pension-related projects, could be important to unions in other countries because of the growth in investments in the United States by foreign investors, including a number of union pension funds.

Canadian unemployment climbs to 12.8 percent

Ottawa—Canada's unemployment rate rose to 12.8 percent in December, the highest since the 1930s. Statistics Canada, a government reporting agency, said nearly 1.5-million workers are looking for jobs.

The mounting unemployment compared with 12.7 percent in November and 8.6 percent a year earlier, the result of an economic recession that began in the summer of 1981.

Jobs program pushed as basis for recovery less and seeking work, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The number is even higher if those who have simply given up the search for a job are counted. Millions more are working only part-time because full-time work is not available.

"The economic outlook is that unemployment will still be as severe a year from now as it is today," Oswald said. "Job opportunities must be made available to unemployed men and women who cannot find jobs in the private sector. This means there must be direct, targeted and adequately funded large-scale public employment programs."

Oswald said the AFL-CIO is urging Congress to enact three major jobs programs: community development supplemental jobs, accelerated public works, and low- and moderate-income housing construction and rehabilitation. These programs would be designed to meet public needs and to provide simultaneously job opportunities for large numbers of today's jobless, he said.

Traditional jobs

Community development supplemental jobs should be a new program that puts people to work in traditional local governmental jobs financed by federal funds, Oswald said. The jobs would be one-year temporary jobs in services traditionally performed by local government but not being performed because of recession-induced budget constraints.

"In every community, there is work to be done that is vital to that community's economic health and public well-being, but which has been neglected," he said. Examples of needed community repair and service activities include security guards for schools and housing projects, increased staff support for adult and juvenile correctional facilities, park and streams cleanup, weatherization of public buildings and low-income homes, patching potholes and other minor road repair.

Accelerated public works could be another effective jobs program, just as it was in previous recessions and the Great Depression, Oswald said.

"America's infrastructure is rapidly deteriorating and seriously holding back economic progress," he said. "Public investments have fallen far behind in providing basic support facilities critical to private-sector jobs, investment and productivity, like roads, bridges, water and sewer systems, transportation and port facilities."

Expanded program needed

The new highway program is just a beginning in addressing the problems of the infrastructure, he said. A new accelerated public works program should be quickly enacted by Congress, he added.

Housing is essential to the anti-recession job-creation effort, Oswald emphasized. Congress needs to expand existing housing programs and enact new programs to both meet the nation's housing needs of low- and moderate-income families and provide jobs for the unemployed.

Oswald stressed that these job-creation programs are only part of the federation's overall program to pull the economy out of the current recession. The program includes an effective monetary policy and an effective trade policy, both of which can make significant contributions to job creation and economic recovery without additional expenditure of public funds, he said.

Oswald was accompanied by Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten and economist Markley Roberts.

IUD coordinated bargaining produces multi-union pacts

A new agreement between three unions and Rockwell International calls for wage increases in the form of a novel combination of cash bonuses and cost of living adjustments.

Using the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s coordinated bargaining program, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers negotiated the new pact for 8,000 workers at six of the company's facilities in Texas, California, Iowa and Toronto.

The unions proposed the bonus system as a counter to the company's claims that it needed wage concessions because it has lost money the last two years.

The 39-month contracts run from Dec. 1, 1982, to Feb. 28, 1986, and were agreed to more than three months earlier than the original expiration dates of Mar. 1, 1983.

Under the new terms, workers each got $500 cash on Dec. 1 and will get another $500 on Dec. 1, 1983, and $250 on Dec. 1, 1984.

The unions agreed to forgo cost of living adjustments until Feb. 1, 1984. But after that, COL adjustments will resume at the rate of one cent for each increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index.

Added benefits

Other contract improvements include an increased second shift premium, improved medical coverage, life insurance for dependents, and full prescription drug coverage.

In another settlement gained through coordinated bargaining, five unions reached agreement on new contracts for 4,900 workers at 13 plants of the American Home Products Corp.

The workers are represented by the Food & Commercial Workers, the Chemical Workers, the Steelworkers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The three-year pacts provide for wage boosts of 7 percent in the first and second years and 5 percent in the third year.

Benefits for retirees were also improved. Workers who retire at age 62 will now receive 91 percent of accrued benefits, up from 85 percent, and workers who retired before 1980 will get a 3-percent increase in benefits for each year of service.

Future retirees' benefits will go up from $15 a month per year of service to $16.50 this year, $17.50 next January and $18.50 in January 1985.

Withdrawal loophole seen undermining social security

A loophole that allowed Los Angeles County to pull its 55,000 employees out of the social security system threatens many workers' retirement hopes and could permanently damage the nation's pension and retirement program, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney charged.

He urged the National Commission on Social Security Reform to call for elimination of the catch in the law that now lets government and non-profit employers withdraw from participation in the program by notifying the Internal Revenue Service and then sitting out a two-year waiting period.

In a letter to Commission Chairman Alan Greenspan, Sweeney pointed out that the present federal law doesn't require these employers to consult with workers or even to notify them of the filing.

Los Angeles County's action, he asserted, is a "textbook study of how employers are able to abuse the current law and the right of workers to a secure retirement."

Record pull-out

The county's withdrawal, which took effect last Dec. 31, is the largest pull-out in the social security system's history.

Sweeney called the move, pressed by the county board of supervisors, a "dramatic demonstration of the seriousness of the withdrawal movement by government and non-profit employers at a time when the system sorely needs their participation and when workers so badly need the security and hope offered by social security."

He urged the commission "at the very least" to recommend that federal law assure workers the right to vote on withdrawal.

The law should also be changed to permit government employers that have left the system to re-enter it, which they can't do now, Sweeney said. He called for mandatory participation in the system by all non-profit employers.

Solutions due soon

The national commission was established by President Reagan in 1981 to study the problems of the social security system and recommend solutions. Its report is due in mid-January.

Sweeney's letter noted that by the end of last September, 487 government employers and 955 non-profit employers were in some stage of the two-year withdrawal process.

If they all drop out, he said, the social security system could be losing as much as $1 billion a year by 1985.

More important, hundreds of thousands of workers, many in low-paying jobs, "could lose their social security benefits without so much as a consultation on the matter," Sweeney warned.

He was sharply critical of the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors who refused throughout the two-year waiting period, that included months of "intense collective bargaining and litigation," to do an actuarial study on the effects of the withdrawal, to let employees vote on it or to provide "an adequate replacement plan."

He called the county's action "particularly callous and precipitous" in light of the commission's pending report to the President and Congress on the entire issue of social security.

"An unfortunate majority of three" on the county board also blocked "an easily obtainable" one-year extension of the waiting period even though a new California law requiring an employee vote on withdrawal was about to take effect in January 1983, Sweeney said.

Action on two fronts

The Service Employees stepped up efforts last fall to use collective bargaining and court action to stop employers from pulling out of social security.

The union won what it called a "partial victory" last November when a federal judge ruled that if the SEIU submitted a list of employers it has agreements with to the IRS, the agency must reveal which have filed notices of intent to drop out of social security. The union had asked for release of the names of all employers that have filed.

Sweeney stressed that the union is actively concerned about the rights of non-union workers in this issue too, since many "stand to lose even more" than most organized workers if the protections of social security are taken away from them.

First-class cake

The Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers' entry in the Rose Bowl parade on New Year's Day was a repeat first-prize winner in its class. The three-tier wedding cake float, co-sponsored by the international and its Southern California Joint Board, was decorated with white chrysanthemums, carnations, gladiola petals and pink roses.

Food banks help the jobless cope

By Susan Dunlop

Many of the nation's millions of unemployed workers are running out of jobless benefits—and out of resources—as the Reagan recession persists. But unions and their members are pitching in to see that laidoff fellow workers—and other needy people in their communities—still have food on their tables.

Food banks and food distribution programs are being organized nationwide with support from national and international unions, local unions, AFL-CIO state and local central labor councils and their community service committees, and other labor groups. Many are working with social service agencies and concerned employers.

The food programs include emergency aid to hard-hit areas, full-time food banks and special holiday food drives that some unions are now expanding to meet a continuing and rising demand.

On the receiving end

Union members have a tradition of strong support for such aid to the needy, but AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter Davis pointed out that the crippled economy has put many workers "on the receiving end rather than the giving end for the first time in their lives."

Some examples of how organized labor is responding to the crisis:

- The Kalamazoo (Mich.) AFL-CIO began a food bank last March for jobless union members and their families. Local unions contribute food goods or cash, and the operation get $1,000 a month from a local charity. Food is purchased from discount brokers.
- The Chicago AFL-CIO is actively involved in the All-Chicago Food Drive that's also supported by the city's churches and social service organizations. Union members are bringing food and cash donations to collection points in local union halls.
- The Auto Workers have been joined by General Motors in a company-wide, eight-week effort to gather and distribute food for unemployed workers and other needy people at 73 GM locations around the country. The company will match cash contributions dollar for dollar and give 50 cents for each can of food donated by the UAW members and other GM employees.

Machinists aid Miners

- An appeal by the Machinists to help jobless workers in Arizona, victims of a depression in the copper mining industry, raised more than $22,000 in two weeks among IAM affiliates in the Southwest. Over 50,000 pounds of food was purchased and distributed with the help of Safeway Stores to four communities. Trucks bringing in the food bore banners that head "The Machinists Union Will Not Permit Reaganomics to Starve Out Our Union Miners—Emergency Food Supplies."
- Steelworkers' local unions are operating food banks at 45 sites in Western Pennsylvania alone. Last month, 90,000 pounds of potatoes and 40,000 pounds of onions donated by growers' associations in Maine and Florida were shared by the banks. The growers said they came forward out of concern for the plight of unemployed Americans in a recession that is hurting both industrial workers and the nation's farmers.
- Thanksgiving packages for the families of 44 laid-off workers were prepared by members of Allied Industrial Workers Local 364 in Milwaukee. Food and cash donations enabled the union to give two bags of groceries and a ham to each family.

Hard times for jobless Auto Workers are eased by food and moral support provided by working union members in New England store-front aid center.

Balloon Busting

THE REAGAN Administration seems to be striving for a new world's record in trial ballooning as it shapes its budget proposals for the next fiscal year.

The President publicly expresses dismay and irritation over "leaks" to the press on the budget deliberations, but almost every noon balloon that lifts off from the White House bears another outrageous plan to shift the burden for the Administration's errors in economic policy onto the backs of those least able to bear it.

Once again, for example, White House officials are floating proposals for tax increases that would bypass the richest beneficiaries of Reagan's policies while tightening the screws on the unemployed and retired, low-income and middle-income wage earners and small businesses.

With unemployment setting new post-Depression records, these proposals are nothing short of immoral. And they can only add to the image of unfairness and heartlessness that reportedly troubles the President.

IF THE Administration truly wants to attack the horrendous federal deficits its policies are causing, it should support the AFL-CIO's call for a $700 ceiling on the third installment in the Reagan income tax cut scheduled for next July. That would provide the full percentage cut for most families with earnings of less than $42,000 a year.

Combining that ceiling with repeal of the ill-conceived tax indexing plan would raise about $5 billion in fiscal 1984 and $25 billion in 1985.

Any scheme to reduce the budget deficits projected for the next few years must be based on equity and not simply on "revenue enhancement" goals.

Furthermore, the Treasury's revenues would be enhanced, indeed, if the Administration would give top priority to closing the many tax loopholes that have encouraged the loss of American jobs and production to other countries and have contributed mightily to the disastrous decline in the nation's position in the world trade markets.

Trial ballooning is a popular sport in Washington every January. Usually, it's harmless enough, but this year there are perils for those who fail to recognize that the prevailing political winds underwent a sharp shift in direction last November.

No Drastic Moves

THE INTERESTING thing about the (Social Security Advisory) Commission is that despite all the horror stories and the quick cures and radical changes that are bruited about in public, none of that is on the minds of anyone there.

First, the problem is manageable with relatively modest steps. Secondly, there is no one on the commission from right to left who suggests such things as converting to a voluntary system or an optional system or any other really drastic changes.

Given the spectrum of people on that commission, their posture represents probably the ultimate acceptance of the permanence of a system of old-age insurance in our society. . . .

People can quarrel about particular ways of doing it, but the range is modest between our proposal and that put forward by the most conservative elements on the commission. . . .

I really don't see any reason why there are not the elements of an ultimate solution coming out of this Congress in reasonably short order. It's not that difficult. The system is not bankrupt. The system is not on the verge of collapse.

The system is, on the whole, quite sound. And there are no knowledgeable players in the game who really want to do anything very drastic.

Reagan policies crunch financially drained cities

By Press Associates, Inc.

The nation's cities are in deep trouble.

They have been caught in a double bind—the Reagan cuts in federal aid on one side and the financial drain of the Reagan Recession on the other.

The deep, prolonged recession has cut in two directions. Jobless workers and bankrupt businesses don't pay taxes.

At the same time, the "new poor" who find themselves without jobs for the first time in their lives and the "working poor" who are no longer working full time because of the recession, need to be helped. That takes money.

But "fiscal stress is widespread and is likely to worsen among cities of all sizes and in all parts of the country," said the National League of Cities in reporting results of a 79-city survey.

Scrambling to close the growing gap between revenues and expenses, cities have resorted to both tax hikes and layoffs.

As for layoffs, "for the first time since World War II," said the league, "cities have cut spending and employment during a recession, thus contributing to the downslide rather than working to counteract or soften it."

More layoffs due

Almost half the cities surveyed reported that they cut their workforces in 1982 and intended to do the same in 1983.

At the same time, cities felt pressured by their financial plight to raise taxes and fees, most of them regressive. The survey showed that 71 percent of them in fiscal 1982 raised or instituted fees for such services as garbage collection, car inspections, and library use.

Despite the layoffs, tax hikes and cutbacks in municipal services, cities still have been unable to fill the gaps left by the big cuts in federal aid which the Reagan Administration pushed through Congress in 1981 and 1982.

Fewer than 10 percent of the cities surveyed by the League felt they were able to make up with local funds the large cuts in community and urban development grants.

Basic needs unmet

The human cost of this financial pinch was revealed in a survey taken last fall by the U.S. Conference of Mayors. The survey found that city agencies cannot meet even 50 percent of the need for food, clothing and shelter by those lining up in numbers unseen since the Great Depression.

The cities and their needy can expect little from the Reagan Administration whose "do-nothing" philosophy has been made clear in word as well as deed.

In the congressionally mandated National Urban Policy Report issued last summer, the Administration said virtually all direct federal aid should be stopped and that the role of the federal government should be limited mainly to that of a clearinghouse for information.

Felix Rohatyn, a New York investment banker and urban expert, said the Reagan urban policy report was telling the cities, in effect, to "drop dead." Detroit Mayor Coleman Young called it a "disposable cities" policy.

Former Rep. Henry Reuss, who chaired the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, said the Administration's report rejected "the notion of liberty and justice for all as a national responsibility" expressed in the Pledge of Allegiance.

The Administration shouldn't be permitted to try to balance its projected $200 billion fiscal 1984 deficit on the backs of the cities and their needy. It's now up to the new 98th Congress to change that course.

Emergency standard

OSHA ordered to cut exposure to toxic gas

ers and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

In January 1982, OSHA said it would re-evaluate the existing ethylene oxide rule, but that it could take two and a half years to complete the review. The court order gives the agency just six months to develop a permanent standard that would lower the exposure limit.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee called the court decision a "victory for working Americans." He said Judge Parker "recognizes the seriousness of this problem, but it's too bad it has taken court action to force OSHA to reduce the exposure level for ethylene oxide."

The chemical is used as a sterilant in hospitals, as well as a fumigant, pesticide and in the production of antifreeze, polyester fibers and other industrial applications. It ranks in volume among the top 25 chemicals produced in the United States.

Permanent rule needed

McEntee added, "We trust that within the six-month period allotted by the court, OSHA will come up with a permanent standard that protects hospital employees from the health risks posed by exposure to ethylene oxide."

George H. R. Taylor, director of AFL-CIO's Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, said the decision verifies labor's charges that "under the Reagan Administration OSHA must be forced to do its duty to set standards to protect workers against grave dangers."

OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter issued a one-sentence response to the court action, saying, "It appears the court is trying to set our regulatory agenda for us."

Taylor charged that any attempt by OSHA to appeal the decision will show that the agency "still has no intention to protect workers exposed to toxic substances."

OSHA subsequently announced the agency will appeal the decision and is seeking to stay the order, pending its appeal.

Encouraging sign

Taylor noted the decision offers encouragement for emergency and permanent regulations on formaldehyde and ethylene dibromide, two other carcinogens for which OSHA has refused to issue emergency standards.

The ruling said OSHA's decision not to issue a standard was "a clear error of judgment. Despite the overwhelming administrative record favoring issuance of an emergency temporary standard, OSHA had embarked on the least responsive course short of inaction."

The dangers of the current 50 ppm standard have been recognized by industry and hospitals for some time, safety experts reported. Many hospitals have voluntarily reduced their exposure levels to about 10 ppm. OSHA cited this as a reason not to issue the emergency standards.

Judge Parker called this contention "suspect," noting, "such actions do nothing to protect those workers who are still exposed to ethylene oxide at hazardous levels or those employed at institutions which may at any time elect to withdraw the voluntary restrictions."

'You're Off Limits!'

New organization to press air traffic controllers' case

A new organization has been formed to represent the interests of professional air traffic controllers fired by President Reagan in 1981 and to work for the improvement of the federal air traffic control system.

The United States Air Traffic Controllers Organization (USATCO) fills a void created by the dissolution of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers and the liquidation of PATCO's assets under the bankruptcy laws.

USATCO President Gary Eads said in a letter sent to AFL-CIO central bodies that PATCO's debts piled up because of government fines and airline damage suits that followed the August 1981 walkout.

Eads, who had been president of PATCO, noted that Reagan had fired more than 11,500 controllers to break the strike.

The new organization, he said, was formed by former PATCO officers and a group of dismissed controllers and is supported primarily by contributions from fired controllers and some working controllers. Several unions and state and local labor organizations have also helped out.

USATCO wants to see reinstatement of the dismissed controllers and has formed a legal defense fund for them, but Eads explained that the organization is also helping others find new jobs.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in a cover letter accompanying Eads' report urged local central bodies to provide USATCO with information on apprenticeship or training programs "that might provide employment opportunities for dismissed controllers."

According to Eads, about 75 percent of the fired controllers have found other jobs, although many are working only part time. Some have entered college or vocational training for new skills, and about 25 percent have decided not to return to air traffic control jobs even if given the opportunity.

Board rejects appeals

He said that about 10,900 of the dismissed controllers have appealed their firings to the federal Merit System Protection Board, but the majority of the appeals at the board's regional level have been turned down. The next step is an appeal to the full board and if that fails, to the U.S. Court of Appeals.

USATCO's legal defense fund was set up "primarily to assist individual members who were assessed fines as a result of the PATCO strike or for those who need money to appeal their 'criminal' convictions," Eads said.

He said contributions to the fund can be made to USATCO headquarters at 210 7th St. S.E., Suite C-26, Washington, D.C. 20003.

Unemployment at 10.8% and rising accurate measure of the failure of the Reagan program," Kirkland said.

BLS does not count discouraged workers in calculating the jobless rate. Nor does it figure in the number of workers who are employed part time because they are unable to find full-time employment. There were 6,425,000 in this category last month.

If all the discouraged workers and one-half the workers employed part time because of the depressed economy were added to the official number of unemployed, the number of jobless Americans last month would have totaled approximately 17.3 million and the unemployment rate would have been 15.3 percent.

"These new unemployment figures are further proof that the national economy is still wallowing in the recession brought on by the Administration's discredited policy experiments," Kirkland said.

Rate up over 2 percent

December's 10.8-percent jobless rate compares to a rate of 8.6 percent a year earlier and 7.3 percent in December 1980 just one month prior to President Reagan's inauguration. Unemployment for the entire year of 1982 averaged 9.7 percent, the highest since 9.9 percent in 1941.

The disastrous economic performance in recent months contrasts sharply with Administration projections. Joblessness averaged 10.7 percent in the last three months of 1982. Yet, earlier in the year, the Administration forecast a year-end unemployment rate of 8.4 percent.

Unemployment has particularly hit hard adult males, the traditional family breadwinners, with their jobless rate soaring from 6.1 percent two years ago to 10.1 percent in December. Joblessness among women also has worsened substantially, rising from 6.7 percent in December 1980 to a record 9.2 percent last month.

Black Americans are suffering a 20.8-percent rate of unemployment, whites 9.7 percent, and Hispanics 15.3 percent. The jobless rate for blue-collar workers last month was 16.3 percent, compared to 5.6 percent for white-collar workers. For teenagers, the unemployment rate in December edged up three-tenths of 1 percent to 24.5 percent. Black teenagers had an unemployment rate of 49.5 percent.

Total employment fell by 43,000 to 99,093,000 last month. Since the beginning of the Reagan Recession in July 1981, employment has dropped by 1.7 million.

The civilian labor force in December totaled 111.1 million. Since December 1981, the labor force has risen by 1.9 million, with adult women accounting for about 1.3 million.

A particularly ominous sign of the deteriorating economy showed up in BLS figures on duration of unemployment. The average length of joblessness last month stretched to 18 weeks, a post-World War II record.

Non-farm payroll employment fell by 165,000 to 88.5 million in December. Job declines continued in primary metals, machinery and electrical equipment, but employment in transportation equipment, which has especially suffered from the recession, rose by 30,000 over the month.

Construction employment fell by about 30,000 jobs despite a recent increase in activity in the housing industry. BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood said the decline might have reflected a reduction in commercial building and wet weather in some states.

In the service-producing sector, retail sales employment was less than expected, reflecting a generally disappointing Christmas buying season. After seasonal adjustment, the number of jobs in retail trade last month was down by about 65,000.

17.6 percent in Michigan

Michigan, hard-hit by auto assembly line cutbacks, continued to have the highest unemployment rate of any state last month, 17.6 percent. Ohio had a 14.5-percent rate; Pennsylvania, 12.9 percent, and Illinois, 12.8 percent.

At the same time that unemployment is crippling the economy, fewer jobless workers relative to the total number of unemployed are receiving unemployment compensation, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research observed.

The percentage of jobless workers receiving compensation is lower than during previous postwar recessions, BLS noted. In early December, approximately 5.6 million Americans were receiving unemployment insurance benefits. This number represented 47 percent of the total number of persons unemployed.

By contrast, during the months of greatest unemployment in the previous worst postwar recession, 1973-75, the percentage of workers receiving benefits ranged above 60 percent and reached 76 percent in February 1975.

Non-profit postal rates edge up

Postal rates for non-profit mailers, including unions and their publications increased Jan. 9, but less than what they would have under a Reagan Administration proposal:

The lame-duck Congress voted to include some $789 million in the continuing budget resolution to allow the U.S. Postal Service to maintain a lower rate schedule for non-profit mailers.

After Congress acted, the USPS board of governors announced second- and third-class non-profit rates would only go up one step of the phased rate increase system and would remain at that level through Sept. 30, 1983, the end of the fiscal year.

A year-long effort was waged on Capitol Hill by the AFL-CIO, the International Labor Press Association and other non-profit organizations against the Administration's proposal that would have gutted the subsidy to the postal service and resulted in an immediate doubling of current non-profit rates.

IUE wins rerun vote at South Carolina plant

Blackville, S.C.—Workers at Ducane Heating have voted 199-151 to join the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a rerun of a 1979 election that was disallowed by the National Labor Relations Board because of the company's labor law violations.

The NLRB, upholding IUE's charges against the company, ruled that Ducane Heating's threats and intimidation of workers during the 1979 campaign had created a climate of fear which prevented a fair election.

IUE President William H. Bywater termed the election outcome "a very significant victory. Despite the fear spread by the company and so-called community leaders, the workers at Ducane withstood the pressure and voted for the union."

Social security funding plan set

First-hand report

Members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Committee on Social Security are briefed on the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. The first-hand report comes from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a member of the commission. He is flanked by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin, chairman of the committee, and at right, Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Panel bars radical change in basic benefit structure

By David L. Perlman

A bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform told Congress that the financial problems of the social security system can and should be met without breaking faith with America's workers and retirees.

The commission, whose members ranged the political spectrum, reached a 12-3 consensus on a package of recommendations that would meet all foreseeable funding needs for the near future and erase most of a projected long-term deficit.

Its members were unanimous in turning down proposals for such drastic changes as making social security participation voluntary, imposing a needs test for benefits, or tilting sharply the other way by linking the level of benefits more rigidly to payroll contributions made during a working career.

"Congress, in its deliberations on financing proposals, should not alter the fundamental structure of the social security program or undermine its fundamental principles," the commission insisted.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, one of five commission members designated by Democratic congressional leaders, joined in the consensus report. He took exception to one recommendation that would bring future federal employees under social security, and suggested an alternative that would more than match the funding that would be lost.

Broad agreement

What was notable in the commission's report was the ability of such a diverse group of public figures to end up in near accord on a politically charged, controversial issue.

Ten of the commission members had been chosen by President Reagan or by the Senate or House Republican leaders. Alan Greenspan, chairman of the commission, had been head of the President's Council on Economic Advisers during the Ford Administration.

Despite the commission's conservative tilt, the three dissenters from the consensus were all from the political right — Sen. William Armstrong (R-Colo.), Rep. Bill Archer (R-Tex.) and Joe D. Waggonner, a Reagan appointee who had headed the Democratic wing of the House conservative coalition when he was a congressman from Louisiana in the 1970s.

The consensus recommendations were supported by the commission members most closely allied to the labor-supported campaign to stave off social security cutbacks sought by the Reagan Administration. Among them were Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), a revered figure among older Americans, and Robert M. Ball, who headed the Social Security Administration for more than a decade and helped set up the Save Our Security coalition.

But the signers also included such GOP stalwarts as Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (Kan.) and Rep. Barber B. Conable (N.Y.), who is the ranking Republican on the House Ways & Means Committee. These are the two key committees that will deal with legislation stemming from the commission report.

Both House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., and President Reagan endorsed the panel's recommendations. But despite this broad support, the final form of the legis-

New House committees reflect Democratic gains

Democratic gains in the House have been translated in the first weeks of the new Congress into changed committee lineups that are expected to diminish the influence of the conservative coalition in the shaping of legislation.

In the Senate, the election standoff left the slim Republican majorities on most committees unchanged but brought in some new faces.

The only major committee chairmanship that changed hands resulted from the retirement from Congress of Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), long-time chairman of the House Rules Committee. Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) gave up his chairmanship of the Select Committee on Aging to claim the Rules Committee post, making clear his intent to use it as a power base to stave off any weakening of the social security system. The committee determines procedures for the House to act on bills cleared by the legislative committees.

Its only new member is Democrat Alan Wheat, newly elected from Bolling's former Kansas City district.

The powerful Budget Committee will have 20 Democrats and 11 Republicans—on the surface little changed from the 18-12 ratio of the previous Congress. But the Democratic majority will no longer be diluted by the inclusion of Reagan supporter Phil Gramm of Texas. After he was denied reappointment by the Democratic caucus, Gramm resigned from Congress and is seeking re-election as a Republican. If he wins in the Feb. 12 special election or in a later runoff, he will get back on the committee in a spot the Republicans are holding open for him.

Meanwhile, Democrats filled eight Budget Committee vacancies with Butler Derrick (S.C.), George Miller (Calif.), William H. Gray III (Pa.), Pat Williams (Mont.), Geraldine A. Ferraro (N.Y.), Howard Wolpe (Mich.), Martin Frost (Tex.) and Vic Fazio (Calif.). As a group, they are clearly in the Democratic mainstream.

Republicans named as new members two hard-core conservatives, Tom Loeffler (Tex.) and Bill Gradison (Ohio) and a first-termer from Florida, Connie Mack III, a banker with name recognition as the grandson of the legendary manager of the Philadelphia Athletics baseball team.

Unemployment continues rising throughout U.S.

Unemployment increased in every state except Maine between November 1981 and November 1982 when the national jobless rate was still an unadjusted 10.4 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. In December, the national jobless rate climbed to 10.8 percent after seasonal adjustments.

In November, jobless rates exceeded the unadjusted national rate in 91 of 221 metropolitan areas, the bureau said. Flint, Mich., led the nation's cities with a jobless rate of 23.4 percent—more than double the national rate. The Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, area had the second highest rate, 22.5 percent, and Rockford, Ill., was third with 21.4 percent.

Eighteen states and the District of Columbia had jobless rates at or above the national rate in November, BLS said. The highest jobless rates were in Michigan and West Virginia, both at 16.4 percent, and in Alabama, 15.3 percent.

For the most part, BLS said, the high rates in all three states resulted from sharp cutbacks in factory employment. West

GNP drop shows slump worsening

By James M. Shevis

A sharp drop in economic output in the final quarter of 1982—a decline of 2.5 percent at an annual rate—is just one more sign of the length and depth of the Reagan Recession, the AFL-CIO declared.

"Millions of unemployed workers are not producing goods and, without work-related income, cannot afford to buy the goods that the economy could produce," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald stressed.

He said the October-December decline in "real" gross national product clearly belied the claims of those in the Administration who had forecast recovery, and called for an immediate switch to an economic policy that emphasizes jobs.

The fourth-quarter drop in real GNP, the value of the nation's total output of goods and services adjusted for the impact of inflation, was deeper than expected. Government economists last month projected the decline over the quarter would be at an annual rate of 2.2 percent.

Over-the-year slump

For all of 1982, the Commerce Dept. reported, real GNP declined 1.8 percent —more than four times the four-tenths of 1 percent decline during the 1980 recession. In 1981, the economy grew by 1.9 percent.

Despite the continuing economic slide, further evidenced in a series of other government reports, the White House insisted that recovery from the 18-month recession was under way.

"We fully expect the GNP will show steady improvement in the coming year," White House Deputy Press Sec. Larry Speakes said. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige told a news conference, "Recovery is beginning this quarter and, while it will be moderate, it will come without further increases in the rate of inflation."

At the consumer level, inflation hovered at about 5 percent last year. At the wholesale level, prices rose only 3.5 percent for all of 1982. But the lingering recession, which has driven the nation's unemployment rate to 10.8 percent, the highest since 1940, has created a situation in which Americans are unable to buy the goods and services they need. With demand off, prices have fallen.

Whatever the new year brings, the government figures on economic growth cap-

Excerpts from interview:

Kirkland reviews tasks facing labor

The following is excerpted from an interview with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland by Meryl Gordon of USA Today on Jan. 17, 1983.

GORDON: On the federal budget, some of the supply-siders say that Reagan's forecast is too pessimistic. I'm curious as to what you felt about that and also what you think of the idea of a surtax.

KIRKLAND: Taking your last question first, last year in our alternative budget proposal that we adopted in our February council meeting following the President's second-year budget, we called for a surtax geared to the increase in the defense budget as a means of expressing our convictions. We said that if there has to be a buildup in the national defense system, everybody ought to pay for it in proportion to their ability and in proportion to the degree to which they've benefitted from a free and democratic society. The entire burden shouldn't be borne by the poor, the underprivileged and the dispossessed, who have been up to now the main victims of the Reagan program because you have had simultaneously an enormous buildup in defense expenditures with the drastic cuts in the social support programs. An irresponsible tax cut was focused primarily on those with higher incomes. You have a situation where the entire burden of the defense buildup is borne by the weakest and most underprivileged segments of our society, while the rich are not only exempted from the cost of that but given an extraordinary degree of tax relief. So I'm saying if they're going to build up defenses for the protection of rights and values of our society, those who have enjoyed those rights and values to the fullest ought to pay their share of that load. And the surtax device, for that purpose, seemed to us the logical expression of that principle.

GORDON: Do you think that the change in the elections, with more Democrats in the House, will make a bigger difference in getting the kind of programs that you want?

KIRKLAND: I don't think that there's been a marked shift in the political makeup of the Senate. Perhaps philosophically we have one vote more liberal, but there is a conservative majority there clearly. On the House side, I think there is a good opportunity for the enactment of some of these measures and they would then, I suppose, be compromised down with the Senate. I do believe that there is a greater possibility now than there was prior to the elections. I think that the next election always hangs heavily in the wings, and that may affect the point of view of those members in the Senate who have to face 1984. The climate and the mood are somewhat different. The Congress is no longer in a rubber-stamp mood. I believe that moderate elements in the Senate may take some initiatives. And economic conditions will weigh heavily on the trend of events. I don't see them getting better.

GORDON: Do you think the Administration's economic forecast is correct?

KIRKLAND: I don't forecast. It's anybody's guess. Their track record isn't too good. The track record is that they've been excessively optimistic, so they may be excessively optimistic when they're being pessimistic. I don't think you need to scratch around much with possibilities of future figures to be deeply concerned about the way things are right now. And the way things are right now is so serious as to call for action and not to delay and procrastinate in the hope that something will turn up. Heavy unemployment does not lead to recovery; it leads to further unemployment.

We live in a very harsh social and political environment compared to other industrial democracies. In most other western countries, people who are unemployed continue to have their health needs provided for. They don't face the danger of eviction from their homes, and their benefits continue indefinitely. Our system is really very harsh. We have the lowest proportion of public expenditures allocated to social insurance programs of any western democracy. We are the only country where people face the prospect of losing their unemployment benefits after 26 weeks. When they lose their jobs, they lose their health protection. They can't take their kids to a doctor. They face the loss of their homes and all of their possessions. And that fact means that the longer unemployment continues, it doesn't just stay at sort of stable value, it tends to further shrink the market.

GORDON: How much higher are you expecting it to go?

KIRKLAND: I would assume it would go over 11 percent at some point this year. If our growth doesn't exceed 3 percent then we'll have higher, slowly growing unemployment. And it will wash over into areas that hitherto have been relatively spared: white collar employment, service employment, state and local employment. Clearly the states are very hard-pressed now. Their budget difficulties are just as great as the federal budget. And there's enormous pressure on state and local expenditures, and that's going to be passed on in the form of layoffs.

GORDON: I understood that Marty Feldstein (chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers) was trying to look at a variety of youth initiatives, one of which is the subminimum wage. . . .

KIRKLAND: That's a hardy perennial among classical economists. I always ask the question: If minimum wage is a barrier to employment, why was there so much unemployment in the middle of the depression when we didn't have a minimum wage?

GORDON: Is it worth trying—at least as an experiment?

KIRKLAND: It has been experimented with. There is a student exemption. And there have been experiments in various places. And there has been absolutely no showing that it has any benign effect on unemployment. And the fact is, even by the classical economists' own theoretical models, economic events are significant only in real terms. That is, money wages are not meaningful, it's the real wage that has the effect, and for some years real wages have been dropping.

The minimum wage is being cut every day, in real terms, simultaneously with rapidly rising unemployment. They have cut the minimum wage by not increasing it to keep pace with inflation, which means you have a subminimum wage in real terms today, and simultaneously you have increasing youth unemployment and increasing adult unemployment. So I would suggest that that's a pretty good laboratory test.

GORDON: There's been a lot of talk about the post-industrial society. Is it happening? Are you going to get back those jobs that you've lost?

KIRKLAND: Certainly, it's happening. I have set up a committee of the Executive Council to do a long-range study on these trends, the Committee on the Evolution of Work in this country. We're having a conference in the spring with a group of scientists—physical scientists and social scientists—to try to really see where it's leading.

Some years ago the number of workers in the white-collar category began to exceed the number of blue-collar workers. For a good long while, the only two areas of the economy that have been growing in terms of unemployment have been this broad category of services, which has heavy white-collar components, and state and local employment. Private manufacturing, rail transportation, mining, utilities—the relative proportion of workers employed in those industries has been declining for years. And the only areas of expansion that have provided new jobs that the people require have been services in state and local employment, education, medical services, and those fields.

GORDON: Are we going to reach the point where the person who drops out of high school without an educational background can't get a good job paying a good salary? Are we going to reach a point when those opportunities to really lift yourself out from poverty just by the strength in your arms or legs will be gone?

KIRKLAND: Relatively speaking, I think so. There will still be many of those jobs, but relatively more and more areas of expanding employment will require training and skills and education. I think that makes it all the more reckless to put into place policies that depreciate opportunities for education.

GORDON: You mean cutting back on student loans?

KIRKLAND: Yes. We had achieved what I think was a very constructive revolution in the life of the country in the years after World War II. Student loan programs, the GI bill and other educational assistance had created a circumstance whereby any reasonably ambitious young person could get as much education as they could use, and it's a tragedy to see that dismantled.

GORDON: Not everyone could be trained for computers. Not everybody has the skills, and we may not need that many computers. I'm wondering whether you see an entire generation of workers getting wiped out?

KIRKLAND: I see an entire generation of workers that will raise serious problems for the nation's conscience, for the humaneness of our system. I think it's a fraud to talk about solving the problem solely by training people for high tech employment. We should train people for high tech employment, but you can't put that forward as the answer to the problem of workers displaced by plant closure—let's say of a shoe factory in some small town or any area of relatively low-wage employment that's already been shrunken and has long since ceased to have substantial numbers of younger people in the workforce and where the bulk of the remaining are heavily middle-aged, minorities, women, who have not had the educational opportunities that the more fortunate have had. And I think a special effort has to be made to address that problem.

GORDON: What can you do if they aren't all ready for computer training?

KIRKLAND: The country has vast needs that we're ignoring. We've been living off our capital for years. To run a humane and a civilized city, where people can live in safety, is an inherently labor-intensive occupation and circumstance. . . . If we did the things that ought to be done in those cities, there would be jobs created that would be available to people who don't have college degrees.

GORDON. Meanwhile, what do you say to the 50-year-old who has been laid off at the shoe factory?

KIRKLAND: What do I say to 12 million unemployed today? That the best hope is to get a change in national policy. Support those measures and those candidates who offer some constructive alternatives. I think the role of the public initiatives, public programs and public investments is going to be crucial in the years ahead in defining what opportunities exist for all categories of working people.

GORDON: In connection with those manufacturing jobs disappearing, do you think the AFL-CIO will be steadily declining in size?

KIRKLAND: No, I don't think so. We adapt and respond. We have been in that process for quite sometime. If you look at our membership rosters, you will find that we have a group of affiliated organizations that have been growing even during the recession periods, and that growth reflects what's happening in the workforce. It tends to lag a little bit behind these changes, that's inevitable, but they're clearly responding and they're clearly catching up.

We've had organizing breakthroughs in these new areas. Our civil service, state, local and federal organizations have grown dramatically in the post-war period. When we came out of the war, the State, County & Municipal Employees, for example, was perhaps around 100,000. Today it's over 1 million. And that's a considerable breakthrough. It was a relatively poorly organized sector of the workforce, and the same was true of federal unions. Today, one of the largest affiliates is the Food & Commercial Workers Union, and it's still growing. We've suffered some membership losses because of the heavy layoffs in auto, steel and other industries—that's cyclical. If we have a recovery, I'm sure we'll regain those members. But we are growing in those growth areas.

I am always reminded, that at the time the federation was organized in 1881, most of the unions of those early years no longer exist. There was a national union of Horse Collar & Harness Makers, also one of Umbrella & Walking Stick Makers.

GORDON: Do you welcome in some ways the shift from manufacturing to service, in that some of those manufacturing jobs are back-breaking, health-ruining, painful?

KIRKLAND: Well, I believe a job is better than unemployment. I don't welcome it if it means that we lose our industrial base, a balanced economy.

GORDON: I wonder if on foreign trade, you're worried about starting a wave of protectionism. What do you think the U.S. should do at this stage and time?

KIRKLAND: I think we ought to pay serious attention. I believe that the content bill, of course, will be back. I think it will have a great deal of support. I think there will be other legislation focused on the concept that reciprocity should have some teeth in it. I believe that there would by widespread acceptance and support for the proposition that we ought to play by the same ground rules as our competitors and negotiate from that basis.

GORDON: In the presidential endorsement process the AFL-CIO is undertaking, what happens if you support somebody in December who just is a disaster, a wipeout in say three primaries? What does that do to you and your position in the election?

KIRKLAND: Well, I don't entertain the illusion that the mere support by labor is sufficient to ensure victory for any candidate. The candidate still must have those qualities that attract the public at large as well as the working people.

We're trying to get a role in this political process, an effective role which I think is our responsibility. But that doesn't include any illusions that we're going to dominate the process. We want to be in the chorus of voices that produce the harmony of a democratic society. And if we're not in it, I think our society will suffer because other elements in our society—less public spirited and less concerned about problems of plain people—will dominate the process. I don't think that's good for the country.

When you enter political life there are never any assurances of anything. We have a history; we've won and we've lost. Winning is better, but we're never finally defeated as long as we're standing. And if the candidate that we support does not emerge as the candidate of the party after the conventions, I'm reasonably certain that whoever does emerge will be around to see us seeking our support.

GORDON: Do you see this period as kind of a holding action for you? The labor movement isn't making great strides, are you just trying to keep it from getting much worse?

KIRKLAND: No, I don't think so. The labor movement in this country is not wholly dependent upon the political climate alone. We are pursuing a great many activities quite vigorously, and we have all sorts of areas of interest that continue regardless of what the political climate is. The economic situation poses great problems, but it also imposes big responsibilities both in trying organized means of helping unemployed people in their community through our community service activities and in pressing and developing policies and programs to correct it. So we are in no sense in a holding period. We'll try to improve our effectiveness in a lot of areas, and in one—political—I think we have. We are continuing to pay a lot of attention to organizing, and we developed some new programs in public affairs, the use of the telecommunications medium, and other things.

Community services conference explores broader aid to jobless

By Susan Dunlop

Organized labor's efforts to help reduce the hardship and suffering of the nation's 12 million jobless workers were the focal point of the AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

Director Walter G. Davis of the federation's Dept. of Community Services told the 150 participants at the two-day meeting in Washington that unemployment, now at post-war record highs, is also escalating "tragic human problems."

Davis reported that organized labor's traditional commitment to "the human contract" that begins "beyond the plant gate" has spurred international and local unions to intensify their community services activities to respond to the problems of jobless workers and their families.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in a luncheon address to the conference participants, stressed that what America needs "more than anything else right now is jobs."

Praises staff

Donahue praised the work of the community services staff and the "tens of thousands" of local union volunteers whose efforts get "very little media attention or public appreciation."

No one "who stands where you stand and sees what you see and deals with the baffled and helpless people you deal with" could believe that these people don't want to work or that "this economic chaos is the inevitable product of too much social concern" or that "large-scale impoverishment and dispossession is the recipe for universal prosperity," Donahue declared.

He charged that those ideas—put forth by the Reagan Administration—are "delusions" of "people whose perceptions begin and end with the numbers on balance sheets."

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who is a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, told the participants that "union members, our members" have become "the new poor" as victims of the Reagan Recession. She accused the Administration of turning its back on the poor "at this time of greatest need" among people who have "always been willing and able to take any kind of available job."

Alan Kistler, director of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services, called the unemployment picture " a crisis of monumental proportions and in fact a national disaster."

Help for the needy

The labor movement is strengthening its community services activities, Kistler noted, out of an obligation to help jobless workers who have contributed all their working lives, only "to be tossed on scrap heaps we thought had been eliminated 50 years ago."

Rudy Oswald, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research, reminded the conference that the nation's "number one problem is jobs, not inflation."

Oswald warned the participants that their job of "binding the wounds of the unemployed" will not get easier soon, since unemployment rates are likely to stay above 10.5 percent this year with little relief in sight.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman pointed out that some 20 million Americans have lost the protection of health care coverage as one result of the high level of unemployment. Meanwhile, Seidman noted, the Reagan Administration's budget cuts have slashed funds for public hospitals and for programs like food stamps. And many unemployed workers, he said, find they are not eligible for services like welfare, because their assets, such as their homes, are too high to permit them to qualify.

Model programs

Other highlights of the conference included panel discussions on model programs to aid displaced workers, the role of state labor councils in community services activities, the structure and function of AFL-CIO local labor liaison activities, the problems of health care for the unemployed and a review of other employee assistance programs.

Among other featured speakers at the meeting were Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and AFL-CIO Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and chairman of the federation's community services committee.

Parts of the conference were televised live by the C-Span, a non-profit cable television public affairs network.

Flexible bargaining policy drafted for 1983 steel talks

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers' wage policy committee drafted a two-tiered bargaining approach for contract negotiations over the next 14 months that will vary according to the degree of distress or profitability of a particular industry.

USWA President Lloyd McBride said the panel, representing Steelworkers districts across the United States and Canada, "recognizes that we have many of our employers in financial difficulties. Our bargaining with those employers has to be done with that fact in mind."

The 173-member committee did not adopt specific proposals, but its broadly worded statement of goals will shape talks on new agreements for some 500,000 USWA members in the steel, aluminum, copper, and container industries.

The union's current three-year basic steel agreements covering some 360,000 workers at eight major companies expire Aug. 1. The firms, which bargain as a unit with the USWA, are U.S. Steel, Bethlehem, National Steel Corp., Jones & Laughlin, Republic Steel, Armco, Inland Steel, and Allegheny-Ludlum.

Contracts in the aluminum industry will expire May 31, and with a majority of the copper companies on June 30. The union's agreements in the container industry will expire in February 1984.

In previous years, the basic steel settlements set the pattern for the other industries since the parties reached agreement early under the provisions of an Experimental Negotiating Agreement, which guaranteed minimum economic gains in return for a no-strike pledge. This year, ENA no longer is in effect and the parties have failed twice in the past six months to reach an early settlement.

Talks next month

McBride said that the union and the eight-member employer group will return to the bargaining table again next month to try to reach an early agreement. The steelmakers, mired in their worst slump in half a century with mills running at less than 40 percent of capacity, are seeking wage concessions from the union.

"Usually, we're on the asking end, not the giving end, in contract negotiations," McBride said. "But the employers are coming to us and saying, 'Hey, if we're going to survive we need something from you this time.' Well, we want them to survive. If they don't survive, we won't have jobs."

Some 160,000 workers in basic steel already have lost their jobs since the industry went into its slide.

Before bargaining resumes with the major steel firms, the USWA's Basic Steel Industry Conference composed of more than 600 local leaders will meet Feb. 2 to consider the wage policy committee's general bargaining goals. Local leaders in aluminum and copper also are expected to meet in February.

Ratification method

The union also announced a change in its method of contract ratification. Rather than having all local union presidents within a given industry to vote on an agreement, only local presidents at companies covered by a settlement will vote on future pacts.

The change in the method of contract ratification is expected to reduce the number eligible to vote on basic steel pacts by more than half.

Meanwhile, the union has signed a new 42-month agreement with Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., calling for wage concessions in exchange for future employee profit-sharing. The agreement, overwhelmingly approved by the company's 10,000 union workers, also pledges the troubled steel firm not to close any of its plants while the pact is in effect. Wheeling-Pittsburgh bargains separately from the Big Eight.

ped a depressing 1982 in which sluggish sales and high interest rates caused businesses to cut production and lay off millions of workers. Twelve million Americans are out of work by the government's count, and another 5 million have either given up looking for work or are working part-time because full-time work is not available.

Last year's 1.8-percent decline in real GNP was the biggest drop since a 14.7-percent plunge in 1946, when the nation's industries were winding down from World War II.

The government attributed much of the October-December decline in economic output to a drop in exports and to a reduction in inventories in the face of discouraging sales. Rather than producing new goods, many businesses concentrated on selling off burdensome inventory stockpiles.

More bad news

Other government reports on the health of the economy were less than encouraging. The Federal Reserve Board said that industrial production fell again in December, and that the nation's factories operated at a seasonally adjusted 67.3-percent of capacity during the month. The Commerce Dept. reported that housing starts fell 13 percent in December and for all of 1982 were at their lowest level since 1946 while personal income last year rose just 6.4-percent, the slowest pace since 1963. Income from wages and salaries increased just 4.4-percent last year, less than half of the 10.8-percent gain in 1981.

New claims for unemployment benefits rose for the second straight week to 568,000 in the week ended Jan. 8, an increase of 18,000 over the previous week, the Labor Dept. reported. Initial claims are often regarded by analysts as a barometer of the overall job market, and could mean the nation's 10.8 percent jobless rate is on the rise.

Retail sales dropped four-tenths of 1-percent in December from the same period in 1981, and were up only 3-percent for the year as a whole. Consumer installment debt jumped by $2.52 billion in November, the biggest rise in more than a year. The bulk of the increase was accounted for by new automobile loans, the government said.

Meanwhile, a Commerce Dept. survey showed that American business executives for the second year in a row are planning to reduce spending for expansion and modernization. The reduction, adjusted for inflation, would be a sharp 5.2-percent from the 1982 level, the department said.

Economists in and out of government have been predicting that plant and equipment expenditures will not rise until a recovery is well under way. The 5.2-percent estimated decline in 1983 capital investment was a sharper drop than most analysts had forecast.

The 1982 decline in capital investment, the first since the 1973-75 recession, was estimated at 4.8-percent. A previous Commerce Dept. survey of businessmen's spending plans, taken in late October and early November, showed estimated declines of four-tenths of 1-percent in the current quarter and two-tenths of 1-percent in the second quarter of 1983, allowing for inflation. The latest survey, which did not give quarterly estimates, indicated that businessmen had decided on further capital investment cutbacks just since last fall.

The drop in factory production last month was only one-tenth of 1-percent, but for all of 1982 industrial output was down 8.2-percent, the largest decline since an 8.9-percent drop in recession-year 1975. The auto industry, defense suppliers, and aerospace manufacturers all improved in December but could not offset cutbacks in other sectors. Factory production now has fallen in 15 of the last 17 months.

Despite the improvement in the auto industry, factory capacity utilization sank to a rate of 69.8 percent in 1982, the lowest annual rate in the more than three decades that such statistics have been kept.

Pension report rejects radical change

lation will be shaped after a congressional scrutiny that will give groups with particular concerns an opportunity to influence the ultimate product.

Details of the commission recommendations are in a separate article on this page. But the thrust is to deal with the funding shortage primarily by raising revenues rather than reducing benefits.

In some areas, such as a one-time income-tax credit to offset a speedup in a scheduled higher payroll tax, workers are partly shielded from extra costs. But other changes, including a deferment in the next cost-of-living adjustment, carry a price tag for beneficiaries.

Among the more controversial proposals are those dealing with groups that are not now automatically and permanently covered by social security.

One such group is made up of federal and postal employees, who now pay 7 percent of their salaries into the Civil Service Retirement System and also pay the Medicare portion of the social security payroll tax.

Expanded coverage

The commission majority proposed bringing future federal and postal employees into the social security system. But the commission report did not spell out any plan for supplemental federal pension benefits for the new employees nor did it address the issue of continued funding for the existing civil service plan.

Kirkland said in an interview that he didn't think federal workers "should be asked to buy a pig in the poke." They should have the chance to "negotiate the terms" of their retirement coverage.

He noted in his supplementary statement that discussions are being held to seek a solution "which will strengthen and reinforce both the social security system and the civil service retirement system." Congress should not act in this area in the absence of such an agreement, Kirkland urged.

Revenue source

"As a substitute source of revenue and as a meritorious proposal in its own right," Kirkland proposed requiring employers to pay the social security tax on their total payroll—not just on the portion of a worker's pay that is now subject to the tax. That step alone, he said, would add more than $41 billion in revenues through 1990, more than double the estimated gain from the federal employee coverage proposal.

The commission concluded that mandatory coverage of state and local government employees could not be achieved because of constitutional issues.

At present, state and local agencies can bring their employees under social security if they wish to do so—and if the employees concur by majority vote. But they are allowed to withdraw from the system unilaterally—without even advance notification to workers—after giving a two-year notice of intent to withdraw. Over union protests in most cases, many state and local employers have been pulling out of the social security system to avoid paying the employer share of the payroll tax.

The consensus recommendation was to require that a public agency remain in the social security system once it and its employees have chosen to join it. Kirkland expressed support for ending the withdrawal loophole. He also urged a new provision that would allow workers or their unions in public agencies that have withdrawn from social security coverage to initiate action to rejoin the system.

Under present law, social security coverage is optional for non-profit organizations. The commission recommended, with Kirkland's endorsement, mandatory social security coverage for employees of all non-profit organizations. About 85 percent are already covered.

The commission held its first meeting last Feb. 27, but initial progress was slow. It was seen initially as a face-saving device for President Reagan, whose 1981 proposals to slash social security benefits touched off a firestorm of public outrage.

A political issue

There was general agreement that serious negotiating on such a politically charged issue would have to wait until after the November elections, and there was skepticism from all sides of the table that a consensus could in fact be reached.

But throughout, there was an awareness that the combination of high unemployment and years of inflation had created problems that Congress must resolve and a big first step was taken when all sides agreed on the dimensions of the problem. Either through higher revenues, reduced benefits or a combination of the two, $150 billion to $200 billion would have to be saved by the year 1990. After that, there would be an intermediate spell of anticipated surplus.

Party differences

The Democrats initially stressed revenue-raising steps. The Republican emphasis was on benefit cuts and a higher retirement age. For a time, the likely outcome appeared to be a Republican-drafted majority report, a stinging Democratic dissent—and a partisan clash in Congress.

Differences were narrowed until the key question remaining was whether a compromise package would be assured the support of both President Reagan and House Speaker O'Neill. In this, Kirkland said in an interview, members of Congress on the commission from both parties had a key role.

The dollar amounts involved in the package were huge because of the vastness of the system which takes in and pays out hundreds of billions of dollars through the three trust funds—Old Age & Survivors Insurance, Disability Insurance and Hospital Insurance.

The important thing, Kirkland said, is that everyone on the commission concurred that "social security is here to stay, that the system is essentially sound."

Oil, Chemical Workers, HRDI map aid to laid-off members

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute have worked out a formal agreement to provide vital services to the union's jobless workers.

The Joint Worker Assistance Program was signed by OCAW President Robert Goss and HRDI President Alan Kistler.

The pact is the first formal agreement between the AFL-CIO's employment and training arm and an international union to use HRDI's range of programs to help laid-off workers cope with unemployment and find new jobs, Kistler said.

Goss noted that the agreement formalizes a program "that has already proved extremely beneficial to a large number of our members."

Since the union began using HRDI's services last year, laid-off OCAW members have attended 14 workshops on searching for new jobs, using community social services to weather unemployment, continuing company obligations under the union contract, and related topics.

Among the major sessions were a workshop for 90 OCAW members displaced when an Amoco refinery in Sugar Creek, Mich., shut down, a program for 168 miners who lost jobs at the Climax Mine in Leadville, Colo., and one for 110 refinery workers discharged by Texaco in Port Arthur, Tex.

The formal agreement, Goss said, grew out of a proposal developed by HRDI at the union's request. The program designed by the institute is keyed to needs of laid-off workers in the industry.

Its features include a plan for a quick, joint response to the notification of a plant shutdown. This would include scheduling of a joint workshop, generally followed by intensive efforts to place the workers in new jobs or help them get training in new skills.

The terms of the OCAW-HRDI agreement were worked out by HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold and OCAW Vice President Joseph Misbrener.

Goss praised the program as a model for other unions experiencing plant closings and displacements.

Most OCAW collective bargaining agreements provide for pre-notification by the company of plant closings or mass layoffs, Goss said, adding that the assistance from HRDI has helped OCAW develop a "uniform program" to respond to its local unions and their members in these situations.

Major proposals of panel on social security reform

These are the principal recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. They are estimated to raise $169 billion in revenues over the next seven years.

- $20 billion from expanded coverage. Starting in 1984, all employees of non-profit organizations would be brought under social security, as would federal employees hired after that date.

- $3 billion by banning withdrawal from the social security system of state and local governments already in the system.

- $40 billion by changing the date for automatic cost-of-living adjustments in social security benefits to January of each year instead of July. This would result in a one-time, six-month postponement.

The blow would be cushioned for those with the least income by higher allowable payments under the Supplemental Security Income program.

- $30 billion by making 50 percent of social security benefit payments subject to federal income tax for persons who have substantial other income. The half of benefits assumed to stem from employer payments into the fund would be taxable income for individuals who have at least $20,000 of other income ($25,000 on a joint return).

The Treasury would turn over the added taxes collected to the social security trust funds.

- $40 billion by advancing the scheduled dates of increases in the payroll tax rate. The rate for workers and employers would rise from 6.7 percent to 7 percent in 1984 and then go as already scheduled to 7.05 percent in 1985. However, workers would be reimbursed for the extra deduction in 1984 through a refundable tax credit. The rate would also be raised above the present tax schedule for the years 1988 and 1989.

- $18 billion by setting the tax rate for self-employed persons at the combined employer-employee rate instead of three-fourths of that amount. But one-half of the combined rate, equal to the employer contribution, could be deducted from taxable income as a business expense.

- $18 billion through a lump-sum payment into the social security trust funds to compensate for future benefits attributed to years of military service before 1957, when armed services personnel started paying social security taxes. It also would cover social security credits that are based on allowances for military service after that date.

A relatively modest $200 million saving is estimated from changing the formula for computing social security benefits of persons whose primary retirement comes from pension systems for non-covered employment, such as the federal civil service.

On the other side of the ledger, there are about $500 million in added costs to the social security system by eliminating various gender-related distinctions affecting benefits for widows, widowers, divorced spouses and survivors.

A recommendation that did not carry a cost estimate would provide an incentive for later retirement by gradually increasing the extra retirement credit for those who do not start drawing benefits until they are older than 65.

The current credit of 3 percent a year would be raised in steps to 8 percent, starting in 1990. The 8 percent a year bonus would be reached in the year 2010.

Its thrust would be to pay added benefits to those who retire later than reduce benefits for those who stop working at what is now considered the "normal" retirement age.

For new Congress

Immigration reforms major holdover issue

Reform of the nation's immigration laws was one of organized labor's key legislative objectives in the 97th Congress that got sidetracked in the rush to adjourn. But as the new Congress gets under way, the prospects are for an early revival of the campaign for a fair immigration policy.

The AFL-CIO has supported reforms that will stop the flow of illegal immigration—to protect domestic jobs and labor standards and stop exploitation of illegal aliens by employers. The bills that won labor's support in the last Congress included a system of stiff penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens and a tight rein on any temporary worker schemes, known as H-2 programs.

The Senate passed a reform bill last August, but a similar measure in the House bogged down under a maze of competing amendments.

High on agenda

Sponsors of the measure in both houses have said they plan to reintroduce legislation early this year, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in an interview with reporters, pointed to immigration reform as an issue likely to be high on the congressional agenda.

In a recent report on the status of immigration legislation, J. F. Otero, executive vice president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, blamed the Reagan Administration for derailing progress toward reform by catering to "a union-busting, reactionary coalition" of business and agri-business groups seeking to expand temporary worker programs to provide a pool of cheap, exploitable labor.

Otero, who is a vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, pointed out that Administration-backed provisions of the failed bill would have jeopardized protections that now give American citizens and legal workers first crack at available jobs.

He said supporters of an expanded "guest worker" program continue to argue that there is a shortage of qualified American labor, but "such perceived shortage exists only under the terms and conditions offered by the employer which may be well below the going rate. . . . Better conditions might attract more domestic workers."

Exploiting workers

Otero charged that this and other claims by employers, such as the contention that "American workers don't want to do stoop labor or dirty jobs," mask what he said are the real objectives of the growers—"to exploit foreign workers and discriminate against American workers who cannot be easily duped or denied their legal rights."

He accused the Reagan Administration of disregarding the recommendations made in 1980 by the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy following its two-year, $5-million study of the problems. One of the commission's recommendations opposed revival of "guest worker" schemes.

Otero served as a member of the commission, which was appointed by President Carter in 1978 and chaired by Rev. Theodore Hesburgh. The AFL-CIO praised the commission's report when it was issued, noting many of its recommendations paralleled AFL-CIO positions.

Otero said the population of illegal aliens in the United States has been estimated at anywhere from 3.5 million to 12 million. These people constitute a "subclass" without rights who are prey to unscrupulous employers and kept in check by the constant fear of discovery, he observed. Yet the presence of these frightened and docile workers, he asserted, "constitutes a threat to minorities, women, unemployed workers who are legal aliens and to citizens seeking their own opportunities for a better life."

Illegal workers are also used as "tools in union-busting and strike-breaking activities," Otero pointed out.

He noted that policies adopted by the AFL-CIO at its 1981 convention have spelled out organized labor's legislative priorities for immigration reform and the AFL-CIO's support for the acceptance and compassionate treatment of refugees.

Among those priorities are the establishment of stiff penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens, including criminal sanctions for repeat violators.

The AFL-CIO also has called for strict enforcement of anti-discrimination laws to prevent employers from refusing to hire legal workers because of appearance, names or accents.

Identification need

Otero noted that organized labor has urged development of a secure worker identification system so that employers can readily determine the legal status of job applicants.

More funding and better staffing for the Immigration & Naturalization Service are also essential, Otero declared, to strengthen border control and interior enforcement.

Stepped-up enforcement of existing wage and working standards laws should also be pressed in industries where large numbers of illegal workers are known to be employed, Otero said.

He underscored the AFL-CIO's opposition to any programs that would permit importation of foreign workers "to undercut U.S. wages and working conditions," and he pointed out that the nation's previous experiment with a "bracero" program was killed by Congress as a failure in 1962.

After the flow of illegal immigration is stopped, a program for a "fair and generous" legalization of the status of illegal aliens who are long-time residents of the United States should begin, Otero said.

Top Guild award

The Newspaper Guild's 1982 Heywood Broun award is presented to photographer Anestis Diakopoulos, right, on behalf of Stephen R. Morin, a reporter formerly with the Providence (R.I.) Journal-Bulletin. Morin, on assignment for the Wall Street Journal, could not attend the awards luncheon in Washington. Diakopoulos worked with Morin on the winning series, titled "The Children of Crime." Presenting the award are contest chairman William J. Farson, retired Guild executive vice president, left, and contest judge Ernest B. Furgurson of the Baltimore Sun.

Court backs transit union in test of federal wage law

The Supreme Court kept intact an appellate court decision ordering a publicly owned bus company to comply with federal overtime pay provisions in turning down a plea by Pennsylvania's New Castle Transit Authority.

The high court's action is a victory for 21 members of Amalgamated Transit Union Local 89 whose claims for overtime pay were reinstated by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last April.

The appellate court ruled that since local and state governmental transit systems rely greatly on federal grants and funds, they cannot use the states' rights provisions of the Constitution to deny workers overtime pay.

The claims, based on two hours' overtime per week for more than two years, total more than $50,000. The ATU has similar suits pending in federal courts in San Antonio, Macon, Ga. and Chattanooga, Tenn.

San Antonio claims

The San Antonio suit involves some 700 members of ATU Local 694 and $1.5 million in unpaid overtime compensation. ATU filed the overtime claims in 1976 and in 1979 the Labor Dept. ordered the local transit authority to make the payments. But the publicly-operated system persuaded a federal district court in Texas to block the payment order on constitutional grounds.

In the New Castle case, the 3rd Circuit Court reversed a federal district court ruling which held that states and their political subdivisions are immune from the overtime pay provisions. The district court cited the 10th Amendment and a 1976 Supreme Court decision that held the Fair Labor Standards Act did not extend to states when they were "engaged in traditional government functions."

The appellate court noted that a March 1982 Supreme Court decision made clear that "states are not free to assume functions historically performed by the private sector and thereby insulate those activities from federal regulation of interstate commerce."

It had noted that prior to 1964, when the Urban Mass Transit Act was passed, the governments were not traditionally involved in the operation of local mass transit systems.

Unemployment continues rising throughout U.S.

Virginia, with an unemployment rate of 16.4 percent, also was hard hit by employment reductions in mining.

Every state reported job losses in manufacturing, BLS said. At least two-thirds of the states experienced decreases over the year in mining, construction, transportation, public utilities, and trade, while over half the states showed reductions in government.

At the same time, BLS said, most states continued to post job gains in finance, insurance, real estate, and services.

The largest overall employment decline from a year earlier occurred in Pennsylvania, where the drop was 260,000. Five other states—California, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio—had job losses exceeding 100,000.

Only two gains

Alaska and Florida were the only states reporting over-the-year gains in employment.

In eight states, employment fell by 4 percent or more over the year. These were Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Michigan, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. Alaska was the only state with an increase of this magnitude.

Among metropolitan areas, other high jobless rates were posted in Johnstown, Pa., 20.7 percent, and Duluth-Superior, Minn., 20.3 percent. Others were Modesto, Calif., 18.8 percent, and Gary-Hammond-East Chicago, Ind., 18.3 percent.

They came, waited and hoped

Milwaukee—They came by the thousands and stood in line, some of them all night in 17-degree temperature, waiting to apply for one of 200 new jobs openings at A. O. Smith Corp.'s auto frame plant.

By the time the doors closed at the state fairgrounds at 6 p.m. on Jan. 17, applications had been taken from some 12,000 jobless and there were still other thousands in line.

Another 4,500 showed up the following day. The long line of applicants was detoured to snake through another building so the people could warm up. The Red Cross served coffee.

"It was pathetic," said Patsy Cashmore of the Milwaukee County AFL-CIO. "Many of those people are highly skilled workers laid off from their regular jobs." So much for President Reagan's oft-repeated remarks about advertised jobs going begging.

A. O. Smith, a major producer of frames for General Motors cars and Ford trucks, announced the new jobs two weeks earlier. It said a recent upturn in frame demand prompted the hiring.

Latest figures from the Labor Dept. show Milwaukee has a jobless rate of 14 percent, the metropolitan area 11.6 percent, and Wisconsin 11 percent.

"We had expected some big crowds, but nothing like this," said A. O. Smith's Jack Birchhill. The firm which has a current workforce of 3,728, said the new jobs are for welders and press-operators. Plant workers are members of Directly Affiliated Local Union 19806 and the Machinists.

Committee lineups reflect Democratic gains in House tilted from a 19-14 to a 20-10 Democratic majority. New members, all first-termers, are Democrats Major R. Owens (N.Y.), Frank Harrison (Pa.) and Rick Boucher (Va.), along with Republicans Steve Bartlett (Tex.) and Ronald C. Packard (Calif.). The committee remains firmly liberal.

Democrats left unchanged their 23-12 majority on the Ways & Means Committee, whose jurisdiction covers more of labor's program than any other committee. Winners of the hot competition to fill vacancies were Democrats Ronnie G. Flippo (Ala.), Byron L. Dorgan (N.D.), and Barbara B. Kennelly (Calif.). On the Republican side, new members are Carroll A. Campbell, Jr. (S.C.) and William M. Thomas (Calif.).

Coveted posts

The Appropriations Committee isn't quite the power base it was before Congress adopted its present budget procedure. But it remains a coveted assignment and the Democratic majority has been increased from 33-22 to 36-21. Bill Bonner (Tenn.), Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), Bob Carr (Mich.) and Robert J. Mrazek (N.Y.) are the new Democrats; Republicans added Harold Rogers (Ky.).

Other House committees dealing with legislation affecting labor's concerns also increased their Democratic majorities. Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs went from 25-19 to a 29-17 ratio. Energy & Commerce shifted from 24-18 to 27-15. Judiciary tilted from 16-12 to 20-11. Merchant Marine & Fisheries moved from 20-15 to 25-14. Post Office & Civil Service went from 15-11 to 15-9. Public Works & Transportation changed from a 25-19 to a 29-17 Democratic majority.

Few new senators

The five new senators are the smallest freshman class since the direct election of senators was established by constitutional amendment early in the century. Thus, there are relatively few changes in Senate committee assignments or party ratios.

One change of note was the decision by Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.) to give up the post of ranking minority member on the Budget Committee to become ranking minority member of the Commerce Committee. Replacing him as the top Democrat on the Budget Committee will be Lawton Chiles (Fla.).

New Republican members of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee are Charles E. Grassley (Ia.) and Alfonse D'Amato (N.Y.). They replace Paula Hawkins (Fla.) and John East (N.C.), who chose to move to other committees. The Democratic lineup is unchanged, with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), continuing as the committee's ranking minority member.

Panel presses railroad unions to accept Long Island accord

A presidential emergency board recommended that all 14 unions bargaining on a new contract with the Long Island Rail Road accept the wage terms of a contract already agreed to by eight of them.

The panel, established last Nov. 16 under a White House Executive Order, also recommended that the unions that have not reached agreement accept certain workrule changes that the other unions agreed to.

The Railway & Airline Clerks and the unaffiliated Teamsters have ratified an agreement with the LIRR, and four other unions have tentatively accepted pacts but not given final approval. The four are the Sheet Metal Workers, Signalmen, Firemen & Oilers and Boilermakers & Blacksmiths.

In addition, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers accepted an agreement that was rejected by the carrier's parent organization, the New York Metropolitan Transportation Authority. Negotiators for the unaffiliated American Railway & Airway Supervisors Association also accepted a pact, but this was rejected by its members.

No agreement has been reached by the Machinists, Carmen, Yardmasters, United Transportation Union, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers and Police Benevolent Association.

The Long Island Rail Road has some 7,300 employees, about 6,700 of them members of the 14 trade unions. It carries some 283,000 passengers each week day, mostly on a through-service from the eastern end of Long Island to Manhattan.

The presidential panel filed its report with the White House on Jan. 4. The parties must maintain the status quo for at least 90 days during which further bargaining could occur. If there is not agreement by Apr. 4, the unions would be free to strike.

When no settlement could be reached under provisions of the Railway Labor Act, including the National Mediation Board's proffer of arbitration, the parties were released from mediation Oct. 19, triggering off a 30-day waiting period before self-help could have been taken Nov. 19.

But on Nov. 11, the carrier requested creation of a presidential emergency board under a provision of the Railway Labor Act.

A major change in the pattern settlement recommended by the board would bring "new hires" in nonoperating crafts and classes to the payroll at 80 percent of the full rate during their first year of employment. For each of the next four years, there would be a 5-percent increase until the employee reached the 100-percent status.

A Workable Solution

THERE ARE, of course, more equitable and more desirable ways to shore up the social security trust funds than the package of recommendations made by the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

But in terms of the politically possible, this bipartisan commission succeeded admirably.

From the AFL-CIO's viewpoint, an infusion of general revenue funds and full taxation of employer payrolls would better meet a test of fairness. It was the committee's task, however, to shape a consensus, not a series of position papers.

Of course, if the Reagan Administration had its druthers—based on the proposals it submitted to Congress in 1981—benefits would be cut back to the point that relatively few workers could afford to retire in their sixties.

Congress recoiled in political horror from the Administration plan and the White House quickly backpedaled. But the short-term funding problems of the social security system continued to worsen under the persistent pounding of high unemployment and high inflation. Most worrisome of all, there was no consensus in Congress on what should be done and, seemingly, no likelihood of one.

IT IS AGAINST this backdrop of political reality that the work of the National Commission on Social Security must be judged.

It got on the right track by rejecting any drastic change in the nation's social security system, including the clearly unworkable scheme of making the system voluntary.

And it stayed on the right track by reaching a consensus on the amount that would have to be raised or saved to keep the system solvent.

It then struggled—painfully at times—to narrow the differences to the point that an agreement was possible.

To its great credit, the politically divided commission did come up with a workable solution to the social security system's financial problems—one that focuses on funding benefits, not cutting them. It provides needed assurance to America's workers and retirees that benefits earned over their working lives will in fact be paid and that generation will not be set against generation.

It did not, unfortunately, give federal and postal workers the assurance to which they are entitled about the integrity of the civil service retirement system.

But with that caveat, the commission has done well—better, in fact, than almost anyone expected.

Some Centennial

THIS IS the centennial year of the federal civil service law that ended the notorious buying and selling of government jobs and marked the start of a career service.

It would, normally, be occasion for some deserved praise of the men and women who staff our space centers, inspect the health and safety of our workplaces, deliver social security checks on time and perform the myriad tasks that a modern society demands of its government.

Instead the centennial has been marred by the Administration's continued degrading of government workers.

Leaders of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. sought a meeting with President Reagan after news reports surfaced that the budget would call for a pay freeze for federal workers and a slash in retirement benefits.

The cold response, suggesting that they take up the matter with the government's personnel director, was characterized by PED President Kenneth T. Blaylock as telling federal workers and their unions to "drop dead."

Happy civil service centennial.

Revived housing measure pegged to jobs creation

By Press Associates, Inc.

The first bill introduced in the new 98th Congress would provide job-creating public housing construction and rehabilitation.

H.R. 1—the Housing and Urban/Rural Recovery Act—also would provide needed funds in coming years for rental and operating assistance to existing public housing.

In addition, it would provide mortgage interest rate subsidies to homebuyers and emergency loans to jobless homeowners facing foreclosure.

The bill is identical to one approved last May by the House Banking Committee, only to die in the "do-little" 97th Congress. It was introduced both times by Rep. Henry Gonzalez (D-Tex.), who chairs the Banking Committee's housing subcommittee.

The Gonzalez bill, hailed as a big step in the right direction by organized labor and the National Low-Income Housing Coalition, faces brighter prospects in the 98th Congress. "We're going to move early this year," said Gerald McMurray, staff director of the subcommittee.

No funding

Because of inaction in the 97th Congress, the current fiscal year began on Oct. 1, 1982, with no funds for low-income housing assistance for the first time since the 1930s.

In the midst of the Great Depression, when President Roosevelt declared that a third of the nation was ill-housed, the first federal housing programs began under the Public Works Administration (PWA).

Since that time, about 4 million federally subsidized housing units have been built. But under the Reagan Administration, the nation has been backpeddling from the goal of adequate housing for all.

"The situation was created by an Administration that wanted to dismantle everything created over the past 50 years," said McMurray.

The year before President Reagan took office, Congress set funding for housing programs at $30 billion.

But for fiscal 1982, Congress went along with most of Reagan's proposed housing cutbacks and appropriated only $17.4 billion. From that amount, it later sliced about $4 billion under Administration pressure.

Presidential veto

Congress last summer passed a bill to subsidize mortgage payments, spurring construction at the same time. The bill, sponsored by Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), was vetoed by Reagan.

Absorbed during much of the spring and summer with debating the merits of the Lugar bill, Congress delayed consideration of broader low-income housing programs such as the Gonzalez bill. So the new fiscal year began with zero funding for housing production.

Late in its lame-duck session in December, Congress included in its stop-gap appropriations bill some funds for rehabilitation of public housing. But the only funds for construction of low-rent housing were for 14,000 units for the elderly and 2,000 units for American Indians.

The upturn in housing construction in recent months is encouraging. But December's 1.43 million annual start rate is still low compared to the 2 million level in the late 1970s. Labor experts say that 2.2 million new units are needed each year.

Reagan's commission on housing reported last spring that there are 7.5 million people who need housing assistance and aren't getting it.

Enactment of the Gonzalez bill, over the President's veto if necessary, would be a good start toward meeting the nation's housing needs and putting Americans back to work.

MEMO FROM COPE

Some Grim Words About the Reagan Presidency

It's true, the Washington Post and New York Times are not the universe. But what these two papers are saying about the Reagan Administration is echoed by other observers in other communities throughout the land. Here are recent samples.

Washington Post political columnist David Broder, Jan. 12, 1983: "What we are witnessing is not the mid-point of the Reagan presidency, but its phase-out . . . an accelerating retreat from Reaganism, a process in which he (the President) is more spectator than leader. . . .

"Power is moving away from Reagan in the ongoing work of government. What began as a process of delegation (of responsibility to aides) is rapidly approaching abdication. . . . His detachment is extraordinary. . . ."

When aides bring to Reagan ideas to deal with crucial problems, Broder says, the President does not raise "important questions . . . or suggest alternatives. No one pretends that Reagan contributes to the policy-analysis process in that way."

Rather, he asks how these ideas "could be reconciled with his promises of 1980-81 and the simplistic rhetoric of his 30 years on the conservative banquet circuit."

New York Times* editorial, Jan. 9, 1983: "The stench of failure hangs over Ronald Reagan's White House."

Helms PAC Top Fund-Raiser at $10 Million

Interested in big money?

If you are, that gives you something in common with Jesse Helms, the frequently filibustering ultra-right Senator from North Carolina.

But where you and he part ways is that you only dream about big money.

He gets it . . . big political money.

He's got this neat thing going in North Carolina, the National Congressional Club. It was formed by him and some supporters. It exists to serve him and his whims.

It was the biggest political action committee in the country in terms of funding last year. NCC hauled in $9,053,645 in the election cycle Jan. 1, 1981-Oct. 13, 1982, according to a Federal Election Commission report. By the time final FEC figures are in, closing out the cycle to Dec. 31, 1982, Jesse Helms's plaything could go over $10 million. He used to be called the "Six Millon Dollar Man," for his 1978 campaign kitty. Now he's up to 10.

Big money flowed to a batch of ultra-right PACs, in fact. Five of the top 10 money-raiser PACs are ultra-conservative organizations, FEC figures show.

In second place was the National Conservative PAC, which spends a bundle on so-called "independent expenditure" campaigns, attacking pro-worker U.S. Senate and House incumbents even before their opponents enter the ring.

NCPAC collected $8,923,438, but got little for it in 1982. Triumphant in major U.S. Senate races just two years before, NCPAC was virtually blanked in 1982. NCPAC, for example, shelled out more than $800,000 to defeat Sen. Paul Sarbanes in Maryland. It failed.

Fourth among the top 10 was the Fund for a Conservative Majority, $2,490,141; sixth was Citizens for the Republic (originally formed as an arm of early campaigns of Ronald Reagan), $2,292,363; seventh, Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress, $2,134,562. These five right-wing PACs alone collected nearly $25 million in political contributions.

Others in the Top 10:

Third place, Realtors PAC, $2,772,281. Fifth, American Medical Association PAC (AMPAC), $2,375,774. Eighth through tenth respectively: National Committee for an Effective Congress, $2,131,-563; Fund for a Democratic Majority, $2,126,180; Committee for the Future of America, $1,971,135.

Talking about money, figures compiled by the House Democratic Study Group show three Republican committees raised $180.4 million for the 1982 elections to $27.4 million raised by their Democratic counterparts.

When it was all over, GOP committees even had the luxury of a $6.3 million surplus. Democrats came out $2.2 million in the red.

During the 1981-82 election cycle, the report says, the GOP Congressional Committee raised $54.5 million, the GOP Senate Campaign Committee $46 million, the GOP National Committee $80 million-plus. In contrast, the Democratic House Campaign Committee raised $6.3 million, Senate Campaign Committee $5.6 million, and the National Committee $15 million-plus.

Not shown in national figures computed by the FEC are the enormous amounts of political funds generated by state chapters of trade association PACs. Thus, the national figures listed for the Realtors PAC and for AMPAC will actually be dwarfed by totals amassed by their various state chapters for use in state-level elections.

The Top 10 list changes significantly when the category is not funds collected, as above, but contributions to federal candidates. Right-wing PACs disappear, because such huge portions of their funds are in turn spent to raise other funds, and big chunks of it, as well, go into "independent expenditures" campaigns which are not contributions directly to a candidate.

The Realtors and AMPAC run one-two in direct contributions, followed by the Auto Workers, Machinists and National Education Association. Next in line are four more trade groups—Bankers, Home Builders, Milk Producers, Auto and Truck Dealers. Rounding out the list is AFL-CIO COPE.

Don't get the notion that because some union PACs made the Top 10 union PACs over-all are in the same financial league with corporate, trade and right-wing PACs. In direct contributions to federal candidates, union PACs are on the short end of a 3-1 margin. Add right-wing "independent expenditures" and you approach a 4-1 deficit for union PACs. Throw in all the spending of state legislative and ballot issue elections, and union PACs are left in the dust of at least a 10-1 ratio.

Even the 3-1 federal campaign margin will balloon to at least 4-1 or 5-1 when final figures are in. The habit of corporate and trade groups in the past couple of campaigns has been to dump enormous sums on their candidates in the last few weeks leading up to election day.

As of Oct. 13, 1982, corporate PACs had contributed $25.2 million, trade PACs $20.7 million, right-wing PACs about $6 million. Labor PACs had contributed nearly $17.7 million.

While no single corporate PAC contributed as much as the top handful of labor PACs, the corporate PAC bulge is explained by the fact there are five times as many of them. At that, there were some pretty hefty corporate contributions to federal candidates. Tenneco PAC kicked in $418,400, Winn-Dixie stores $238,375, eight others between $162,000 and $216,000.

Odds 'n Ends

IF YOU DIDN'T NOTICE, it's over—the gubernatorial race in Illinois, that is. Ten weeks after election day, the state supreme court refused challenger Adlai Stevenson's appeal for a recount. That made it official: Gov. James Thompson the winner by 5,074 votes, a margin of only one-tenth of 1 percent of the ballots cast.

QUICK . . . CAN YOU NAME most of the declared candidates for the 1984 presidential nominations? Bet you can't. Take a brief pause while you try. Done? Did you name Gerry Brooks, the draftsman from Detroit? Nell Fiola of Burnsville, Minn.? Robert Brewster, Orlando, Fla., who heads the Christian Non-Lawyer ticket (can't stand lawyers)? Lester Byerly, Manahawkin, N.J.? You probably named Hart, thinking of Sen. Gary Hart (Colo.) who's campaigning for the Democratic nomination. But there's also Sammy Hayes Hart of Tampa, Fla. These and others—34 in all, exclusive of the established political figures—have filed officially as presidential candidates with the Federal Election Commission. What does it take to be an "official" candidate? No more than a postcard to the FEC declaring your intention.

SENATE MAJORITY LEADER Howard Baker (Tenn.) reportedly has signalled privately that he will not seek re-election in 1984 for a fourth Senate term. Instead, he's looking to higher office—a presidential try in 1984 if Ronald Reagan does not seek re-election, in 1988 if Reagan does.

LEST WE FORGET, it was exactly a year ago that the President and top aides were predicting "the recession is expected to end early in 1982, followed by a resumption of growth by mid-year," that unemployment would peak by spring and drop to 8.4 percent by the end of 1982, that, in the words of Treasury Secretary Regan, "the economy will come roaring back." So much for tea leaves.

'LIFE-THREATENING' is the phrase the Children's Defense Fund uses to describe Administration cuts in health services for poor mothers and children. The group charges "many thousands . . . are being denied services vital to life and health."

Item from Department Of 'Small World Isn't It?'

The National Right to Work (for less) Committee doesn't let any grass grow under its feet—not when there's a chance to raise funds.

A recent Supreme Court decision had upheld a Federal Election Commission ruling that said NRTWC couldn't solicit funds for its political front, the Employees Rights Campaign Committee, from past contributors to NRTWC. The basis of the decision was the NRTWC is not a genuine membership organization.

The day after the Supreme Court decision, NRTWC showed up at the FEC and filed papers creating three new PACs, all with the same address, same bank, same treasurer—the National Right to Work PAC, the Right to Work PAC, the National Freedom to Work PAC.

All three claim to have no affiliation with any other organization or committee—that includes with the parent NRTWC and with each other.

One guess who the treasurer is of all three PACs.

Federal aid slash bleeds states, cities

By Arlee C. Green

The Reagan Administration's cutback of $57 billion in federal aid over a three-year period has pushed state and local governments to the brink of disaster and further reductions could send them over the edge, public employee unions charged.

In a jointly prepared, 135-page report, the State, County & Municipal Employees and the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. analyzed the state-by-state impact of the cuts, which AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said have led to a "significant and substantial" decline in public services.

"Every community in the country has been affected in a very damaging way by reductions in federal aid," McEntee said.

"Our report is a simple and direct message to the President and the Congress that further reductions in federal assistance to state and local governments would be misguided social, as well as economic, policy. Additional cutbacks will only deepen the recession and stifle recovery."

Budget trends

The report noted several trends in the Reagan Administration's budget choices:

- A shift in federal resources from health, education, training, social services and infrastructure programs toward unprecedented peacetime military expenditures.
- The "pro-cyclical nature" of federal budget policy that is reducing federal assistance to state and local governments in the midst of a recession, thereby further dragging the economy downward.
- The de-facto accomplishment of Reagan's "new federalism" proposal through reduction in federal funding for social programs.

The report estimated total reductions in federal aid to state and local governments at $57 billion over the three-year period from fiscal year 1982 through 1984. For many key programs, such as employment training, community services, center for disease control and economic development, the cuts exceed 50 percent. If current trends continue, the report warns, by 1985 federal aid to states "will fall to pre-Great Society levels."

Spending swaps

Grants-in-aid to state and local governments have fallen from 12.7 percent of the federal budget in 1981 to a projected 8.8 percent in 1984. Meanwhile, defense spending has climbed from 24.2 percent to 29 percent of the budget.

McEntee charged that "these figures

Reagan's mid-term stand scored

Change the course

Congress must reverse "disastrous" Reagan Administration policies that have left America battered by recession and strained by social conflict, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urges. Joining in the news conference at AFL-CIO headquarters are, from left, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks, National Organization for Women President Judith Goldsmith, and Gerald W. McEntee, president of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

Kirkland says policy shift essential to end recession

By David L. Perlman

An America battered by recession and strained by social conflict can't afford another year of "disastrous" Reagan Administration policies, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

Labor's protest at the "stay-the-course" theme of President Reagan's televised State of the Union address was joined by major civil rights and women's organizations. In a statement read by Kirkland at a news conference at AFL-CIO headquarters, they called on Congress to inject "fairness and equity" into the government's budget and policy decisions.

Only the wealthy have been "immune from the pain of Reaganism," the joint statement stressed.

Reagan-induced woes

NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks protested Reagan's continued use of domestic spending as a scapegoat even though it is the President's tax cuts that have brought about record deficits.

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee said 12 million jobless Americans don't share President Reagan's confidence that "America is on the mend" or his opposition to large-scale job programs.

The president of the National Organization for Women, Judith Goldsmith, told the news conference that women are "tired of empty gestures" from an Administration that regards serious human rights issues as merely "image problems."

Other signers of the statement included President Dorothy S. Riding of the League of Women Voters, National Urban League President John Jacob and Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser.

A host of other unions issued statements sharply critical of portions of the President's State of the Union message directly affecting their members.

Federal pay freeze

They included federal employee and postal unions angered by Reagan's plan to freeze all pay raises and retirement benefits for both federal civilian employees and persons in the military services.

At the news conference, Kirkland was asked whether he thought the President's State of the Union address indicated that Reagan is "more willing to compromise and is more flexible" on his program. That was the thrust of some of the news stories on the speech.

Kirkland acknowledged the "relatively moderate tone" of the language used by Reagan.

Same old stuff

"But the substance of the program that he put forward," Kirkland stressed, is "clearly the same old stuff—further cuts for the poor, further tax breaks for employers, and a continuation of the same rigid doctrine."

As for Reagan's call for "bipartisanship," Kirkland observed that a president who is riding high in the public opinion polls asserts a "mandate" for whatever he wants to put through. But "when the polls

Loss of insurance poses health crisis for jobless

AFL-CIO Vice President Douglas A. Fraser warned Congress that the problem of lost health protection for the jobless during the current recession is so serious it may end up costing the nation as much in "damaged and lost lives" as unemployment itself.

Fraser, testifying for the federation and as chairman of the Health Security Action Council, told a House subcommittee that providing health care for the unemployed is a "massive" national problem that calls for immediate national solution.

He pointed out that those who have lost health insurance protection because of the recession include the official total of 12 million unemployed plus the 1.8 million too discouraged to look for work and at least half the 6.3 million forced to work part-time because no full-time work is available. When dependents are added in, Fraser said, the total is at least 25 million to 30 million Americans.

Subcommittee Chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) called the oversight hearing to bring attention to the "tragic" effects of unemployment on health care.

Job-linked coverage

Because the nation's private health insurance system is so closely linked to employment—over 85 percent of all workers gain access to health insurance coverage through their employers—the recession has severely cut into the delivery of health care to the unemployed. Most unemployed workers do not qualify for Medicaid or other health care alternatives.

Waxman noted that the Hill-Burton Act, which could be useful to the unemployed in providing health care services, faces non-enforcement and possible rule changes by the Reagan Administration.

Under Hill-Burton requirements, hos-

Labor blasts bid to weaken protections for child labor

The AFL-CIO registered strong opposition to the Reagan Administration's plans to weaken child labor protections. Coming at a time when 12 million Americans cannot find jobs, the federation said the idea of encouraging the entry of more children into the workforce is "stunning."

It reaffirmed labor's objections to any increased use of child labor or any attempts to relax the regulations that now prevent the exploitation of children. The AFL-CIO outlined its position in a formal comment sent to the Labor Dept. on proposed changes in child labor regulations issued by the Administration last July.

If children are to become healthy and competent adults, the AFL-CIO statement stressed, their primary activity should be schooling, not working. It said the administration's plans would permit the Labor Dept. to "abdicate" its responsibilities for protecting children from exploitation.

The changes also would encourage the employment of young teenagers "in hazardous workplaces from which they have previously been excluded, for long periods and at late hours," the statement noted.

It said the changes are also likely to result in the displacement and unemployment of other workers now earning only the minimum wage, among them older teenagers, minorities, women and senior citizens.

IUD executive council drafts proposal for federal program to aid occupational disease victims.

IUD asks federal program for victims of job disease

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is mounting a legislative campaign for a new federal program that would provide aid to workers and their families who face the high risk of death and disability from job-related disease.

The two-part program was spelled out in a resolution adopted by the IUD executive council at its winter meeting.

In other action, the council established a new subcommittee, chaired by UAW President Douglas Fraser, to develop the framework for an industrial policy to revitalize the nation's industrial sector.

The council also took steps to refocus its resources on those committees with the best prospects for advancing to higher levels of bargaining coordination. Presently, 40 unions participate in 71 committees, involving 2,200 bargaining units and 750,000 workers.

New members

Elected to fill vacancies on the council were President William Bywater of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and President Patrick Campbell of the Carpenters.

Under the high-risk compensation plan, as outlined by the IUD, the first part would be administered by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, which would identify workers who are in high-risk jobs.

NIOSH would also administer a Risk Assessment Board and coverage for high-risk workers would be based on an epidemiological trigger, a level at which high-risk workers would automatically be covered.

The second part calls for a new federal program to compensate disabled workers and their families through industry trust funds. A new federal agency would adjudicate claims and begin a national record-keeping system on occupational illnesses.

Automatic benefits

Compensation would be virtually automatic where occupation is linked to a worker's disease or disability. Workers and the agency would have the authority to sue corporations and individual corporate officers in cases of criminal or gross negligence. There would also be safeguards preventing insurance firms from excluding workers in high-risk jobs from existing health insurance coverage.

The IUD stressed that the programs are essential for the 100,000 workers who die and the one million who become disabled every year because of exposure to toxic substances on the job.

"A comprehensive program . . . is critical if we are to end this chronic, massive national epidemic based on ignorance, apathy, and inaction," said the IUD.

Broad coverage

Past legislative efforts have centered on the compensation issue only. What is needed, said IUD, is a mechanism to help prevent worker's diseases and to aid those who do develop work-related diseases. It noted legislation cannot be aimed at just one or two toxic agents. There must be help for "all workers made sick by conditions at work."

The department explained that occupational disease episodes are publicized by the media, drawing attention to the pain suffered by victims of radiation, asbestos, kepone, cotton dust, benzidine and many other hazardous substances. However, when the media attention is drawn elsewhere, the majority of victims are left suffering and completely unassisted.

Millions of workers are uninformed about the hazards they face in the workplace as well as what can be done to reduce those risks, it noted. Of those diseased or disabled by job-related exposures, only about 10 percent receive benefits from state workers' compensation systems, most of which deal with traumatic injuries, not occupational diseases.

Labor Dept. plans to appeal ruling on Davis-Bacon

The Labor Dept. has served notice that it will appeal a federal district court's ruling invalidating regulations severely weakening Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage protections.

Judge Harold H. Greene in late December granted the request of the AFL-CIO and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. for a permanent injunction invalidating the regulations as contrary to Congress' intent in setting wage standards for federally financed construction.

Judge Greene allowed only one section of the regulations to go into effect—a change in the rule establishing the prevailing wage as the rate received by at least 30 percent of the workers in the job classification in the labor market surveyed. The new requirement would be 50 percent.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine expressed regret that the Labor Dept. was not willing to accept the district court ruling. Now that the issue will be further considered at the appellate level, he said, the unions will for their part seek reversal of the portion of Judge Greene's decision allowing the Labor Dept. to scrap the 30 percent rule.

Retired legislative aide June Pickett dies at 82

Naples, Fla.—June Pickett, a retired AFL-CIO legislative aide, died recently of a heart attack in Naples, Fla. She was 82 years old.

She joined the CIO legislative department in 1943, and later was on the federation's legislative staff until her retirement in 1968. She was a member of the Newspaper Guild.

A memorial service was held in Naples. She is survived by two sisters.

Union fund helps jobless members avert foreclosure

The Sheet Metal Workers unveiled a nationwide rescue plan for unemployed members to provide foreclosure protection on homes and cars.

SMW President Edward J. Carlough said in announcing the industry-funded program that thousands of the union's members are on the edge of financial ruin as a result of the depressed economy.

"Many are now facing foreclosures—losing their homes and cars," he said. "We felt that something had to be done."

The backbone of the rescue plan is the Stabilization Agreement for the Sheet Metal Industry, funded by employer contributions of 3 percent of gross wages. It was established to provide "underemployment" benefits and health and welfare premium payments to jobless members. The fund has a balance of $32.4 million, Carlough reported.

Monthly payments

He said that beginning Feb. 1, payments would be made monthly to help members who qualify to meet mortgage, rent and car payments.

"We view this action as an emergency step to deal with the hardships many workers are facing," said Carlough. "In the long run, we need a change in economic policies that will bring about long-term growth. But until we put our nation back to work, we believe state and federal aid should be provided and a national moratorium on foreclosures should be declared with the government guaranteeing loans."

Carlough said the SASMI fund is financially sound, even though it paid out $25.5 million in unemployment, health and welfare, travel and training funds in 1982.

The fund covers about 40,000 of the union's 100,000 members in the construction industry. Of that number, about 8,000 are unemployed and about a third of those have established eligibility for benefits by working a minimum number of hours.

ITC supports motorcycle import curbs

Milwaukee — The Allied Industrial Workers welcomed the International Trade Commission's recommendation of a sharp increase in tariffs on large imported motorcycles as a partial response to the union's concerns.

"We are pleased but not satisfied," said Jerry Knackert, president of AIW Local 209 whose members build Harley-Davidson motorcycles here. Harley-Davidson Motor Co., the only American company still making motorcycles, had sought trade relief from the ITC, charging that Japanese imports severely cut its sales and profits and caused the layoff of 1,600 workers—40 percent of its workforce.

"While the ITC recommendation does give the domestic motorcycle industry the relief it needs, it does not address the total problem," said Knackert, who pleaded the union's case before the agency last Nov. 30.

Fading protection

By a 2-to-1 vote, the ITC decided that the existing 4.4-percent import duty on motorcycles with engines of 700 cubic centimeters or larger should be increased to 49.4 percent in the first year of an import relief program to help the domestic industry. The duty would drop to 39.4 percent in the second year, 24.4 percent in the third year, 19.4 percent in the fourth year, and 14.4 percent in the fifth year before reverting to the current 4.4 percent rate.

Without such relief, Harley-Davidson had warned, the company might have to close its doors.

The problem with the ITC recommendation, which is subject to White House review, is that it lumps the manufacturing affiliates of two Japanese companies in with the U.S. domestic motorcycle industry, Knackert said.

Honda of Ohio and Kawasaki of Nebraska assemble engines and power train sub-assemblies, which account for some 75 percent of the costs of a large motorcycle, and market them in the United States. These imported components would not be subject to the higher tariff.

Domestic content

"It is outrageous that a manufacturer should be considered domestic, when only about 25 percent of the cost to produce the motorcycle is domestic cost," Knackert charged. "Tariffs should be imposed on the motorcycle and all the motorcycle-related parts."

Under federal trade law, President Reagan has until late March to accept, reject or alter the ITC recommendation.

While the higher U.S. import duties would primarily affect imports of assembled heavy motorcycles from Japan, they would also apply to machines imported in smaller volume from such countries as West Germany, Italy, and Britain.

'We've Got the Fever Down!'

For social security

Panel members split over retirement age

The bipartisan consensus reached by the National Commission on Social Security Reform did not include a labor-opposed plan to raise the retirement age and reduce social security benefits of those who retire earlier.

A majority of commission members—those selected by President Reagan and Republican congressional leaders—favored raising the normal retirement age from 65 to 66, with the phase-in starting at the turn of the century. It would be raised further if longevity tables showed Americans living to older ages.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and the four other commission members chosen by Democratic congressional leaders strongly disagreed. They said a rise in the retirement age would amount to a reduction of benefits.

Because of the sharp differences on the issue, the two sides in effect "agreed to disagree." Each side issued a supplementary statement explaining its position.

The consensus recommendations that were sent to Congress as the framework for legislation would raise revenues sufficiently to meet the social security system's short-term needs and an estimated two-thirds of the long-term funding needs.

Shortfall estimate

That left an estimated shortfall, starting about the second decade of the new century, of slightly more than one-half of 1 percent of payroll subject to the social security tax.

The 10 Republican-named members advocated postponing the normal retirement age beyond 65 to meet future social security funding needs.

Eight of them joined in a statement asserting that "given sufficient notice, coming generations of beneficiaries can adjust to a later retirement age." They noted that "Americans are living longer" and suggested that the disability benefits program can be improved so as not to penalize workers who must stop work at an earlier age for health reasons.

The Democratic appointees—Robert M. Ball, Martha Keys, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), in addition to Kirkland—challenged this reasoning.

"We should not cut benefits in an attempt to keep older people at work," they insisted.

The commission's consensus recommendations would raise the additional payments for those retiring after 65, but it would not reduce benefits for others, their statement noted.

Full employment

"The best medicine for social security is full employment and economic growth," the five Democratic appointees stressed.

To deal with the long-term revenue shortage projected by the commission, they suggested a standby rise of 0.46 percent in the payroll tax on workers and employers, starting in the year 2010 if the revenue were still needed then.

The standby plan would be set up, they proposed, with awareness that before it was to take effect Congress might choose an alternative means of closing the funding gap, such as using general revenue instead of the payroll tax.

The same group also urge consideration of legislation that would introduce the concept of "earnings sharing" among married couples that would recognize "the right of each individual to a retirement income based on half of the total retirement credits earned by the couple during their marriage." Thus, working women "would have a continuous record of social security credits when they retire instead of zero credits for years spent in the home."

There are technical problems still to be worked out in this area but "these are not insurmountable," their statement insisted.

In another area, they proposed administering social security through an independent agency under a bipartisan board to improve its operation "and strengthen public confidence in the integrity of the program."

Kirkland's dissent

While citing their support of the consensus recommendations, the statement by the five Democratic appointees took note of the fact that Kirkland had not joined in the recommendation to bring new federal employees under social security.

Kirkland's separate statement in that area stressed the guarantees to which government workers are entitled before there is any tampering with their retirement system. Their concerns should not be shunted aside because Congress is looking for additional revenues for social security, he said.

Kirkland's statement on this point also proposed as a substitute source of funding a requirement that employers pay their share of the social security tax on their entire payrolls, not just the portion now subject to the social security tax.

Leadership Conference on Civil Rights awards ceremony: Lane Kirkland, Douglas Fraser, Rosina Tucker and Benjamin Hooks.

Civil rights leaders brand Reagan record 'disastrous'

The social and economic policies of the Reagan Administration are making the struggle for equal opportunity a major civil rights challenge of the 1980s, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights charged at its 33rd annual meeting here.

LCCR Chairperson Benjamin L. Hooks, who is also executive director of the NAACP, characterized the Reagan Administration's record on civil rights as "disastrous."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the participants that the labor and civil rights movements were well aware they had to disregard the advice of cautious politicians to "give Reaganomics a chance."

Judgment vindicated

"Our movements knew that Reaganomics was a disaster, and our people couldn't afford to wait . . . and we were right," Kirkland said.

The "backbone" of the success of the 1981 Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington to protest the Reagan policies was the "alliance of the trade union and civil rights movements," Kirkland declared.

The AFL-CIO president spoke to the 600 conference participants at a banquet to present LCCR's annual Hubert H. Humphrey Civil Rights Awards to Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser and 101-year-old Mrs. Rosina Tucker of Washington, D.C., who played a critical role in the early organizing efforts of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

He praised Mrs. Tucker as "a symbol of the great struggle" that led to the creation of the union and "that projected onto the world stage" its first president, A. Philip Randolph, "one of the great leaders of the 20th century."

Kirkland noted that Fraser "enlisted in the fight for equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity" in 1934 when he became a shop steward in Chrysler Corp.'s DeSoto plant in Detroit.

"Not many Americans are old enough to remember the violence and danger that surrounded union organizers in those days," Kirkland said. But he reminded the civil rights leaders that "those of you who marched at Selma and elsewhere in the South in the 1960s can imagine what the Detroit of the 1930s was like."

The auto companies could count on "their own mercenary armies" as well as the help of the city and state police, the courts, the National Guard, bankers, merchants and landlords "to keep workers in their place and to try to intimidate union leaders like Doug Fraser," he said.

But they did not succeed, he said, because "men like Doug Fraser are not easily intimidated, nor can they be bought."

Panel discussions at the conference focused on jobs, the economy and equal employment opportunity, women's economic equity issues and segregation in housing and education.

Legislative agenda

The meeting included a briefing session on LCCR's 1983 legislative agenda with members of Congress, followed by visits to other legislators on Capitol Hill.

The Leadership Conference is a coalition of more than 150 national organizations representing blacks, Asian and Hispanic Americans, labor, major religious groups, women, the elderly, the handicapped, as well as minority businesses and professions concerned with the advancement of civil rights through enactment and enforcement of federal legislation.

It was founded in 1950 by Randolph, former NAACP director Roy Wilkins and Arnold Aronson, LCCR's former secretary.

Television series on labor history begins production

Production is scheduled to begin in February on the first in a series of public television labor history programs, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and other backers of the Made in U.S.A. project announced.

The initial feature, titled The Killing Floor, will depict the struggle of Chicago packinghouse workers to organize their union, which is now part of the Food & Commercial Workers. It will be aired on the PBS network's American Playhouse.

The project is the first major series on labor designed for prime-time programming. More than 30 unions, the AFL-CIO and IUD contributed funds to the project.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said labor's participation reflects the decision to "join the new age of communications . . . as vigorous, sophisticated participants to make sure working America is fairly and honestly portrayed through the pervasive power of television."

IUD Media Committee Chairman J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers, said the role of labor in American life has been largely ignored or distorted by schools and television.

"Presentation of the first production of Made in U.S.A. on national public television is a positive step toward bringing about a change in the public perception," Turner said.

Real wages drop despite inflation ease-up

Inflation slowed markedly in 1982, increasing 3.9 percent as measured by the government's consumer price index, but the advance still outstripped workers' purchasing power, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Real earnings, the inflation-adjusted income of production and nonsupervisory workers in the private sector, declined one-tenth of 1 percent during 1982 despite a five-tenths of 1 percent rise in December, BLS said. The decline followed a drop of 2.4 percent during the previous 12-month period.

Gross weekly earnings in December averaged $270.92, compared with $269.97 the month before. But after adjustment for the impact of inflation since 1977, December weekly earnings averaged only $167.65.

In its report on consumer prices, BLS noted that the 1982 inflation rate was the lowest annual rise since a 3.4-percent increase in 1972 when wage and price controls were in effect. The CPI posted a seasonally adjusted three-tenths of 1 percent decline in December, BLS reported.

The slowdown in consumer prices generally reflected the recession-induced weakness of the American economy. Economists attribute the drop in the inflation rate to the Administration-supported policies of the Federal Reserve Board, which restricted the supply of money. The tight-money policies pushed interest rates to record levels and plunged the economy into a recession.

Why price rise slowed

"The decline in prices primarily reflects the renewed decline in the economy," said Jerry Jasinowski, chief economist for the National Association of Manufacturers. As businesses are forced to offer discounts to get rid of unsold surpluses, "it is inevitable that prices would fall," he said.

While interest rates have begun to recede, analysts warn that heavy federal borrowing to finance growing budget deficits could reverse the trend. FRB Chairman Paul Volcker expressed concern that the threat of "huge" budget deficits could interfere with the Fed's efforts to set a monetary course that balances the need for economic recovery with the need for stable prices.

In reporting the December drop in consumer prices, BLS said that most of the decline was accounted for by decreases in housing costs. Mortgage interest rates fell 4.8 percent over the month. Without this decline, the CPI would have been up two-tenths of 1 percent, BLS said. The index rose an adjusted one-tenth of 1 percent in November.

The 1982 increase in the CPI compared with a rise of 8.9 percent in 1981, 12.4 percent in 1980, and 13.3 percent in 1979.

While last year's slowdown was broadly based, BLS said it was most apparent in those sectors which had been largely responsible for the substantial increases in recent years. In particular, the bureau said, the decline in mortgage interest costs and the moderation in energy prices accounted for about three-fourths of the overall rise in the CPI last year.

Reaganomics assailed

Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale scores the Reagan Administration for clinging to economic policies that have driven the nation's unemployment rate to record highs while slashing funds for social programs to aid the jobless and the poor. Mondale spoke to more than 900 delegates to the Auto Workers' Community Action Program conference in Washington, D.C. At left is Owen Bieber, UAW vice president for General Motors.

Labor blasts bid to weaken protections for child labor

The proposed revisions to the Fair Labor Standards Act sought by the Reagan Administration would permit 14- and 15-year olds to work later at night and as long as 40 hours a week, depending on whether or not school was in session.

The Administration would also allow young teenagers to work in industries that until now have been considered too hazardous for them, including cooking and baking, laundry and dry cleaning, transportation, some other processing operations and certain construction tasks.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan wants broad authority to grant individual exemptions from compliance with the standards, and the department wants to drop the requirement that employers must reapply every year for certification to pay full-time students subminimum wages.

Storm of protest

Last August, after a storm of public protest, the Administration put the proposed changes on hold and extended the normal 30-day comment period to 180 days, which expired Jan. 13.

The Administration must now decide whether to issue the proposals as final regulations that could be challenged in court.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, testifying last year at a House subcommittee hearing, called the Reagan Administration's proposals a scheme to create a pool of "cheap kiddy labor" for the retail and service industries, among them fast food chains and amusement parks.

In the AFL-CIO statement, sent to the Employment Standards Administration by Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald, the federation cited evidence that children who participate in "work release programs" or who have after school jobs on the average achieve lower grades, have higher absentee and dropout rates, and engage in greater use of drugs and alcohol than non-workers.

Hazardous jobs

The federation emphasized that the proposed changes would not only keep children on the job longer and later, but also permit them to work in jobs and workplaces that already have higher than average injury rates for adults.

Existing occupational health standards are based on adult exposure, and there is insufficient research on what the same hazards would do to growing children, the AFL-CIO warned.

The federation objected to the Administration's plans to drop the annual certification requirement for employers who pay subminimum wages, pointing out that the rule serves a valuable enforcement function, as was intended by Congress.

The Administration's argument that certificaiton is "an administrative burden" for employers is no excuse for the "nullification of a necessary enforcement device," the federation declared.

The AFL-CIO statement also insisted that the Administration's self-proclaimed "new proposal" to let the Secretary of Labor grant broad-brush waivers of "any or all of the restrictions" on children's occupations and hours opens a hole "into which the limitations which the statute imposes can—and predictably will—disappear."

Administrators are "not free to set aside what Congress has required, whatever their views as to its undesirability," the AFL-CIO declared.

It charged that the new regulations are a means of achieving "by weakened enforcement" what the industries who support them could not get Congress to change by law.

Donahue cites urgency

Congressional action pushed to create jobs

Congress must take the initiative in creating desperately needed jobs for American workers, "because it's clear the Administration will not," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared.

Donahue urged Congress to act quickly on programs to provide community development supplemental jobs, accelerated public works, and the construction and rehabilitation of low- and moderate-income housing.

"This is no time for business as usual," he asserted. "It is rather a time for expedited hearings, consideration and passage of programs to alleviate in some way the incredible and unacceptable level of unemployment."

Call for action

Donahue's call for congressional action came in a speech to the Public Sector Labor Relations Conference sponsored by the American Arbitration Association and the Labor-Management Relations Service of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The need for short-range emergency job creating measures is "extreme," Donahue said, adding that to sense the urgency "our elected leaders need only heed the message from the long lines at the unemployment offices and at the employer's door everytime a handful of jobs are offered."

He said community service development jobs should be created under a new program that would put people to work in traditional local government jobs using federal financing.

Earmarked funding

The funds, targeted to areas with high unemployment, would provide the easiest, quickest way to get money out "both for jobs and for easing the burden on financially strapped local governments," and at least 85 percent of the funds should be earmarked for employee compensation, Donahue said.

He noted that every city planner has lists of needed community repair and service projects, and the program would be "a sound investment with a quick return as taxpayers take the place of the unemployed."

An accelerated public works program is essential, Donahue said, because public investments have fallen "so far behind in providing basic support facilities" like bridges, roads, water and sewer systems, transportation and port facilities.

Effective job generator

He pointed out that a Commerce Dept. study of the 1976 Public Works Act that helped pull the nation out of the 1974-75 recession showed that the $6 billion spent generated 110,000 on-site jobs, 66,000 jobs in supply industries and an additional 249,000 jobs throughout the economy.

In most cases, Donahue noted, decisions on applications for the program were made within 60 days, and construction was started on the projects within 90 days and finished in an average 10.4 months. Most of the projects, he said, cost less than $500,000.

Donahue urged Congress to act on the 14 federal public works programs already on the books which only need appropriations, and he called for government action to spur construction and rehabilitation of low-income and moderate-income housing which was "a particular victim" of high interest rates.

Coordinated policy needed

Over the long range, Donahue said, the nation needs a coordinated industrial policy "that systematically includes the views of labor, industry and the public."

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO has proposed the creation of a National Reindustrialization Board with representatives from labor, business and government working on "a balanced program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities while developing new industries with promise for the future."

Action is also needed "to correct such mistakes as a too-stringent monetary policy" and an attitude toward "free trade" that "exports our industrial base," Donahue stressed.

Health care loss adds to ills of jobless

pitals that have received federal funds are required to treat people residing in surrounding communities, provide a certain amount of free services and emergency care to persons unable to pay.

According to Labor Dept. studies, most workers lose health insurance benefits immediately or within a month of layoff. Only 20 percent continue protection beyond three months.

Fraser, who is president of the Auto Workers, said that although it is often possible for laid-off workers to convert group policies to individual policies, the costs are prohibitive for those existing on unemployment insurance. For example, the family premium for a UAW-General Motors policy in Michigan is about $300 a month. An individual policy with substantially fewer benefits costs $200 a month.

He cited a recent situation where an unemployed man who used stolen insurance papers to get surgery for his bleeding ulcers was sentenced to five years in prison.

Unlike other nations

"It's a shameful commentary on the quality of life in America that a man should go to jail because he desperately needed medical care. In almost all industrialized nations of the world, even when health insurance is financed by employer funds, health insurance protection continues without a break during periods of unemployment," Fraser noted.

Although unions, charity organizations and some doctors, hospitals, business groups and health insurance providers are working together to mobilize health care services for the unemployed, Fraser said, they cannot provide "a response commensurate with the size of the problem."

"This intolerable situation would not have existed if Congress had enacted a universal, comprehensive, national health insurance program such as the labor movement and many other progressive organizations have recommended," Fraser said.

Stopgap aid needed

While national health insurance remains a goal of organized labor, Fraser said, stopgap measures are needed immediately to take care of the present emergency.

He urged Congress to consider requiring continuation of insurance coverage of laid-off workers for a longer period and shorter delays in coverage of new hires, changing Medicaid eligibility to cover the unemployed, providing public financing for continuation of a worker's group health insurance, and providing a minimum package of basic health insurance benefits for the unemployed for a limited period.

A plan containing some of these provisions is to be sponsored by Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.). It also includes a long-term plan under which employers would receive tax incentives to continue insurance coverage for unemployed workers.

Another possibility being considered by Congress is to extend Medicare benefits to cover the unemployed. This would have cost an estimated $6 billion in fiscal 1983, and some members of the House panel expressed doubt that Congress would agree to add that much money to already huge federal deficits.

Fraser said any plan to provide reasonable health protection for the unemployed and their families "would not be cheap." However, he said, "the country is going to pay for it sooner or later" and the costs of sickness, disability and death which accompany health neglect may be greater the longer such a plan is postponed. He said the money could be found in the federal budget if "we reorder our priorities."

A panel of four unemployed workers described to the subcommittee what it's like to face health problems without insurance.

Judy Duperry, a member of UAW Local 626 in Bristol, Conn., was refused treatment at a Hill-Burton hospital for her six-year-old son who has borderline leukemia.

Out-of-pocket expense

Camille Laskowski, a member of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, who lives in Elmhurst, N.Y., faces costs of $100 a month for medicines she must take for heart and pancreas ailments plus cystic fibrosis and arthritis.

Mary Williams, a member of Steelworkers Local 2609 in Baltimore, is $2,300 in debt to a hospital for five days of treatment for possible gall stones.

Issac Emerson, a truck driver from York, Pa., has had to pay hundreds of dollars for emergency health care for himself and his four children since his layoff, on top of financial pressures of gas and electricity cutoffs and possible foreclosure on his home. He has had to put off treatment of his children for chronic tonsilitis and heart problems.

Defense issue tied to state of economy

By James M. Shevis

A strong defense is necessary for national security but must not be mounted on the backs of Americans suffering from the effects of the Reagan Recession, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared.

"Social spending should be driven by social needs. Defense spending should be driven by the external threat to our security," Kirkland said in a speech before the National Strategy Information Center in Washington. The center is a public policy organization devoted to national security education.

Kirkland stressed that Americans should not have to choose between losing their jobs or losing their freedom.

"We pointed out at our last convention," he said, "that 'it is the constitutional responsibility of government to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare'—not to choose between the two."

Needed: a strong economy

Both of these constitutional mandates can be supported by a healthy and growing economy, fully employing all those who want and are able to work, the AFL-CIO maintains. However, Kirkland added, "we are compelled to consider the defense budget not only in the security context, but in the budgetary and economic context which has been imposed upon us by this Administration."

The U.S. economy is not healthy, growing or fully employed today thanks to President Reagan's supply-side economic policy, Kirkland declared.

"Instead of the recovery we were promised, we are in the midst of the worst and longest recession since the Great Depression," he observed. "Instead of the balanced budget we were promised, we face unprecedented federal deficits. Instead of the growth of business investment we were promised, we see a decline.

Economic constraints

"I could go on. The point is that the Administration and the Congress have defined the terms of the debate on defense spending. We did not. . . . We have to approach defense spending in terms of the budgetary and economic constraints imposed by the President's policies and their consequences."

As a result of tax cuts for the rich and increased defense spending at the expense of reductions in social programs, a backlash against the Administration's defense budget has arisen, Kirkland noted. And the pressure has come not only from liberal Democrats, but from mainstream Republicans and businessmen.

The response of Defense Sec. Caspar Weinberger has been to accept some cuts —cuts that would deny pay increases to the military "working class," thus undermining the morale on which the nation's all-volunteer army is based and risking the loss of skilled personnel, Kirkland said. Training exercises also would be curtailed, adversely affecting the readiness of conventional military forces, he noted, adding:

"So much for rearming America as the top priority of this Administration."

Kirkland pointed out that American labor has historically supported a strong national defense, not to provide jobs, but as a necessary precondition for the survival of democratic institutions, including free trade unions. He said the AFL-CIO had no quarrel with President Reagan's plan to build up the country's defense, only with the means by which he proposed to do so.

"We said that if defense was the top priority, as the President told us, we should pay for it—and that our willingness to do so would send a strong signal to Moscow that the American people had the will to do what was necessary to defend their freedom," Kirkland recalled, noting that the AFL-CIO at the time proposed a progressive surtax on individual and corporate income to finance Reagan's proposed increases in defense spending.

Reagan's way

"The President said no. He said we didn't have to tax ourselves to pay for defense. We could cut social programs, and we could count on increased revenues from the new prosperity that supply-side economics would generate," Kirkland said. "He won, we lost—so far.

"I do not wish to debate in this forum the theory of supply-side economics. Perhaps, as some still insist, it will fulfill its promise in the sweet bye-and-bye. But as of today, it has not."

In an analysis of labor's role in American foreign policy, Kirkland said free trade unionists here and abroad often are better informed and have deeper contacts than the people who make policy from their desks at the State Dept.

Foreign policy split

"The American labor movement does not recognize that split between ideals and self-interest that has plagued the foreign policy debate in this country," he said. "Simply stated, we have a vested interest in the promotion of free trade unionism and the elevation of labor standards throughout the world."

Free trade unions around the world are the natural expression of the plain people in the streets, as Poland demonstrated, Kirkland said. What unions need is government assurance of freedom of association, which is "the ultimate guarantor of all other human rights."

That is lost in the murky world of the longstanding foreign policy debate in the United States, where "liberal vs. conservative" bogs down in whether standards, or perhaps sanctions, should be applied more vigorously to authoritarian or to totalitarian regimes, Kirkland said. While sometimes intellectually interesting, he said, this debate "has proven sterile."

Consumer interests pressed in bankruptcy law revision

The current high rate of business and personal bankruptcies makes speedy resolution of the status of the nation's federal bankruptcy court system "imperative," the AFL-CIO told Congress.

But reform of the court system must not be used as a shield for creditors to prey on consumers hard hit by the Reagan Recession, the federation declared. Banks, small loan companies and other lenders are pressuring Congress to pass new legislation to make it harder for individuals to get relief during serious financial crises. They insist these changes be made at the same time Congress changes the structure of bankruptcy courts.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary subcommittee, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold charged that those in the credit industry who would try to link the issues are doing a disservice to the many businesses, institutions, and individuals who are now—or will soon be—embroiled in bankruptcy proceedings.

Industry tactics

"Even Shylock would have been ashamed of being associated with the overreaching" of the credit industry in its attempts to erode consumer protections in the Bankruptcy Act, Gold said.

A much more pressing issue before Congress, however, is the Supreme Court's finding last June that 1978 congressional revisions of the bankruptcy court system are unconstitutional. In its ruling, the high court said that the system put too much authority in the hands of bankruptcy court judges and allowed them to decide crucial matters outside the scope of bankruptcy actions.

The Supreme Court said that that power can be exercised only by federal judges with life tenure and protections against salary cuts in accordance with Article III of the Constitution. Bankruptcy judges serve 14-year terms.

The court twice stayed its decision to give Congress time to restructure bankruptcy jurisdictions so they would meet the constitutional test. But the lawmakers became deadlocked over how to revise the handling of bankruptcies.

Interim rules

Since Dec. 24, when the court's judgment went into effect, federal bankruptcies have been handled by federal district courts, with uncontested matters referred to bankruptcy judges, under interim rules set forth by the U.S. Judicial Conference, the top policymaking body of the federal courts.

In effect, the nation's bankruptcy courts have been operating in limbo since Christmas. At a time when as many as half a million new bankruptcies are expected in a single year, no one is sure what powers the bankruptcy courts have or do not have.

Gold told the Judiciary subcommittee that the AFL-CIO supports any of three proposals for dealing with the Supreme Court's directive that Congress should put the bankruptcy system on a sound constitutional basis. At the same time, he stressed labor's opposition to a proposal that would give bankruptcy judges life tenure and allow them to rule on matters other than bankruptcy.

Shifting emphasis

"If bankruptcy judges were to be permitted to hear non-bankruptcy cases, there is a clear possibility that such non-bankruptcy cases would take precedence over pending bankruptcy litigation," said Gold.

During the lame duck session, the consumer credit industry lobbied heavily for what the AFL-CIO branded as ill-conceived changes in the federal consumer bankruptcy laws. As much as any other factor, Gold stressed, this effort was responsible for the deadlock over the Supreme Court's mandate regarding the bankruptcy court system.

The industry's proposals, Gold said, "were little more than an effort to give special consideration to the credit industry in this time of national economic crisis by having the bankruptcy courts serve as a debt-collection agency with taxpayers footing the bill."

Kenneth Crawford dies, former Guild president

Kenneth G. Crawford, the Newspaper Guild's second president, died at his home in Washington Jan. 13 of lung cancer. He was 80 years old.

Crawford served out Heywood Broun's term after the Guild's founding president died in 1939. Prior to that, he had been first vice president of the Guild's Washington local.

His journalism career spanned 46 years, including 27 years with Newsweek magazine.

Draft of electronic media guide is reviewed by Rozanne Weissman, left, Communications Workers public relations director, Labor Institute of Public Affairs cable consultant Kathy Garmezy and LIPA staff member Karla Wright, at the keyboard.

Public affairs branch issues television guide for unions

A guide to the electronic media keyed to the needs of labor organizations is being prepared by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs for distribution in March.

The first two chapters of the new, looseleaf manual, called the Labor Communications Resource Service, will cover cable television franchising and programming and the purchasing of video equipment.

LIPA, the AFL-CIO's television planning and production branch, said one copy of the manual will be sent free to all affiliated unions, state federations and regional directors as well as to central labor councils in communities where cable television is now under consideration by local officials.

LIPA will distribute new chapters of the manual during 1983 as they become available. Future topics will include techniques for satellite teleconferences, LIPA's own labor communications inventory, information on television programming, communications regulation and new data services.

Kathy Garmezy, LIPA's cable TV consultant, is preparing the cable manual in conjunction with an advisory committee of union communications directors. LIPA said the chapter will be directed toward individual union members who want to get involved in the cable franchising processes in their communities.

The information on selecting and purchasing video equipment was prepared by another LIPA consultant, Mark Shubin, an Emmy Award-winning engineer.

LIPA said the printed materials in the manual have been prepared so that they can easily be photocopied for use in workshops and for distribution to local unions or other organizations.

For labor organizations who want to subscribe to the service directly, LIPA will make the looseleaf binder, two current chapters and the rest of the 1983 mailings available for $10.

The deadline for orders is Mar. 1. Checks, accompanied by a request on official letterhead, should be sent to Labor Institute of Public Affairs, Labor Communications Resource Service, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Room 406, Washington, D.C. 20006.

begin to slip, he calls for bipartisanship."

Reagan will be spelling out his Administration's proposals in greater detail in the budget proposals that will soon be sent to Congress. But these are some of the measures he outlined in his State of the Union message:

- A freeze of most domestic programs at current levels, without allowance for inflation. This would amount to a cutback in constant dollars. The President also said he will ask Congress to cut back on food stamp entitlements so that only the "truly needy" will be helped.
- A one-year freeze for federal civilian and military pay and pension programs.
- An employment program keyed to giving tax credits to employers who hire the long-term unemployed, providing some additional job training funds, more tax breaks for businesses under a revised Enterprise Zones proposal, and improving "incentives" for employers to hire youths for summer jobs. The temporary program of federal supplemental unemployment compensation would be given another short-term renewal.
- A new trade strategy that the President said will "promote free trade and the increased flow of American goods, services and investments." Reagan promised to work with Congress to shape a self-financing port improvement measure.

Other segments of the President's speech included an education program composed of tax credits for parents who send children to private schools, grants to further math and science instruction and a constitutional amendment to allow "voluntary" school prayer.

He promised legislation to provide catastrophic illness insurance coverage for older Americans and endorsed the bipartisan recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Reagan also proposed a cumbersome stand-by surtax starting in fiscal 1986 that would take effect "only if Congress has first approved our spending freeze and budget control program."

Tax indexing

But Congress, he insisted, should not tamper with the tax cuts already scheduled—including a 10 percent reduction in July and future indexing of tax brackets.

The most influential Republicans in Congress have already said they want no part of Reagan's standby tax plan, but its inclusion in the budget presumably would allow the Administration to project a future balanced budget despite record high deficits in the years immediately ahead.

The President also said he supported renewal of the Civil Rights Commission, an unspecified stronger enforcement of fair housing laws, enactment of the labor-opposed Caribbean Basin Initiative and a revised version of his "new federalism."

As he has in the past, Reagan blamed the nation's economic ills on "problems we inherited" from previous administrations.

Kirkland said in response to questions from reporters that the President's freeze and cutback program is both "wrong" and "unfair." The heaviest blow would fall on social programs that have already been cut back the most during the Administration's first two years.

Fair for a few

While proposing more cuts in help for the poor, Reagan continues to defend "the exorbitant tax abatements and tax breaks and public subsidies that corporate America still enjoys." These amount to a potential Treasury loss of hundreds of billions of dollars in needed revenue over the years ahead, Kirkland noted.

"If that's fair," he added, "I don't know the meaning of the word."

Extension of the temporary unemployment insurance benefits program is a welcome proposal, Kirkland said, even though it merely changes the ending date of the legislation and does not provide any additional payments to those who have already exhausted its benefits.

"But it's only a drop in the bucket," Kirkland stressed. "There should be provisions made for those millions who have lost their health insurance coverage and can't pay their medical bills for themselves or their families during those periods of unemployment, and who stand in danger of eviction."

These are among the problems that should have been addressed in President Reagan's State of the Union message, Kirkland said. But they weren't.

CORRECTION

An article in the Jan. 22 issue about Long Island Rail Road negotiations incorrectly referred to the American Railway & Airway Supervisors Association as a non-affiliate of the AFL-CIO. The Supervisors merged with the Railway & Airline Clerks in August 1980, and are now a division of BRAC.

labor studies

Five institutes will be offered at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in February. Several AFL-CIO affiliates and local bodies will use the Silver Spring campus for their own programs during the month, as will the American Institute for Free Labor Development. The schedule:

Introduction to Computers, Feb. 6-11—A quick course for representatives of unions thinking of converting to computer systems. It covers the jargon, hardware and software, shopping for computers and services, the need for outside technicians and staff training.

Negotiating Techniques for Bargaining with State and Local Agencies, Feb. 6-11—After one day on preparation with emphasis on budgets and audits, participants will attempt to bargain an agreement in a typical public sector situation.

Organizing Techniques I, Feb. 13-18—A program for full-time staff members who have organizing responsibilities. Participants will examine the elements of a successful campaign: the initial survey, in-plant committees, house calls, winning issues, and the final election. The exercise will be video taped for critique.

Arbitration: Preparation and Presentation, Feb. 27-Mar. 4—An institute concentrating on presenting mock cases before professional arbitrators who share their knowledge with the participants. The proceedings are video taped for playback and critique by the arbitrator.

Newswriting and Editing for Union Publications, Feb. 27-Mar. 4—A workshop for union editors, co-sponsored by the International Labor Press Association, to help make newsletters and bulletins more readable and more useful to members.

An institute for building trades business agents will also be offered at the University of Oregon, Eugene, Feb. 27-Mar. 4.

Using the George Meany Center for their own staff training next month will be the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO, Feb. 4; State, County & Municipal Employees, Feb. 6-11; Communications Workers, Feb. 13-25; Baltimore Building Trades Council, Feb. 17-18; Newspaper Guild, Feb. 18-21; and Fire Fighters, Feb. 27-Mar. 4.

AIFLD will have 40 Spanish-speaking trade union leaders from 17 Latin American countries on campus until Feb. 18. They're studying social security and job protection and labor relations in the public sector.

Enrollment is now open for two March institutes: Labor Law, Mar. 6-11, and Union Skills for Women Workers, Mar. 20-25.

Information about these and other labor studies programs is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

States, cities feel brunt of federal cuts

mean that the burden for the massive defense buildup has been borne by those who depend on state and local government services. We believe the priorities of the federal government must be reversed."

He pointed out that federal dollars account for 22 percent of the average state budget and, to make up for the reductions, state and local governments have sought to fill the gap with "generally regressive tax increases at the local level."

PED Executive Director John F. Leyden, in detailing specific effects of the cuts, pointed out that the child nutrition program has been cut by one-third, employment and training assistance by more than half, the work-incentive program by just under 40 percent, block grants for schools by over 40 percent, and low-income home energy assistance by one-fourth.

Faulty notion

Leyden and McEntee charged that President Reagan has "consistently held the erroneous notion that government spending is the natural enemy of business expansion and economic development."

Leyden observed that the full impact of the cuts ultimately will show up in decreased labor productivity and a diminished ability to compete in increasingly tough international markets. He stressed the need for rapid development of worker skills suited to an increasingly high-tech, service-oriented world. Yet, he noted the Reagan response to this need has been to "radically reduce the federal role in education, training and human capital areas."

The report, Leyden pointed out, shows that while the federal aid programs were originally targeted to regions that needed them most, the reductions in aid are hurting "those very areas that could afford them the least."

Regional losses

He cited the New England area which has suffered the highest per capita cuts in low-income energy assistance, while the Midwest has been hit hard by reductions in employment and training programs. Nutrition programs have been reduced most severely in the South, and highway programs have been slashed most deeply in the West.

The report recalled that in Reagan's 1982 State of the Union message, the President outlined a "new federalism" program whereby the federal government would assume complete funding of Medicaid, if the states took over food stamps and aid to families with dependent children. A year later, no legislation has yet been forwarded to Congress to carry out the program.

Reagan's fiscal 1983 budget, however, proposed $78.1 billion of cuts in federal aid to the states, of which Congress approved $57 billion—much of it in programs targeted by the Administration for turnback to the states.

New drop forecast in industrial spending

Business spending for new plant and equipment in 1983 will drop 5.2 percent on the heels of a 4.8 percent decline last year, the Commerce Dept. forecast.

The department's Bureau of Economic Analysis noted that this will be the first time since 1948 that capital spending by American non-farm businesses has slumped two years in a row. By contrast, business spending increased 8.7 percent in 1981 and 9.3 percent in 1980.

Makers of non-durable manufactured goods expect to spend 7.6 percent less this year, adjusted for inflation, while durable goods firms plan a 3.5 percent cut, the BEA said.

In the non-manufacturing sector, the outlook is for a spending drop of 5.1 percent, adjusted for inflation. Public utilities plan the largest drop, about 9.3 percent, the survey found.

Supply Side II?

THE TAX CUT that Congress enacted in 1981 at the bidding of the Reagan Administration was enormously generous to America's corporations.

Tax credits were piled on tax credits, loopholes were enlarged, and new depreciation rules added a thick layer of frosting to the cake.

The huge revenue loss that resulted from that misguided experiment in supply-side economics has contributed mightily to the record federal deficits we are now experiencing. But if the President has his way, it may just be the beginning.

Mr. Reagan tells us in his State of the Union address that he does, indeed, sympathize with the fate of the unemployed and "we must all do everything in our power to bring their ordeal to an end."

Unfortunately, the President can't think of much to help them except, perhaps, to cut back further on the food stamp program. But when he was meeting with a group of businessmen the next day, the President was just bubbling over with an idea that apparently had just occurred to him.

Let's do away with the corporate income tax entirely, Mr. Reagan suggested.

"I'll probobly kick myself for having said this," the President said genially, "but when are we going to have the courage to point out that in our tax structure the corporate tax is very hard to justify."

Eliminating the corporate income tax would allow all of a company's profits to be passed on to stockholders, he noted. This would please the richest 1 percent of the Americans who own more than 50 percent of all stock.

NOW THE wealthiest stockholders have already been the chief beneficiaries of the Administration's tax policies, and the corporate share of the tax burden has been shrinking steadily in recent years. But the process is apparently too slow for Mr. Reagan.

At the risk of being considered spoilsports, we must take note that elimination of the corporation tax would leave a gap of many billions of dollars in federal revenues. But that shouldn't be an unsurmountable problem for this Administration. Surely there are some remaining programs for the disadvantaged and the jobless that could be further curtailed.

Perhaps we could cut the pay and retirement benefits of government workers and the military, instead of just freezing them?

With a bit of imagination, that little problem could be overcome. After all, as the President has demonstrated, his Administration is not at a loss for semi-bright ideas.

More of the Same

TWO YEARS of economic experimentation have left America bruised by its worst postwar recession and strained by social conflict.

Our cities and towns are haunted with new armies of the unemployed; soup kitchens reminiscent of the 1930s abound, while essential public services deteriorate. Minority Americans find the gains they have made toward first-class citizenship over two decades reversed by deliberate government policies. Women are denied the opportunity to secure true equality.

Farmers in ever-growing numbers watch as the property into which they have poured their resources and energies is auctioned to pay high-interest loans. Small business investors are going into bankruptcy in alarming numbers.

This list of victims of misguided, unfair Administration policies grows every day. The only group standing immune from the pain of Reaganism is the small knot of wealthy individuals who have been carefully nurtured by this Administration.

The President's State of the Union message offers little hope that this Administration plans to change the disastrous policies of the last two years. We believe these policies must be changed.

'Aren't I the Fairest of Them All?'

Locking the barndoor

Raiders of U.S. Treasury exhibit anxiety belatedly

By Charles A. Vanik

It was interesting to read the "save the nation" program organized by Peter G. Peterson, Richard Nixon's Secretary of Commerce. In this effort, he is joined by almost all living former secretaries of the Treasury, many of whom now occupy powerful posts in the private sector. The group also includes corporate tycoons whose empires are—or soon will be—completely free from federal income taxation.

Where were these Monday morning quarterbacks during the hot days of August 1981 when the tax code of the United States—once branded the best and most fair in a world of tax injustice—was ravaged, massacred and raided of three quarters of a trillion dollars? The cult of trickle-down economics created a flash flood that has plunged into a fiscal morass. Which of the Peterson Wise Men stood up to say: "Stop it, you are taking too much?"

Look at the Peterson proposals to hurt thee and not them. At a time when the American consumer is facing gas bills increasing at a rate ranging between 25 percent and 40 percent, he proposes $60 billion in new energy taxes to be passed on to the consumer.

People bear brunt

Although he recommends a $25 billion cut in defense spending, it is only 10 percent of the saving effort. Almost 90 percent of the tax recovery comes from the retired, the social security recipient and the individual taxpayer.

His plan makes no effort to recover tax losses from the corporate sector which he and his pals represent. The fiscal disaster of 1981, the misbranded "Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981," removed almost all corporate taxpayers from the federal income tax laws. If any of them are paying taxes, it will develop that they are paying only on a temporary basis; they get it back in refunds. In many cases they are making tax loans to the federal government which may yield better rates of return than current money market investments.

These curious provisions of American tax law have no counterpart anywhere in the world. As long as the nation countenances these tax withdrawal provisions, the Treasury is a massive sieve. The corporations of America, particularly the large ones, have "drawing rights" on the Treasury which may well exceed $300 billion. And if the corporations draw it out of the Treasury, the taxpayer will be expected to make it up and pay it back.

In spite of difficult times for many Americans who try to survive after taxes, the fastest growing business in America is the sale of tax shelters. Human ingenuity reaches its zenith in the systems being designed to bypass the tax collector.

Instead of putting a cap on social security and the entitlement programs, why not put a cap on sheltered income? Why not limit the shelter to no more than 35 percent to 70 percent of ordinary income? Why not put a cap on the "biggies?" If the American people ever find out what goes on in the "shelter" business, they would explode with indignation and disgust. If the unemployed citizen could get back all of his previously paid taxes, he might be able to cope. If the large families of low or no income could sell or lease their dependency exemptions, they might need fewer food stamps.

Peter Peterson, I know that you are willing to pay a tax on your social security or give it up entirely; that is a matter of small bucks to you. But, are you willing to treat our budget deficit as a problem to be shared? Are you willing to extend the idea of a cap on write-offs and other perks in an even-handed way to the members of your club?

Charles A. Vanik retired from the House in 1980 after representing his northeast Ohio congressional district for 26 years. He was a senior member of the Ways & Means Committee. This article is in response to an advertised statement issued by a group of former government officials calling for changes in Reagan budget policies.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Kirkland Endorses Most Provisions of Social Security Commission's Plan

The advisory commission on Social Security, on which AFL-CIO President Kirkland served, recommended changes in benefits and taxes to strengthen the retirement plan. Kirkland endorsed the package, with one exception: mandatory Social Security coverage of newly hired federal and postal workers.

Federal employees should have the right to evaluate in advance the details of any proposal before they are asked to take this step. The commission proposal would not allow this. In his dissent, Kirkland urged that Congress remove the federal worker provision, and substitute a requirement that employers contribute to Social Security on the basis of total payrolls.

The commission plan, with the substitute provision, would give Social Security a net gain of $192 billion over the next seven years.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ADVISORY COMMISSION

Provision	$ Gain, 1983-89
Tax high-income retirees: Beneficiaries would pay income tax on half their Social Security benefits, if their adjusted gross income from all sources exceeded $20,000 per year for a single person or $25,000 for a married couple-----	$30 billion
Shift COLA time frame: This year's automatic cost-of-living increase would be delayed for six months, from July to January 1984, and thereafter would be paid in January of each year-----	$40 billion
Accelerate already-approved FICA tax increases: The Social Security tax rate already is scheduled to increase from 5.4% to 5.7% in 1985; under the new plan this would take place in 1984 (however, it would be at no cost because a refundable income tax credit would compensate for the Social Security tax increase). Later, the FICA tax rate for 1988-89 would be boosted to 6.06%-----	$40 billion
Rate change for the self-employed: Currently self-employed persons pay only three-quarters of the FICA tax an employer and employee pay together on an equal salary. This would be changed to the full combined employer-employee rate-----	$18 billion
Other provisions-----	$23 billion
~~Force federal employees into the system: New federal workers hired after Jan. 1, 1984 would be forced into the Social Security system instead of the current separate federal retirement system-----~~	$18 billion
TOTAL:	$169 billion
Substitute for federal employee inclusion: Require employers to pay Social Security taxes on total wages and salaries, not just the first $35,700 per employee-----	-$18 billion +$41 billion
SUBSTITUTE TOTAL:	$192 billion

Jobs Bills Taking Shape on Capitol Hill

Reaganomics has pushed unemployment to 10.8 percent--52 percent higher than two years ago. More than 20 million Americans are suffering unemployment or underemployment. And Administration officials predict that the jobless rate will rise above 11 percent in 1983.

The effects of joblessness are more severe than in previous recessions. The average duration of unemployment is 18 weeks, up from 13.5 weeks in December 1980. And only 47 percent of the unemployed are receiving any unemployment compensation.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Legislation is still taking shape on Capitol Hill. But it is not too early to write your legislators. Urge them to take quick action to create jobs and extend jobless benefits. Proposals supported by the AFL-CIO include:

JOBS: AFL-CIO PROPOSALS

1) Community Development Jobs Program: In every community, there is work to be done. The federal government can help put people to work in such areas as: child care for working mothers, traffic control, security for schools and housing projects, health screening and immunization, increased staff support for adult and juvenile correctional facilities.
2) Public Works: America's roads, bridges, water and sewer systems, schools, parks, transit and port facilities are deteriorating. Public works improvement has led the nation out of recession in the past, and can do so again.
3) Housing: Government support for housing can ease the shortage of homes while creating jobs in the construction industry, where one out of five workers is unemployed.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council will issue a more comprehensive economic recovery program during its February 1983 meeting.

REAGAN PROPOSALS

1) Youth Subminimum Wage: With 10 million adults unemployed, President Reagan insists that we need to bring more teenagers into the workforce by paying them $2.50 per hour. Congress repeatedly has rejected the concept of a wage lower than the $3.35 per hour minimum, because it will encourage employers to lay off adults and replace them with their children.
2) Job "Vouchers": It was the Reagan tax cuts for business that brought on high deficits, high interest rates, and recession, but Reagan officials think the solution to unemployment is...more tax cuts for business. Under the "voucher" scheme, the government in effect would pay businesses to hire people using their unemployment compensation. No matter what the question, the Reagan answer is more corporate tax cuts.
3) Every business hire one more person: The President's own aides are embarrassed by this one. While Reagan slashes the government payroll, he asks private business to take on workers they may not need. We need recovery, not wishful thinking.

ISSUES '83

Natural Gas: Take the Offensive, Bring Prices Down

During the 97th Congress of 1981-82, we were able to prevent the Reagan Administration from pushing its plans for faster decontrol of natural gas prices. But anyone who heats his or her home with natural gas knows that prices are still rising. That's because natural gas producers have forced gas pipeline companies to accept unfair contracts which include the following provisions:

- "Take or pay": Pipeline companies are required to pay for specified quantities of gas, even if lower consumer demand means that they cannot use all of the gas. Consumers are paying for gas they are not using.
- High-cost gas: Pipeline companies are required to buy hard-to-find, high-cost gas, even if low-cost gas is available.

The AFL-CIO will be leading the effort in the 98th Congress to pass new legislation to eliminate these unfair provisions and bring down natural gas prices. A future issue of the Alert! will provide more information on this.

Banks Push To Save Interest Withholding Loophole

Taxes are withheld from most workers' paychecks; this prevents a big tax bill at the end of the year and ensures greater tax compliance. Last year, Congress extended this idea to income from stock dividends and savings account interest. Starting July 1, taxes will be withheld at a 10 percent rate from interest and dividend checks. This is not a new tax, but only a means of making sure that those with unearned income actually pay the tax due. Because many--mostly fat cats--have failed to pay tax on this income in the past, the withholding provision is expected to raise $11 billion in tax revenues over the next three years.

Nevertheless, banking interests are pushing legislation, H.R. 500, to repeal the withholding provision. They claim that it's too much paperwork--even though small interest payments of less than $150 will be exempt.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to oppose H.R. 500. Withholding of taxes on unearned income should be as strict as on a worker's income.

Fight To Resume on Job-Export Caribbean Bill

President Reagan's Caribbean Basin legislation, which failed to achieve passage last year, unfortunately is not gone and forgotten. In his State of the Union address the President called it a "top legislative priority," and indications from Capitol Hill are that it could make quick progress in the new Congress.

The Reagan Caribbean bill is not written in a way that would benefit Caribbean workers or industry; it is so loosely drawn that nations anywhere in the world could funnel their products through the Caribbean in order to take advantage of special U.S. trade privileges. It would ease imports into the United States, and the export of jobs outside the country.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to oppose the job-exporting Reagan Caribbean Basin Initiative.

Reagan budget, economic report hold high-unemployment course

Report shuns measures to provide jobs

By James M. Shevis

President Reagan's 1983 economic report to Congress makes a mockery of the Humphrey-Hawkins Act requiring him to chart a path for attaining full employment, the AFL-CIO charged.

The 1978 statute, while not binding, called for future Administrations and Congresses to set their sights on lowering the nation's jobless rate to 4 percent in 1983. Instead, Reagan and his economic advisers forecast unemployment this year will average 10.7 percent, precious little improvement over last December's jobless rate of 10.8 percent.

"Worse yet," Federation Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald said, "unemployment would continue to remain above 8 percent through 1986 or at high recession levels for the next four years, according to Administration estimates.

"In spite of that, the President's economic report supports no jobs programs, but rather rails at all public works programs, distorting completely the favorable experience with public works in prior postwar recessions."

Money vs. misery

Rather than dealing with unemployment, Oswald charged, "the Administration shows its sympathy is clearly on the side of capital," and not the millions of Americans laid off and unable to find jobs because of the Reagan Recession.

"The report implies that workers like to be unemployed because they will receive unemployment insurance benefits," Oswald said. "The report fails to recognize the fact that it is employers who put workers out on the street."

Philosophically, the economic report clings to the "trickle-down" policies that marked the Administration's first two years. It is "a polemic for staying the course" of Reaganomics, Oswald charged.

"There is no recognition of the disastrous recessionary effects of the Administration's economic policies that cut social programs, increased defense outlays, cut taxes substantially for the wealthy and business, and raised interest rates to record high levels," Oswald observed.

Lane Kirkland testifying at House hearings on social security reform.

Most proposals backed

Coverage issue mars social security report

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged enactment of all but one of the consensus recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform at House hearings.

Kirkland, who served on the 15-member bipartisan commission, took exception to the proposal to bring new federal workers under social security instead of covering them in the civil service retirement system.

That's the sort of issue that should be explored and negotiated with federal and postal workers, not imposed on them, Kirkland insisted.

Future security

He told the House Ways & Means Committee that he supports the other consensus recommendations "because they are reasonable and because they offer the best opportunity to make the program secure for present retirees and future generations of workers."

The proposals, all designed to overcome a serious revenue gap resulting from a combination of high unemployment and high inflation, would keep existing benefits intact, except for a one-time, six-month postponement of the cost-of-living adjustment for beneficiaries. An acceleration of the payroll tax schedule would be offset in part by a tax credit. And state and local agencies that have elected social security coverage would have to stay in the system.

Kirkland told the House committee that he "reluctantly" went along with the one-time postponement of the cost-of-living adjustment because "the six-month delay was crucial to the consensus agreement and had to be weighed against the possibility of even more serious benefit cuts without it."

As for the revenue involved in the proposal to include federal workers, Kirkland suggested that "an excellent substitute source" that would bring in even more money would be to require employers to pay the social security tax on their full

Kirkland bids Congress to redo budget

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to reshape President Reagan's budget proposals and point America back on the road to full employment.

Reagan's budget blueprint would perpetuate "cruelly high unemployment" for years to come, Federation President Lane Kirkland charged. He termed it "bad news" for the nation.

The Reagan budget proposal would couple a big rise in military spending with further cutbacks in safety-net programs for the needy. It would run up a near-record deficit of $189 billion in fiscal 1984, the 12-month period starting next Oct. 1. But the deficit, labor economists stressed, is largely caused by high unemployment and the Administration's insistence on going ahead with another round of tax cuts tilted heavily to the wealthy.

"America clearly needs jobs, yet the President continues to reject all jobs programs," Kirkland pointed out.

Reagan told Congress that he remains "adamantly opposed" to using public jobs or public works programs to bring down unemployment.

Cuts on top of cuts

That would be "make-work," the President complained. At the same time, he called in his budget proposal for further cuts in food stamp entitlements and for a mandatory "workfare" program that would require able-bodied food stamp recipients to work off the value of their benefits.

Reagan's chief proposal for dealing with unemployment was a voucher plan that would allow the long-term jobless to trade away their entitlement to federal supplemental unemployment benefits for a certificate that would enable any employer who hired them to get a tax credit from the government. In effect, the employer would get the amount of the unemployment compensation payment that might otherwise have gone to the worker. That's supposed to provide an incentive

Support builds for jobs program

Democratic congressional leaders—and some Republicans, too—are saying that they're prepared to do battle with the White House to get jobs legislation enacted that will put a significant number of people to work and bring down the unemployment rate.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., and Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd have their staffs working to shape the outline of a Democratic jobs package—in the $5 billion to $10 billion range, according to news reports.

O'Neill called together all 25 House committee chairmen and emerged from a two-and-a-half-hour meeting to report unanimous agreement on early consideration of an emergency jobs package. Rep. Thomas S. Foley (Wash.), the assistant majority leader, was named to coordinate the shaping of the legislative package by the various committees involved.

Senate Republicans, meanwhile, have introduced a $2 billion bill for labor-intensive job programs and additional funds for job training.

No Reagan jobs bill

House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel (Ill.) told reporters "the President has heartburn" over the thought of a public works jobs bill. But his Senate counterpart, Majority Leader Howard Baker, said he is convinced that there will be a jobs bill "of some sort" that Congress will insist on. He said he "hopes" Reagan will end up supporting it.

In the post-election lame-duck session of the 97th Congress, the Democratic House added a $5.4 billion jobs package to a bill carrying funds to keep the government operating, and the Republican Senate inserted a smaller-scaled $2.1 billion plan. But a House-Senate conference dropped both measures in the face of a presidential veto threat.

Another sign of GOP rebellion came in resolutions introduced in the House and Senate declaring the intent of Congress that food stamps and other nutrition programs "should be protected from further budget cuts."

In the House, Republican James M. Jeffords (Vt.) joined Democrat Leon E. Panetta (Calif.) as a principal co-sponsor. And the Senate resolution was introduced by two Republicans, Rudy Boschwitz (Minn.) and John C. Danforth (Mo.).

Bell System Bargaining Council shapes 1983 contract goals at its three-day meeting in Washington.

Court validates card check as test of majority

Philadelphia—Employee signatures on union authorization cards form a sufficient basis for the National Labor Relations Board to determine that a union had the support of a majority of workers and is entitled to a bargaining order to remedy management unfair labor practices, the 3rd U.S. Court of Appeals ruled.

In supporting the board's reliance on authorization cards as a show of union support, the full court withdrew its April 1982 ruling that such cards are unreliable in the absence of proof that workers read them and understand their implications. By a 7 to 3 vote, the court enforced an NLRB order requiring Keystone Pretzel Bakery, Inc. of Lancaster, Pa., to bargain with Local 6 of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers.

"There is no presumption that union adherents are any more likely not to read what they have signed than are members of the public at large," the court said. "If they have signed an unequivocal authorization for collective bargaining, they should, like anyone else, be presumed to have intended what the card says."

Minority view

The court minority, in a dissenting opinion, contended that the cards are insufficient support of the union because several workers were told by a union organizer that the cards were intended merely to secure a secret ballot election.

BCT's organizing drive at the pretzel bakery began in the spring of 1977. By May 27, 1977, the union had obtained cards from 17 of the firm's 29 employees designating the union as their agent.

One of the owners, Glen Hyneman, promised to satisfy employee complaints about wages by granting a pay increase. He also pledged to improve work conditions but deferred consideration of workers' request for a pension plan. At the close of the meeting, workers voted overwhelmingly against the union.

Bargaining order issued

An NLRB administrative law judge recommended a cease-and-desist order to remedy management's unlawful anti-union campaign. The board went further, however, and issued a bargaining order in May 1979. In so doing, it overturned the judge's conclusion that cards signed by three of the employees were invalid because they were solicited with the representation that they were to be used only to secure an election.

The company initially asked the appeals court to remand the case to the NLRB for a consideration of changed circumstances, pointing out that substantial employee turnover had taken place in the intervening years. The court did this, and a year and a half later the NLRB reaffirmed its bargaining order, now upheld by the appeals court.

CWA lists career security as major Bell System goal

Career guarantees will be a top issue in the Communications Workers' negotiations with the Bell System this spring.

The concept of employment security goes beyond the idea of job security, CWA President Glenn Watts told a press conference called to announce the union's contract goals for bargaining with the giant telephone and telecommunications company.

"We must emphasize the lifetime potential of the worker," Watts said, calling for a new pact "which would provide lifetime employment, career growth, training and retraining and counseling for all workers."

Watts made the union's bargaining aims public following a three-day meeting of CWA's 82-member Bell System Bargaining Council in Washington. The council adopted a resolution covering more than 140 specific issues the union wants improved in negotiations that begin May 19.

For 700,000 workers

Contracts covering more than 700,000 Bell System workers expire Aug. 6. CWA represents some 500,000 of these workers, another 110,000 are represented by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the balance by the unaffiliated Telecommunications Union.

The IBEW said its Telephone Coordinating Committee is near completion of its bargaining agenda. The unions will negotiate separately, and the contracts will be the largest in this year's round of bargaining.

The CWA bargaining council set a high priority on improvements in conditions that create job stress, pay equity for all workers, improved pensions for current and future retirees, increased union involvement in health and life insurance programs, safety and health protections and increased worker participation in planning and decisions involving the quality of work life.

Watts will co-chair the 10-member bargaining committee with John C. Carroll, the union's executive vice president.

Watts said the union will ask AT&T to form a joint national labor-management committee on technological change to study and deal with the effects such transitions will have on workers' skills and jobs.

The council's resolution also calls for a jointly-managed career development and training program—financed by the company through productivity gains reaped from "labor-saving" technology. The program would "train and retrain workers affected by new technology, new product lines and changing market conditions," the union said.

Wage basis

In wages and other compensation, Watts said the union will bargain for increases that "reflect the productivity of CWA workers, the profitability of the company, the rate of inflation since our last bargaining and what we expect it might be on into the future."

He pointed out that Bell System employee productivity has increased at double the national rate over the past 35 years. Despite the deep recession, AT&T profits rose from $$6.9 billion in 1981 to $7.28 billion in 1982.

Among other employment security improvements sought by CWA are the elimination of subcontracting, six months advance notice of transfers or permanent layoff, and guaranteed wage rates for workers transferred to areas with lower rates.

Job and income security

CWA is also seeking extended supplemental income protection, company payment of all insurance premiums for one year for all laid-off workers and protection from "any adverse effects" of AT&T's divestiture. Under agreement with the Justice Dept., AT&T must relinquish ownership of its 22 operating subsidiaries by 1984.

Among the wage objectives is an improved and simplified cost of living adjustment formula that would insure 100 percent recovery of any decline in real wages. The union also wants all overtime to be strictly voluntary and paid at double-time rates.

PBS to televise film on textile organizing

"Keepin' On," a film about organizing in a southern textile mill town, will be televised Feb. 8 over many Public Broadcasting Service stations.

The 90-minute drama, part of PBS's American Playhouse series, focuses on the lives of workers and why they decide to support a union. It depicts both the open and covert ways the fictional company uses its power in a one-industry town to intimidate the workers and keep the union out.

U.S. trade gap sets record as exports drop

The United States posted a record deficit of $42.7 billion in its merchandise trade with other countries last year largely because of a sharp decline in American exports, the Commerce Dept. reported.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said the total is even higher—$47.8 billion—when the re-export of imported goods is figured in. That total is 7.6 percent above the comparable figure for the year 1981.

Last year's poor showing was the result of a strong dollar in comparison with other currencies combined with recessions abroad, which reduced the demand for American exports more than the U.S. recession cut the nation's appetite for imports.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige warned that the merchandise trade deficit could widen to a range of $60 billion to $70 billion in 1983.

In an analysis of the deficit figures, the AFL-CIO pointed out that exports dropped 9.5 percent, while imports were down 6.8 percent from the year before.

Oil imports drop

Nearly all of the decline in imports reflected the sharp drop in oil shipments to the United States. The Commerce Dept. said non-oil imports were virtually unchanged over the year. The deficit in total fuel trade fell 26 percent to $54.9 billion, a decline of $19.2 billion.

On the other hand, the U.S. trade surplus in food fell by 40.3 percent, dropping from a $13.8 billion surplus for 1981 to an $8.2 billion surplus last year. Exports were down 20.9 percent and imports declined 4.8 percent.

The pattern in manufacturing trade represented a sharp turnaround. In 1981, the nation ran a $5.3 billion surplus in manufacturing, compared to a deficit of $10.6 billion in 1982.

In the chemicals and related products category, the U.S. trade surplus fell to $9.9 billion, a drop of $1.3 billion. Almost all of the loss was in exports. Export of manufactured goods classified by material, such as tires, paper, textile fabrics, iron and steel, and nonferrous metals, dropped 18.9 percent while imports were down 11.1 percent.

Exports decline

Machinery and transport equipment exports fell 9 percent while imports of such equipment were up 4.7 percent. Export of miscellaneous manufactured articles—clothing, footwear, instruments, toys—fell 4.7 percent as imports rose 7.4 percent.

High interest rates have been a principal cause of the sharp rise in the exchange value of the dollar relative to foreign currencies, government economists said. This rise has reduced the ability of American exporters to compete in foreign markets and increased the competitiveness of imports in the domestic market.

Cuts hit blacks hardest

Black Americans are worse off than they were a year ago and are bearing a "disproportionate share" of the hardships from domestic spending cuts and high unemployment, according to a National Urban League survey.

Black unemployment rose to 20 percent in 1982 from 15.5 percent in 1981, and one of every three blacks was below the government's official poverty lines last year, compared to one of every 10 whites, the report said. Black teenage joblessness was at 50 percent.

The study also found that only 30 percent of black families can be called middle class while 56 percent of white families fit that category.

Personal income and living standards for blacks were also found to be declining, particularly among the 40 percent of black families who already have the lowest incomes. Blacks last year earned about $59 for every $100 earned by whites, the league's survey showed.

The report noted that blacks received 17.5 percent of their total income in 1980 from transfer payments, such as welfare, compared to 12.6 percent in 1970.

Organizing drive opens

Health care unions target nursing chain

By Susan Dunlop

Two unions have kicked off a campaign to organize workers and improve patient care in the nation's largest nursing home chain, Beverly Enterprises, Inc.

The Food & Commercial Workers and the Service Employees announced the joint organizing drive for more than 50,000 Beverly employees. The company, based in Pasadena, Calif., owns or manages 623 nursing homes in 36 states and the District of Columbia.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said at a press conference that some 1,000 union organizers began distributing leaflets early that morning at about 400 Beverly facilities in 20 states.

Wynn said that the two unions will conduct organizing efforts in all 37 locales where the company operates.

"Working conditions and patient care conditions are closely linked," and that quality care is sometimes difficult "in the best of circumstances," Wynn said. "In the worst of circumstances, when discouraged workers are under-staffed, under-equipped and under-paid, it is impossible."

SEIU President John J. Sweeney released a preliminary study of the company's record of care for its 70,000 patients. He told reporters that the 50-page study by the two unions and the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. shows that the company's spending on patient care is below the industry average while its expenditures on administrative and related costs are far above average. Beverly facilities also have a higher than average record of citations for deficiencies after inspections, Sweeney pointed out.

Four-state study

He said the study covers the company's operations in only four states, Arkansas, California, Florida and Texas, but because these locations include over half of all Beverly homes, "we have reason to believe the same sort of problems can be found in other areas."

The investigation was begun, the unions said, after Beverly reneged on a promise last year to disclose its patient care record. The leaflets handed out by organizers stress that workers who "go home every night concerned because you know your patients may not be getting the care they deserve," are "not alone."

It urged workers to call a toll-free hotline or write in confidence to Beverly Employees Cooperative Action and Reform Effort (C.A.R.E.) for information on how to form a union. The organization is headed by employees at organized Beverly facilities, the unions said.

About 3,000 of the company's workers are organized. SEIU represents workers in 21 homes in four states, and UFCW represents workers at 10 homes in five states.

Substandard wages

Most Beverly employees make minimum wage or slightly more, the unions said, adding that they "have been struggling with the company for years to get better salaries as well as the equipment and supplies needed to deliver quality patient care."

FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant told reporters that calls had already come in on the hotline from Beverly employees asking how to form a union and describing incidents of poor patient care, inadequate staffing, low pay, low morale and high employee turnover.

Beverly Enterprises began as a three-home partnership in California in 1963. An intensive acquisitions program through the 1970s brought the company to its present size, according to a survey made by the FBTD.

High profitability

The corporate profile pointed out that Beverly's profitability increased by about 1,200 percent between 1976 and 1981. Beverly Chairman Robert Von Tuyle said the company expects to top $800 million in 1982, compared with $486 million in 1981.

Wynn called Beverly "one of the fastest-growing companies in America . . . profitable and getting more profitable, yet our members tell us that patient care is deteriorating."

The two unions have turned over the first results of the study of the company's record to the House Energy & Commerce Committee, which has jurisdiction over health care matters, and to the Securities & Exchange Commission.

Sweeney said they have asked for hearings into the need for oversight of nursing homes chains and new regulations requiring these companies to disclose their patient care records.

Age, coverage issues cited at social security hearings payrolls—not just the amount of wages on which workers are taxed.

Such a proposal had been made by the Carter Administration, Kirkland noted. Its adoption would also eliminate most of the imbalance that would still remain in the long-term projections for the system.

The consensus recommendations of the commission would resolve the short-term needs of the system and an estimated two-thirds of the long-term funding needs.

On the long-term funding, the commission split. The 10 members selected by President Reagan and Republican congressional leaders advocated raising the normal retirement age beyond 65, with the phase-in starting after the turn of the century.

Kirkland and the four other Democratic appointees suggested a standby tax to take effect if needed in the year 2010, with the option of substituting general Treasury revenues.

Upping retirement age

Raising the retirement age amounts to an across-the-board benefit reduction, Kirkland protested. He said it would "break faith with younger workers" who would have their benefits reduced if they retired earlier. The Republican plan would set the normal retirement age at 66 instead of 65, but would move to a still older retirement age if longevity increased.

Kirkland said penalizing earlier retirement through reduced benefits would fall hardest on older workers forced out of the labor market by poor health or unemployment.

He warned that it would also have an immediate impact on private pension plans, including those negotiated by unions.

Active opposition

Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), who also served on the bipartisan commission, told the Ways & Means Committee that he would actively oppose any plan that included an older retirement age.

Pepper served his warning from the vantage point of his role as chairman of the House Rules Committee, which determines the conditions under which the House takes up legislation.

In another area, Kirkland endorsed commission recommendations that would improve social security protections for some categories of widows, divorced women and disabled women. He said there remain other inequities which Congress should consider at the earliest opportunity. He noted that the social security system was set up at a time when the prevailing pattern was that "men were largely the breadwinners and women for the most part were to receive benefits as wives and widows."

But basically, Kirkland stressed, social security has "done more than any other American institution to provide our elderly citizens economic security and dignity."

And in an often-overlooked area, "it provides a guaranteed income for the spouse and children when a younger worker dies, and the same sort of income in the event of his or her total disability." These are safeguards "not for those retired but for those still at work," Kirkland pointed out.

Labor protests packing of NLRB

Organized labor has registered a strong protest over the "profound changes" the Reagan Administration is working on the National Labor Relations Board with its nominations of Donald J. Dotson and other management lawyers to open seats.

In a letter to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Relations Committee, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the federation would not testify against Dotson's nomination to a five-year term as chairman of the NLRB, but only because the federation's information on his record "is not sufficiently documented to meet our standards for actively opposing a nominee."

Employer lawyers

Kirkland underscored the AFL-CIO's "grave reservations" about Dotson's fitness to serve on the board, and he pointed out that neither Dotson nor Patricia Diaz Dennis, nominated for the other open seat, have any track record in labor relations except as "employer lawyers."

Dotson, currently assistant secretary of labor for labor-management relations, formerly worked for several major corporations as a labor relations lawyer. Dennis is a labor attorney for the American Broadcasting Co.

Kirkland told the committee the AFL-CIO has "no confidence" in a labor board with a management tilt.

He said President Reagan's insistence on nominating management lawyers is evidence of the Administration's "contempt" for the trade union movement and a "reward" for right-wing interests.

Kirkland warned that the Administration's policy of packing the NLRB on ideological lines has many working men and women doubting the board's interests in actively protecting workers' rights under the labor laws.

Changing support

And it has forced the AFL-CIO, out of "self-protection," to move away from its traditional policy of supporting nominations of individuals based on their records of significant experience in labor relations. In the future, Kirkland said, organized labor won't bind itself to any such limitations.

Kirkland told the committee that confirmation of Dotson and Dennis would create a majority of members on the NLRB whose appointments are not based on a record of achievement, but only on "their having been good and faithful agents of management."

There is already a growing feeling among workers that the National Labor Relations Act "doesn't work" and that the NLRB is becoming "irrelevant" because the legal processes are so long and the sanctions imposed on employers guilty of unfair labor practices are so weak, Kirkland observed, adding:

"The Administration's reshaping of the board and the nomination of Mr. Dotson, who is not only an employer lawyer but is the candidate of the most anti-union employers, of Senator (Jesse) Helms and the Right to Work Committee's Reed Larson, can only strengthen this view."

Kirkland stressed that in the past when the AFL-CIO has been consulted about appointments to the NLRB, the federation had never sought appointment of a lawyer who has regularly represented unions, or of a union official.

AFL-CIO support, Kirkland said, has gone to individuals "who were experienced in labor relations, who believed in the advancement of collective bargaining and who in their professional lives had not been the agents of management or labor."

Kirkland noted that the current Reagan appointee on the NLRB, Robert Hunter, played a leading staff role in the filibuster of labor law reform legislation and that neither Dotson nor Dennis has a record of accomplishments "in increasing labor peace or in protecting employee rights—the twin goals of the federal labor laws."

Right-wing rewards

These nominations, he said, are "rewards by the Administration to the reactionary businessmen and to the far right-wing that the Administration delights to serve."

They are a "further expression of the shared contempt of the Administration and its allies for the collective bargaining system and for an independent trade union movement," Kirkland charged.

Hail solidarity

The Washington Redskins victory in Super Bowl XVII was hailed as a mark of solidarity.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue telegrammed Redskin Mark Murphy, the National Football League Players Association representative, a congratulatory note "on behalf of all your nearly 15 million brothers and sisters in the American trade union movement."

Referring to the mid-season players' strike, they said, "Clearly, your leadership as player rep and the Redskins' solidarity during the tough times last fall helped you prepare for the Super Bowl victory you so richly deserve. You have shown America that solidarity is the mark of winners."

New budget cuts target poor, jobless for hiring persons out of work the longest.

The President's other proposal to bring down unemployment was a subminimum youth wage for summer jobs—$2.25 an hour instead of $3.35 an hour.

Reagan's budget proposals were especially harsh on federal workers, and Kirkland protested the Administration's attempt to make them scapegoats for the failure of Reaganomics.

If Congress went along with the President's budget proposals, government employees would have their salaries frozen for a full year, their retirement benefits substantially cut and the amount deducted from their pay for the civil service retirement plan sharply increased.

Other segments of the budget would push up hospital charges for most elderly persons and tax workers on the value of "excess" health benefits provided by their employers.

Defense budget

The cutbacks the President proposed in a wide range of social programs would roughly balance out a 14.2 percent rise in the defense budget. The defense rise will be higher if Congress rejects Reagan's proposal to freeze the pay of military personnel as well as civilian employees of the government.

Reagan took office with a promise to bring the budget in balance by fiscal 1984, but his record to date has been one of steadily rising deficits under the battering of a recession, which Reagan acknowledged has been longer and more severe than the Administration anticipated.

He again sought to put the blame on "the problems we inherited" while claiming "impressive results" from the policies his Administration has pursued.

Because the more cautious economic assumptions the Administration is using this year point to many years of huge budget deficits, Reagan proposed an intricate temporary surtax to take effect in fiscal 1986 if the projected deficit that year is greater than 2.5 percent of the nation's gross national product. But it would go into effect, Reagan proposed, "only if the Congress has first approved our spending freeze and budget control program."

Politics of surtax

Practically no one in Congress, Democrat or Republican, takes the standby proposal seriously, and Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan responded to a question at a press briefing with the candid admission that the surtax trigger was delayed so that it wouldn't fall in an election year.

The budget assumes adoption of the bipartisan recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. Otherwise, budget receipts would be lower and outlays higher.

No one expects this Congress to be as subservient to the President's wishes as the previous Congress. But if it were, these are some of the changes that would be made as a byproduct of the budget:

Health — Medicare changes would raise the cost to patients of hospital stays under 60 days, but would provide "catastrophic insurance" to cover stays over 60 days. The net result is a "savings" to the government. It would also raise premiums for the Part B physician services coverage and provide a one-year freeze on Medicare reimbursement to physicians, although doctors could still bill patients for amounts above the Medicare payment. Another new proposal would allow persons covered by Medicare to switch to a private insurance coverage and receive government vouchers based on average Medicare costs.

An especially controversial proposal would set a limit of $70 a month on the tax-free premium that an employer may pay for health insurance coverage for an individual worker, and $175 a month on premiums for family coverage. Any "excess" premium would be considered taxable income to the employee. The ceiling on tax-free benefits would be adjusted for inflation.

The Administration estimates that this would bring in $2.3 billion in revenue in fiscal 1984 but claims its real intent is to keep health care costs down by discouraging "overutilization" that might result from comprehensive health coverage.

In a New York Times article, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said the effect of the Reagan proposal would be to discourage plans featuring early diagnosis and treatment of illness. "The big winners would be employers relieved of paying the full cost of collectively bargained health insurance," he said.

Services for the poor—Outlays for food stamps would be reduced 9 percent, child nutrition programs would be cut 8 percent, less money would be available for compensatory education for disadvantaged children, needy college students would have to finance a larger share of their education, and payments to assist low-income families with heating costs would be reduced 30 percent.

There would be a $700 million cut in the basic Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and all funding would be ended for legal services.

Federal workers—Government employees, held in recent years to only a fraction of the "comparability" pay raises they are supposed to get each October, would be denied any raise at all in fiscal 1984. Their present 7 percent of payroll deduction for civil service retirement would be raised to 9 percent and would rise again to 11 percent a year later. At the same time, a substantial reduction in benefits and elimination of early retirement options for long-service workers would be phased in gradually. Present retirees would forgo cost-of-living adjustments for one year and the COLA formula for future retirees would be reduced.

Postal—Subsidies for non-profit organizations would be cut almost in half, touching off another round of rapid increases in postage costs for union publications.

Tax and trade—Congress was again asked to enact tax breaks to encourage imports from Caribbean Basin nations and tax incentives to employers to locate in "urban enterprise zones." Tuition tax credits would be granted to parents of children in private schools and a new tax-exempt savings account would be allowed for future college costs of a child. What is left of trade adjustment assistance to businesses and workers hurt by imports would be eliminated.

Transit—Despite revenue from the new gas tax, mass transit funding would be cut nearly 25 percent below the level set by Congress—from $4 billion to $3 billion in fiscal 1984.

Focus on Middle East

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland exchange views on events in the Middle East and discuss programs the African-American Labor Center is operating in Egypt. Mubarak also met with President Reagan and congressional leaders during his U.S. visit.

Public financing supported for congressional elections

The AFL-CIO expressed concern at the increased dependence of congressional candidates on large contributors and endorsed public financing of campaigns as the best solution.

Public financing proved a practical means of funding presidential campaigns and should be adopted for House and Senate elections as well, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold urged at Senate Rules Committee hearings.

Gold noted the rapid proliferation of political action committees set up by corporations and trade associations and their increased importance in the political fund-raising scene.

While union PACs raise their funds in small contributions from a large number of people, the business PACs tend to be funded by the same people who make the maximum allowable individual contributions to candidates in their own names.

"Thus the disproportionate influence which these individuals already exert on the political process is further magnified by their PACs," he testified.

Preliminary data from the 1982 congressional elections show that campaign outlays totaled more than $314 million, with at least 10 Senate candidates individually spending more than $2.5 million and at least 10 House candidates each spending more than $500,000 on their campaigns.

As a result of such spending pressures, candidates must devote "more and more time to raising more and more money" and the public's confidence in the integrity of the electoral process is weakened, Gold warned.

If a public financing bill can't be enacted in this Congress, Gold suggested, "the best legislative step would be adoption of overall limits on the amount which a congressional candidate may accept in PAC contributions."

Wage increases smaller in 1982's major contracts

First-year wage increases under major collective bargaining contracts negotiated in 1982 averaged 3.8 percent, the lowest in the 14 years that the Bureau of Labor Statistics has been keeping such records. Over the life of the contracts negotiated last year, wage increases averaged 3.6 percent a year.

BLS said the principal reason for the low 1982 averages is the fact that nearly half of the workers will receive no first-year negotiated wage increases, primarily in the recession-ravaged auto and trucking industries.

The 1982 pay hikes compared with a first-year increase of 9.8 percent and an annual 7.9 percent raise over term in 1981. The contracts covered a total of 3,257,000 workers.

When the same parties negotiated agreements the last time, usually two or three years ago, the first-year average increase was 7.9 percent and the over-the-contract increase an annual average of 6.3 percent.

But where workers did negotiate an increase this year—including construction, apparel, electrical equipment manufacturing, railroads, and utilities—the contract increases averaged 7 percent in the first year and 5.8 percent over the life of the contracts.

Wage protection

In addition, most contracts not containing specific wage increases, continue to protect workers by cost-of-living clauses tied to changes in the government's consumer price index.

The BLS survey applies to 566 contracts, each covering 1,000 or more workers.

Only 56 percent of the workers covered by the 1982 pacts received a first-year wage increase. Of the remainder, 43 percent received no increase, and 2 percent took a pay cut.

In manufacturing industries, more than half the workers got no pay increase. Pay was frozen for 51 percent of them, and wages cut for 1 percent. In nonmanufacturing industries, wages remained unchanged for 34 percent and were reduced for 2 percent.

Average first-year gains in manufacturing were 2.9 percent, while in nonmanufacturing the increases averaged 4.8 percent.

Over the contract term, 64 percent of workers covered by last year's settlements will receive some wage increase.

Settlements in the construction industry were the smallest since 1978, averaging 6.5 percent the first year and 6.4 percent a year over term, down from 13.5 percent in the first year and 11.3 percent over term in contracts negotiated in 1981.

Two-thirds of the workers under the 1982 settlements are covered by COL adjustment clauses, BLS said. About half of them will not receive any specified wage increase over the life of the pacts. As usual, gains under settlements with COL clauses were smaller than under those pacts without such provisions.

Annual averages

First-year negotiated gains in agreements with COL clauses averaged 2.2 percent compared to 7 percent in agreements without such clauses, BLS said. Over-term annual adjustments were 2.2 and 6.6 percent, respectively.

Average duration of contracts negotiated in 1982 was 31 months. Settlements with COL clauses averaged 34 months, while those without them averaged 26 months.

In key contracts, those covering 5,000 or more workers each, total compensation —wages plus benefits—increased an average 3.2 percent in the first year and 2.7 percent a year over term. About 2,346,000 workers were covered by these settlements.

Effective wage rate adjustments covering the 8.4 million workers under major collective bargaining agreements averaged 6.7 percent in 1982, the lowest in a decade, BLS said. These adjustments resulted from new settlements, deferred increases under contracts negotiated earlier, and cost-of-living adjustments.

About half a million workers under these key pacts received no wage change in 1982. The average increase for the 7.9 million who did get raises was 7.2 percent.

Looking ahead to the first quarter of 1983, BLS said that 157 major contracts covering 513,000 workers are due to expire or be reopened.

Economic blueprint scoffs at job mandate

Moreover, the policies framed by the report do not embrace realities of the world economy, he said. The discussion on trade is oriented in a theoretical free world, free market system, completely ignoring the real world of trade today, Oswald pointed out.

"And on the domestic side," he added, "further deregulation is championed for everything from natural gas to broadcasting to financial markets."

Reagan said in his report there are signs the economy "is now on the road to a healthy recovery." A year ago, in a similar report to Congress, he predicted 1982 would see a "vigorous economic recovery." Instead, the country went through its worst recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

His Council of Economic Advisers, whose annual report to Congress accompanied the President's, was more cautious in its outlook, however. It predicted the economic pickup, when it begins, would be moderate and that joblessness would stay high for at least several months—possibly climbing a bit more before falling.

Below standard

"The pace of the recovery in 1983 will probably be moderate by historical standards," the council said. "Low capacity utilization rates and the need to rebuild corporate liquidity will restrain capital spending. The worldwide recession and the lagged effect of the appreciation of the dollar will curtail the growth of exports."

The CEA also argued that recovery is threatened by huge federal budget deficits, which have become "a major problem for the American economy." Administration spending plans call for deficits of $208 billion for fiscal year 1983 and $189 billion in the 1984 fiscal year.

If Congress fails to hold the deficits to at least those levels, the CEA said, they could mushroom to sums "far larger than those previously experienced in the postwar period. The economic effects of such deficits are beyond our previous experience."

Council Chairman Martin Feldstein, discussing the report at a hearing of the congressional Joint Economic Committee, said he expects real gross national production will rise at an annual rate of 1 percent in the first three months of 1983, and that economic growth will increase by 3.1 percent between the fourth quarter of 1982 and the fourth quarter of 1983. But he said the prognostications are linked to timing.

"The actual rate of growth in the first quarter will depend on just when the recovery begins," he said. "If we eventually learn that December 1982 was the trough of the recession, the rate of growth in the first quarter of 1983 is likely to be significantly greater than 1 percent.

Slowed recovery

"But if the recovery does not begin until March, the rate of growth for the quarter as a whole could well be negative. The appropriate forecast for the first quarter requires balancing the probabilities of alternative starting dates for the recovery."

Feldstein said that the increase in real GNP that the Administration forecasts implies that employment will rise by more than 2 million persons between the first quarter of this year and the first quarter of 1984. Real GNP is the value of the nation's total output of goods and services, adjusted for the impact of inflation.

For the longer term, between 1984 and 1988, Feldstein said the Administration is forecasting that the economy will grow at 4 percent a year. Inflation, as measured by the government's consumer price index, is projected to average 4.9 percent this year, compared with 3.9 percent in 1982, and average about 4.5 percent each year between 1984 and 1988.

Tripartite panel

Union, business and government panel explores cooperative efforts for increasing productivity and the quality of work life. The 16-member committee was put together by the American Arbitration Association with a grant from the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. The labor representatives are AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Building & Construction Trades President Robert Georgine, State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald McEntee, Service Employees President John Sweeney, and Richard Hyatt, assistant to the president of the Fire Fighters.

Tobacco Workers win gains for 14,000 in new contracts

Tobacco workers ratified new agreements providing wage and benefit improvements for some 14,000 members of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers in the United States and Canada.

The major contract is with Philip Morris Inc. covering 10,500 workers at Richmond, Va., and Louisville, Ky. Other agreements are with the American Tobacco Co., and Benson & Hedges, Ltd., a subsidiary of Philip Morris.

BC&T members covered by the Philip Morris contract will receive wage increases of 4.2 percent in the first year of a three-year agreement, 4.1 percent in the second year, and 3.5 percent in the final year. Quarterly cost-of-living adjustments of one cent for each three-tenths of a point rise in the consumer price index are continued and folded into base rates each year.

Minimum pension benefits are increased from $16 to $21 per month multiplied by a worker's years of service. Employees with 30 years of service may retire at age 53, down from age 55.

Other gains under the agreement, which took effect on Feb. 1, include significant improvements in disability pay, vision and dental care, vacations, and sickness and accident insurance.

Similar provisions are contained in the new contract with American Tobacco, covering 3,000 workers at plants in Reidsville and Durham, N.C., and smaller units in Richmond.

The contracts were negotiated under the union's long-term agreement with the industry. The 1979 accord calls for binding arbitration if a settlement cannot be reached, and guarantees yearly minimum increases of 3 percent and an indexed annual bonus, which started at $300 and now equals about $330.

Strike ends

The union's agreement covering Benson & Hedges employees in Brampton, Ont., ended a seven-week strike. The pact subsequently was agreed to without a strike at the firm's Montreal plant. About 500 BC&T members are employed at the two locations. The Brampton contract is retroactive to April 1982, the Montreal agreement to December 1982.

BC&T contracts with Lorillard Corp., covering 3,500 workers in North Carolina and Virginia, and with Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., covering 3,700 workers in Kentucky and Virginia, will expire early this year. Last month, BC&T negotiated a new pact with the Liggett Group, Inc.

Meanwhile, the union is stepping up its campaign against the nation's largest tobacco firm, the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. Reynolds has been the target of a consumer boycott for what BC&T calls its "long, infamous history of anti-unionism."

Minnesota labor rallies for jobs

St. Paul—Minnesota Gov. Rudy Perpich outlined a legislative proposal for a $100-million jobs program at a State AFL-CIO rally for unemployed workers.

The jobs measure will be detailed in the new Democratic governor's budget measure to the legislature later this month. It will primarily aid the jobless who have exhausted unemployment benefits, provide added funds for weatherization and energy conservation and increase highway construction and maintenance.

To meet the emergency needs of the jobless, Perpich also called for the mobilization of public and private resources for shelters, food banks and medical care.

Minnesota AFL-CIO President David A. Roe told the nearly 1,000 jobless workers and union members concerned with loss of their jobs that state action on employment programs is needed because no meaningful assistance would be forthcoming from the Reagan Administration.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman detailed the federation's agenda for jobs, extended unemployment benefits, health insurance for the jobless, and long-term programs to stave off home mortgage foreclosures.

The day-long rally ended with passage of a resolution calling for a series of legislative remedies, including a trust fund for public service jobs, extended group health insurance eligibility, longer mortgage redemption and paid job retraining.

Roe said the state federation is again lobbying for plant closing protection and successor legislation. State Rep. James Rice, chief author of a successor bill, called on elected officials to pass measures to provide temporary aid for the "homeless, hopeless and helpless."

State Senate majority leader Roger Moe unveiled plans for a state infrastructure bank to finance public works projects, giving priority to projects based on the number of jobs created.

Barbara Beerhalter, commissioner of the state's Dept. of Economic Security, said she will propose a plan to leverage public money for the creation of private sector jobs by providing matching funds so the hourly wages would be at least twice the minimum wage level.

Gov. Rudy Perpich outlines a $100-million jobs plan at Minnesota AFL-CIO rally for the unemployed.

Reagan appoints Lyons to strategic forces panel

AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons has been appointed by President Reagan to a new bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces.

In announcing appointments to the 11-member commission, Reagan said it would "review the strategic modernization program with particular focus on our land-based intercontinental ballistic missile system and basing alternatives for that system."

Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, is chairman of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's subcommittee on defense.

Put people first, Canada's bishops ask

Industrialized democracies must reorder their values and priorities to meet peoples' basic social and economic needs, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops warned in a statement on the free world's current economic crisis.

"From the standpoint of the church's social teachings," the bishops said, "we firmly believe that present economic realities reveal a moral disorder in our society.

"The present recession appears to be symptomatic of a much larger structural crisis in the international system of capitalism."

Capital takes precedent

In an age of automation and computers where human work is rapidly being replaced by machines, "capital" is asserted as the dominant organizing principle of economic life, the statement noted.

"This orientation directly contradicts the ethical principle that labor, not capital, must be given priority in the development of an economy based on justice.

"There is, in other words, an ethical order in which human labor, the subject of production, takes precedence over capital and technology. This is the priority of labor principle."

While directed mainly at the Canadian economy, the bishops' statement has wide applicability to other industrialized economies. Like the U.S. economy, the Canadian economy is in recession with double-digit unemployment.

The statement, issued by the CCCB's Commission on Social Affairs, relies heavily on Pope John Paul II's 1981 encyclical to Roman Catholic bishops defending workers' rights, and warning of the "dehumanizing excesses" of modern economic systems. It cites two fundamental Christian principles as the basis for a new approach to economic recovery.

First priority must be given to the real victims of the current recession—the unemployed, the poor, pensioners, women, and young people, the bishops declare in the statement, "Ethical Reflections on the Economic Crisis." Secondly, economic policies must reflect the realization that the rights of workers are more important than the maximization of profits by corporations.

The bishops outlined a five-point short-term strategy for government and business to pursue:

- Unemployment, rather than inflation, should be recognized as the No. 1 problem in overcoming the present economic crisis.
- Policies should aim at creating permanent and meaningful jobs for people in local communities. These should emphasize increased production, creation of new labor-intensive industries for basic needs, and measures to ensure job security.
- A more balanced and equitable program should be developed for reducing and stemming the rate of inflation.
- Greater emphasis should be given to the goal of social responsibility in the current recession. This means that every effort must be made to curtail cutbacks in social services, maintain adequate health care and social security benefits, and guarantee special assistance to the unemployed, welfare recipients, the working poor, and one-industry towns suffering from plant shutdowns.
- Labor unions should be given a more decisive and responsible role in developing policies for economic recovery and employment.

Serving public needs

As long as technology and capital are not harnessed by society to serve basic human needs, the bishops said, they are likely to become an enemy, rather than an ally in the development of a people.

"By placing greater importance on the accumulation of profits and machines than on the people who work in a given economy, the value, meaning and dignity of human labor is violated," the bishops said.

"By creating conditions for permanent unemployment, an increasingly large segment of the population is threatened with the loss of human dignity. In effect, there is a tendency for people to be treated as an impersonal force having little or no significance beyond their economic purpose in the system."

Canada's present strategy for economic recovery, similar to that of the Reagan Administration, aims at restoring profitability and competitiveness in certain industries and providing more favorable conditions for private investment. The causes of inflation are seen as workers' wages, government spending, and low productivity rather than monopoly control of prices. In its measures to achieve recovery, government has strengthened business through corporate tax reductions and direct investment incentives, the statement observed.

Alternative approach

"In effect, the survival of capital takes priority over labor in present strategies for economic recovery," the bishops said. In offering an alternative approach to recovery, they stressed the goals of combating unemployment by stimulating production and permanent job creation in basic industries, developing a more balanced and equitable program for curbing inflation, and maintaining health care, social security, and special assistance programs.

"As a country, we have the resources, the capital, the technology, and above all else the aspirations and skills of working men and women required to build an alternative economic future," the bishops said, urging a public dialogue on major economic issues.

'A deepening moral crisis . . .'

The current structural changes in the global economy . . . reveal a deepening moral crisis. Through these structural changes, "capital" is reasserted as the dominant organizing principle of economic life. This orientation directly contradicts the ethical principle that labor, not capital, must be given priority in the development of an economy based on justice. There is, in other words, an ethical order in which human labor, the subject of production, takes precedence over capital and technology. This is the priority of labor principle.

By placing greater importance on the accumulation of profits and machines than on the people who work in a given economy, the value, meaning, and dignity of human labor is violated. By creating conditions of permanent unemployment, on increasingly large segment of the population is threatened with the loss of human dignity.

In effect, there is a tendency for people to be treated as an impersonal force having little or no significance beyond their economic purpose in the system. As long as technology and capital are not harnessed by society to serve basic human needs, they are likely to become an enemy rather than an ally in the development of peoples.

In addition, the renewed emphasis on the "survival of the fittest" as the supreme law of economics is likely to increase the domination of the weak by the strong, both at home and abroad. The "survival of the fittest" theory has often been used to rationalize the increasing concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few. The strong survive, the weak are eliminated.

Under conditions of "tough competition" in international markets for capital and trade, the poor majority of the world is especially vulnerable. With three-fourths of the world's population, for example, the poor nations of the South are already expected to survive on less than one-fifth of the world's income. Within Canada itself, the top 20 percent of the population receive 42.5 percent of total personal income, while the bottom 20 percent receive 4.1 percent.

These patterns of domination and inequality are likely to further intensify as the "survival of the fittest" doctrine is applied more rigorously to the economic order. While these Darwinian theories partly explain the rules that govern the animal world, they are in our view morally unacceptable as a rule of life for the human community.

Kirkland offers a 'modest proposal' on trade

The following is from the transcript of a news conference by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Jan. 26, 1983, Washington, D.C.

QUESTION: Mr. Kirkland, the President last night called for keeping free trade and spoke against this protectionism mood in the country. Are you going to modify in any way or change your policies?

KIRKLAND: Well, I think I may use this occasion to announce my conversion to the principle of Adam Smith and David Ricardo and John Stuart Mill. I think the arguments for free trade are so convincing that it would be nice if we had some, and we ought to really do something about it. So I am thinking of drafting a bill that will be introduced in the next Congress—it will be called the "Free Trade, Anti-Protectionism and Anti-Hyprocrisy Act of 1983." And it will go something like this:

Whereas, certain practices distort the free flow of commerce and diminish the wealth of nations, deprive consumers of the benefits of comparative advantage, and are otherwise contrary to national policy, now;

Therefore, first, it shall henceforth be illegal for any American corporation or person to engage in a transaction involving a product of which any portion is required to be manufactured abroad because of the existence in another country of a domestic content statute.

Secondly, it shall henceforth be illegal to engage in a barter transaction with a state-trading monopoly — that will be known as the Donald Kendall and Armand Hammer clause.

Third, it shall henceforth be illegal to engage in a transaction involving any product or commodity for which any part of the price or terms is subsidized, directly or indirectly, by the state.

Fourth, it shall be illegal to engage in any transaction involving a commodity the price or supply of which is controlled by an international cartel.

State manipulation

And I can go on—fifth, it shall be illegal to engage in any transaction involving the use of a currency of which the exchange rate is managed or manipulated by a state.

That is only a partial list of the prohibited protectionist transactions I would have in mind.

We'll have some definitions. We'll say, inasmuch as discussion of this subject has been poisoned by word pollution, certain terminology must be made standard. For example, those entities now known as "free trade zones," that is to say locations in certain territories where goods are produced under a restriction that none of them can be imported into the domestic market of the country where they are located, shall hereinafter be known as "protectionist zones."

On the enforcement part, the bill will say—and this may require a constitutional amendment—inasmuch as it is commonly understood by those well versed in these matters that considerations of human values and human rights and human standards ought not to be treated as relevant in determining the flow of commerce, or as criteria affecting economic transactions between nations—that is to say, that all values are fungible—now, therefore: as means of enforcement, any punitive measures practiced by any trading nation in the world, shall be available for the enforcement of this statute.

Therefore, for the first offense, the perpetrator shall have his right hand severed at the wrist. For the second offense, five years at hard labor at the prevailing wage in a Mexican asbestos plant. And for the third offense, as soon as any necessary treaty arrangements can be contrived, the offender shall be sentenced to ten years in the Gulag.

One added proviso: any person who, after the enactment of this statute, advocates, condones, engages in, or conspires to engage in the violation of any of these provisions, who is thereafter apprehended in the act of making a free trade speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, to the Aspen Institute, to Bilderberg, to Ditchley, or to any other such forum, national or international, shall have his tongue extracted by heated tongs.

That's my trade program.

$1 million back pay installment met

Atlanta—Florida Steel Corp. has made a $1-million installment—with still another $1 million due—on a $5.3 million back pay award won by the Steelworkers and AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The payments are the result of a nine-year-old legal battle that led to the second largest settlement in National Labor Relations Board history.

USWA Vice President Leon Lynch said checks for $1 million were issued in January to 185 active workers at Florida Steel and another $1 million will be paid to inactive workers as soon as calculations are completed. The payments were made to workers in the company's Indianton, Fla., and Charlotte, N.C., plants.

The NLRB upheld USWA and IUD charges that Florida Steel illegally withheld wages and benefits from workers beginning in 1973 and 1974, after they voted for USWA representation.

Lynch charged that the company still evades its obligation to bargain in good faith with the union.

The USWA has won 21 separate unfair labor practice cases against Florida Steel and additional charges are pending.

Shades of the '30s

WHILE PRESIDENT Reagan continues to warn against trying to "quick-fix" the economy, the plight of America's unemployed grows increasingly desperate.

Unemployment insurance at best is only a partial wage replacement, and a large and growing number of jobless workers do not even have that thin support. Either their benefits have run out or they are new entrants seeking a foothold in a recession-ravaged job market.

Perhaps a more accurate term—depression—should be used to describe the nation's economic plight. A recent scholarly analysis of unemployment statistics during the 1930s demonstrates that today's level of unemployment is very much in line with the true rate during the later years of the Great Depression, from 1936 to 1940.

Once again, in cities across this once-prosperous nation, soup kitchens are becoming vital sources of food for unemployed workers and their families.

To the President and his economic advisers, public works projects and community service employment as a counter-cyclical force to recessions represents "quick-fix" and "make-work," the dirtiest phrases in the Administration's economic vocabulary.

The argument is made that by the time public works programs can make a dent in unemployment, the economy will be back on course and the programs won't be needed.

That was the Administration's line a year ago when the unemployment rate was nudging 9 percent. It was the line in the post-election session of Congress when, with unemployment firmly in the double-digits, the President threatened to veto an urgent appropriations bill if it included funds for a jobs program. And it's still the line today when the Administration's own economic forecasts project further years of recession-level unemployment.

THE ONLY "make-work" the Administration supports is a mandatory "workfare" to assure that the needy work off the value of their food stamps.

In the last session of Congress, the President's solution for unemployment was the suggestion that every business hire one additional employee. That would solve the problem, Mr. Reagan insisted.

The Administration's solution for this year is to allow the long-term jobless to trade the additional weeks of unemployment insurance provided under the federal supplemental program for certificates that would give any employer who hired them a tax credit from the government equal to the value of the unemployment benefits.

For the young, who have no tax credits to peddle, the President's answer is a subminimum summer youth wage. The fast-food outlets will applaud this reasoning; the youngsters who serve up the hamburgers may be less enthusiastic.

Is this really the best the President and his staff can up with to get America back to work?

If so, Congress must do better.

White House Insulation

IT SEEMS incredible that the programs for the poor that were so savaged in the first two Reagan budgets have been targeted by the Administration for the most severe of the new round of cutbacks.

Yet that's the case, according to a compilation of budget requests for programs serving America's neediest. The total would be slashed 14 percent below present levels.

At the same time, President Reagan has asked Congress for a 10.6 percent rise in funds for White House residence expenses in addition to more money for the White House offices.

Holding down the cost of government is "strong medicine," the President said in his budget message. But, he insisted, "just as all will share in the benefits that will come from recovery, all should share fairly in the burden of transition."

Some freezes are colder than others.

Health insurance cutoff double burden for jobless

By Press Associates, Inc.

One of the most serious consequences of the current recession is the loss of health care protection by the unemployed and their families.

Under the nation's private health insurance system, more than 85 percent of all workers obtain health care coverage through their employers.

Losing a full-time job usually means losing health care protection, too.

Some 11 million unemployed persons and their dependents lacked health care insurance due to job loss in December, according to the Congressional Budget Office. Labor experts say that figure is much higher—up to 30 million people when discouraged workers, part-time workers who cannot find full-time jobs and their dependents are added to the "official' unemployed.

What these statistics don't show is what it means to lose health insurance.

At a recent House hearing, a panel of unemployed witnesses described what it is like to have no insurance and need health care.

Judy Duperry, a member of Auto Workers Local 626 in Bristol, Conn., was laid off from the assembly department of a General Motors plant in October 1981, after working there since 1974. She exhausted her unemployment benefits in May 1982 and her health coverage ran out in November. Unable to find full-time work, she has supported herself and her two children on part-time jobs. She said she has trouble paying the rent and cannot possibly afford private health insurance.

Borderline leukemia

Duperry's six-year-old son has been diagnosed with borderline leukemia and is supposed to see a doctor every six months. But she cannot afford the visits or medication he needs.

When her son became ill with a very high fever after her health coverage ended, she took him to the emergency room at the local hospital. The hospital refused to treat him because Duperry had no insurance. She ended up treating him at home and hoping for the best.

Camille Laskowski, a member of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, worked as a secretary in a Brooklyn hospital for 17 years until she was laid off last June. Her unemployment benefits and extended health insurance have ended.

With serious health problems, including heart disease, arthritis and cystic fibrosis, Laskowski must see three specialists and faces costs of over $100 a month for medications.

Mary Williams, a member of Steelworkers Local 2609, worked at Bethlehem Steel in Baltimore for four and one-half years until she was laid off last April. She said she could not afford to pay the insurance premium for herself and her daughter out of her jobless benefits.

$2,300 hospital bill

The day after Christmas, Williams was admitted to Johns Hopkins hospital for diagnosis and treatment of gall stones. The bill for tests, treatment and a five-day hospital stay came to $2,300. Williams said she applied for medical assistance but, if she doesn't get it, she doesn't know how she will pay.

In some ways, these unemployed workers were better off than average jobless Americans. They belonged to unions which had negotiated extended health care coverage in their contracts.

Most unemployed workers lose health insurance immediately or within one month after layoff and most do not qualify for federal health programs such as Medicaid. Their options are limited and, understandably, they choose to spend what money they have on food and shelter rather thon on costly health insurance premiums.

MEMO FROM COPE

Reagan vs. Reality

The President says everything's looking up, and he's the one who did it.

(Excerpts from President Reagan's statement awarding himself an A+ on a self-graded report card covering his first two years in office—Jan. 20, 1983.)

Today marks the second anniversary of this Administration. . . . I thought a little personal perspective might be appropriate.

Looking back, I guess my greatest satisfaction is the conviction that a country that was skidding dangerously in the wrong direction . . . losing faith in its own future, has been set on the right course.

We've begun to undo the damage that the over-taxing, over-spending, over-regulating binge of the '60s and '70s inflicted on the American way of life. . . .

My biggest regret is that because the accumulated damage has piled up so high for so long, putting America's house in order has been a tough and painful task. . . .

It's a real human tragedy that so many of our people today are still suffering for the political mistakes of the past, that we've finally started to correct.

And now, let's look ahead for a moment as we enter our third year. I see an American economy and an America on the mend. Nearly every economic indicator shows us heading into recovery. . . .

So I say that for all our troubles, midterm finds this Administration and this country entering a season of hope.

(Excerpts from White House document grading Reagan's first two years—also an A+.)

. . . By year's end (1982) the underlying problems which had made the recession so severe had begun to respond to the medicine of fiscal restraint. Evidence was accumulating that the economy was poised for recovery.

Acting forcefully and fairly, President Reagan had averted the calamity-in-the-making which greeted him when he took office. By significantly reducing record inflation, taxation, interest rates, excessive spending and regulation, Ronald Reagan kept important promises to the American people. . . .

By the end of 1982, grave problems of unemployment remained and a deep recession had driven federal budget deficits to levels that demanded fresh attack. But the nation's traditional confidence and belief in its greatness were reappearing. . . .

Reagan Fairness

"The corporate tax . . . (it) is very hard to justify its existence."—President Reagan, Jan. 26, 1983.

Recent Reagan proposal: Tax employees on their employer-paid health insurance premiums on everything over $2,100 a year (now counted as tax-free fringe benefit).

► Contrast: Getting rid of corporate tax would hand $65 billion (1982 tax year figure) to corporations, remove it from federal treasury. Taxing workers' health premiums would cost the average worker $141 a year in added federal taxes, plus $48 in state and social security taxes—yield estimated $2.3 billion for federal treasury, plus $800 million in state and social security taxes.

One Bean Counts

It was jelly beans at dawn for two candidates for the Dayton, Ore., city council who deadlocked with 126 votes each in the recent elections.

Election officials decided to pick the winner by lot, but not by the customary flip of the coin or draw of the straw. Someone held a bowl of red jelly beans—and one green one—over the candidates' heads. They drew alternately until, on the seventh draw, John Pachecho pulled the green one. He beat Lowell Stevens 126-plus-green-bean to 126-no-green-bean.

The facts say it's a real mess out there and a lot of Americans are hurting.

(This is an A+? Where we were at Reagan's midterm.)

► Unemployment at 12 million, the highest number of jobless individuals in our history. . . . More than 4.1 million of these deprived of their jobs since Reagan took office. . . . An average higher than two million a year.

► An additional 1.8 million unemployed workers too discouraged to continue the search for jobs. . . . An all-time record number.

► More than 6.4 million persons employed part-time who want, need and are seeking full-time jobs. . . . Another all-time high.

► Add them up—20.2 million hit by job and/or income loss.

► 30 million workers expected to suffer some unemployment in 1983.

► Factory utilization at an all-time record low—in the range of 67 percent. . . . For the auto industry only 44 percent. . . . For iron and steel only 40 percent.

► Planned future capital spending. . . . Which is needed to help get out of recession and create jobs. . . . Down 22 percent in the most recent available figures.

► After-tax profits. . . . Another indicator of what can be expected to help fuel real recovery. . . . Down nearly 30 percent from 1981 to 1982. . . . Sharpest decline in more than 30 years.

► Business failures. . . . Nearly 500 a week in 1982, the highest rate in 50 years.

► All-time records in mortgage loan delinquencies and in foreclosures. . . . working people, in many cases, thrown out of their homes. . . . small farmers, in other instances, thrown off their land.

► Another 725,000 persons, two-thirds of them children or women of child-bearing age, robbed of coverage at community health centers.

► State programs. . . . Deprived of large portions of federal aid. . . . Curbed in the areas of child nutrition and in health care for expectant poor mothers, for infants and children.

► One million children from low-income families forced off the federal school lunch program.

► Job safety protections cut.

► Education programs cut.

► Expected federal budget deficit: $200 billion, an all-time high.

Reagan Revisited

"We who are in government must take the lead in restoring the economy."—President Reagan, State of the Union Address, Jan. 25, 1983.

"Government is the problem, not the solution."—President Reagan, on at least 1,745 occasions.

(The President subsequently explained he meant government should "take the lead" because—reverting to his tried and true earlier position—it was government that created the mess to begin with.)

Tips for President On Hiding Meaning

Governmentese—the language of government—is meant to obscure meaning. The President has done a beautiful job of this in describing the impact of his budget.

Actual spending cuts are called "spending freeze" or "structural reforms." Proposed future tax increases are "a deficit insurance policy." The Reagan Recession is "the prolonged, costly transition to non-inflationary growth."

These are called euphemisms, and sooner or later the Administration will run out of them. For its future benefit, these suggestions:

Cuts in nutrition for the needy: "Cholesterol control."

Unemployment: "Extended involuntary vacation."

Cuts in health care programs: "Medical facilities pressure relief."

Education cuts: "Temporary pause to assess where we are learningwise."

Odds 'n Ends

SLIPPAGE FOR REAGAN heavy among, of all groups, leaders of both large and small businesses, according to recent polls. Granted, polls ebb-flow-rise-fall, but unmistakable down trend is present from group he has courted most avidly with all kinds of tax, and other, goodies.

POLL OF SMALL BUSINESS chiefs by Dun and Bradstreet finds only 34 percent now expect Reagan economic program to have healthy effect on economy—cut almost in half from the 66 percent confidence of a year earlier.

ANOTHER SAMPLING of small business—this one by the Walter Heller Institute—shows 30 percent decline of confidence in Reagan's leadership and large minority—39 percent—finding no help coming from Reagan's much-ballyhooed tax program.

AMONG BIG BUSINESS leaders, confidence in Reaganomics plunged from 58 percent in December 1981 to 27 percent a year later, according to Gallup Poll. Among executives of mid-level companies, confidence in President sagged from 61 percent to 41 percent December 1981-December 1982.

EVEN IN ENERGY BELT, support sags. Top corporate leaders in Texas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and Arkansas supported Reaganomics heavily—62 percent—as of April 1982, according to a poll. By December, support plummeted to 44 percent.

THIS IS RECOVERY? Fair question. Many economists see recent indicators as signs that "economic recovery" is imminent. Not a one of them, however, envisions early substantial dent in joblessness. In fact, all predict unemployment will remain above 10 percent for many years and above nine percent through this decade. What kind of "recovery" leaves nine or 10 of every 100 workers out of work? A feeble one!

WHILE WE'RE AT IT, what—or rather, who—are we "recovering" from? Seems overall the economy was pretty healthy as of January 1981—problems, yes; inflation, yes, though much of it energy-induced, with that part lowered the last two years less through anything positive this Administration has done than on account of oil glut, conservation practices and lower demand caused by recession. Other inflation reductions clearly result of recession. Many economists agree recession was due, but Reagan programs made it a much deeper downer than necessary, and a much longer one.

IMPACT OF RECESSION, plus cuts in federal aid, leaves many states in economic hot water. Average state entered this new fiscal year with just enough revenue in reserve to finance four working days. Reserves plummeted by two-thirds in one year.

Labor asks tax reforms to pay for jobs program

Jobless rate decline laid to seasonal fluke

Unemployment is still at an "intolerable" level in spite of an apparent decline in the nation's jobless rate to 10.4 percent last month, the AFL-CIO declared, calling for immediate action to alleviate the suffering of millions of workers without jobs.

"Congress must replace the unfair, distorted budget proposed by the Reagan Administration with provisions that will create jobs, protect the disadvantaged, and put the economy on the road to recovery," Federation President Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland said the four-tenths of 1 percent drop in the government's January seasonally adjusted jobless rate was derived largely from "mathematical statistics" made after every winter holiday season.

"The apparent drop in the unemployment rate reflects no real improvement," he said. "The new statistics indicate there is no upsurge in jobs. The decrease in the rate of joblessness was accounted for by the disappearance of some 600,000 individuals from the workforce."

Problems cited

Both the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Economic Research warned there may be serious seasonal adjustment problems with the January data that could have produced an exaggerated decline in the jobless rate. These problems could result in a reversal of the decline in coming months. A year ago, for instance, the January 1982 data showed a decline from a December rate of 8.8 to 8.5 percent. When revised figures were released, both the December and January rates were 8.6 percent.

Unusually mild weather last month may have contributed to the 115,000 increase in seasonally adjusted construction employment, federation economists said, noting that there was a drop of a quarter-million in the industry's unadjusted employment total. Similarly, a slow Christmas sales season last year meant less hiring than usual in December and thus fewer firings of temporary workers in January.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood said that seasonal adjustment is most difficult for January and June figures because weather and holiday-vacation patterns tend to change from year to year.

"Data for the month of January typically are subject to large seasonal swings, which are especially difficult to interpret during cyclical periods," she observed at a briefing before the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

Dubious improvement

She said that while last month's data indicated some improvement in the labor market, "the evidence suggests that the seasonal adjustment process may have somewhat exaggerated the December-to-January change."

For the first time, BLS calculated an unemployment rate based on the number of armed services personnel stationed in the United States as well as the civilian workforce. Under this new statistical system, the seasonally adjusted rate was determined to be 10.2 percent. This was down from what would have been 10.7 percent

Saving El Salvador

Salvadoran trade union leaders at a press conference at AFL-CIO headquarters stressed the need for continuation of land reform to solve their country's social and economic problems. The land redistribution program is due to expire next month. From the left, Samuel Maldonado of the Salvadoran Communal Union, Euladio Lopez of the Confederation of Salvadoran Workers, Francisco Zaldana of the Federation of Unions of Construction, Transport & Allied Workers and William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

U.S. urged to suspend arms aid to El Salvador

By James M. Shevis

All U.S. military aid to El Salvador should be suspended until the killers of two American labor representatives and a Salvadoran union leader are brought to justice, the AFL-CIO declared.

"There is no conscionable way we could see money provided by workers and taxpayers of this country going to the army of El Salvador, when it refuses to prosecute its own personnel for the killing of our citizens," Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development said at a press conference at the federation headquarters.

In seeking justice in the case of the 1981 murders of AIFLD representatives Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman, Doherty said, "we are seeking for all Salvadoran citizens the right to live under a rule of equally applied law.

"Until justice is available to all Salvadorans, true peace and democracy cannot prevail in that country, and our Salvadoran brothers and sisters will be condemned to live in an unjust society."

Kirkland hits inequities of Reagan plan

By David L. Perlman

A fast-track economic recovery program can be funded through tax reforms that would take a big step toward restoring fairness in government, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the House Budget Committee.

Kirkland stressed the "terrible urgency for Congress to move to immediate job creation" and protested the inequities of President Reagan's budget proposals.

"A federal budget should be the conscience of a nation, a clear expression of its hopes and priorities," Kirkland insisted. But the Reagan budget, he said, would "continue rewarding those with wealth and privilege" while demanding new sacrifices from the needy.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council will meet on Feb. 21 to shape the details of labor's alternative budget, Kirkland told the House committee.

Recovery agenda

He said the AFL-CIO's economic recovery agenda includes a large-scale community development program with 100 percent federal financing for cities to hire additional workers to provide needed services. It includes accelerated public works to provide quick employment and stimulate economic growth. And it calls for new federally assisted housing construction that would enlarge the supply of affordable housing while reducing unemployment.

Some Budget Committee members asked whether so much of the stimulus for economic recovery should come from the government sector rather than private industry.

"There are people hurting out there," Kirkland pointed out. America can't tolerate the abandonment of the full-employment goal mandated by the Humphrey-Hawkins Act, he insisted.

Kirkland reminded the panel members that the Administration's proposed budget

Federal unions cite pension fears

A House Ways & Means subcommittee wound up hearings on social security legislation after testimony that combined general praise for the recommendations of a bipartisan national commission with criticism of some of the specifics.

Unions representing federal and postal employees voiced strong objections to the proposal to bring new workers under social security coverage instead of including them in the existing Civil Service Retirement System.

Kenneth T. Blaylock, who testified both as president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and as head of the American Federation of Government Employees, challenged the motive of the changeover proposal. He charged that federal and postal workers were being used as "political pawns" to pump more revenue into the social security trust fund without any consideration of the destructive impact on the existing civil service retirement program.

Blaylock questioned, as did Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto and Postal Workers President Moe Biller, the assumptions of "savings" that would result from the changeover and from another recommendation to end so-called "windfall benefits" to workers covered by both systems.

Taxing full payroll

Blaylock commended the alternative suggested by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who served on the bipartisan commission, that the federal coverage issue be deferred and that revenue needs be met by extending the employer portion of the social security tax to cover a firm's full payroll.

In some other areas of the commission's recommendations:

- National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman termed the consensus recommendations of the bipartisan commission "a generally acceptable compromise" but said the proposed six-month delay in cost-of-living adjustments for present retirees would hit hardest "the low-income elderly with little or no other financial support."

OSHA asks 'static' budget for fiscal '84

Occupational Safety & Health Administrator Thorne G. Auchter, boasting that his agency has proven it is now "doing more with less," has submitted a budget request for fiscal 1984 for $210.8 million—an increase of just $4 million over this year.

George H. R. Taylor, director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, charged that such a budget will leave the agency "static" since it fails even to cover increased costs of inflation.

Only one additional full-time position is requested for the agency.

Auchter estimated OSHA would conduct some 63,500 inspections in fiscal 1984, the same as in fiscal 1983. Taylor pointed out that half the inspections now being done are "paper" inspections—where inspectors review the health and safety records of a plant without making a physical "walk-through." "The decline in the number of real inspections is continuing," Taylor said.

The OSHA budget also shows that the agency contemplates issuing only two new health standards in fiscal 1984, compared to the eight standards issued in fiscal 1983. Ten new safety standards are anticipated, compared to only three in fiscal 1983.

Cuts in research

The agency's request for the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, OSHA's research arm, is down by $2.7 million and includes no request for training funds. Congress designated $5.7 million for training in the NIOSH appropriation included in the fiscal 1983 continuing resolution it passed in December.

OSHA again proposes legislative language that would set "benchmark" levels for state-run programs. It unsuccessfully sought similar legislation in an appropriations bill rider last fall. The rider would have reduced the number of enforcement personnel from the 2,837 inspectors required by the benchmark set during the Carter Administration to just 752.

The agency recommended language specifying that state-run programs will not be required to reduce their staffs if they employ more persons than recommended in OSHA's benchmark proposals.

Taylor said the budget request for the Mine Safety & Health Administration recommends elimination of 156 inspectors.

6 trade unionists awarded degrees in labor studies

Six more trade unionists have been graduated with degrees from the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The new graduates are Van Edwin Blades of Aurora, Colo., Food & Commercial Workers; Alexander C. Cullison of Kenner, La., Marine Engineers; Suzanne C. Kaszar of Akron, Ohio, Rubber Workers; John P. Kurtz of Lakewood, Colo., United Transportation Union; Paul McQuillen of Hamburg, N.Y., Railway & Airline Clerks, and Charles LeRoy Stover of Lanham, Md., Operating Engineers.

In a commencement address, President John DeConcini of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers urged the graduates to "get out there on the stump and work as disciples, evangelists and preachers to make sure the American people know of the great contribution the trade union movement has made to this country."

The college degree program is offered by Antioch University in cooperation with the George Meany Center. It permits the participants to work toward college degrees without interrupting their union work. They also earn college credits for competencies gained through union activities.

With the February commencement, 39 unionists have received degrees of bachelor of arts in labor studies since the program was started in 1974.

'Well, Garbage In, Garbage Out!'

Improved jobless benefits pressed at House hearings

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to strengthen the unemployment insurance program instead of diverting scarce federal funds into a new voucher system of tax credits for employers.

A House Ways & Means subcommittee is considering legislation to continue the temporary program of from eight to 16 weeks of federal supplemental benefits beyond its Mar. 31 expiration date. But more than a patchwork measure is needed, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified.

Seidman, joined by Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten, said the severity and duration of the present recession has spotlighted the inadequacy of the existing unemployment structure.

"Not since the Great Depression have so many workers been without jobs," Seidman noted, and cutbacks in the extended unemployment compensation program legislated by Congress in 1980 and 1981 cut holes in the safety net just as the recession was getting under way. Fewer than half the states now pay the additional 13 weeks of extended benefits to jobless workers whose regular state benefits have been exhausted.

Extending benefits

Against that backdrop, the establishment of the temporary federal supplemental benefits program "was a much needed step in the right direction," he said. It should be continued "for at least one year beyond its current expiration date."

But a simple extension "is not enough," Seidman testified. Benefits of unemployed workers shouldn't depend on where they happen to live or work.

"A federal program of unemployed benefits, financed from general revenues, must protect unemployed workers equally," he said.

Seidman urged the AFL-CIO's proposal for a permanent federal supplemental benefits program of at least 26 weeks of payments in addition to regular state benefits and the extended benefits program. The added federal payments should not depend on state trigger rates, he said.

As for the Administration plan to encourage the hiring of the long-term unemployed by rewarding employers with additional tax breaks, Seidman protested that it wouldn't result in job creation and would be wide open to abuse.

Seidman criticized also Administration proposals to tighten the requirements for federal supplemental benefits and to condition payments on participation of jobless in training programs regardless of their practicality.

Targeted training

Instead, he said, "unemployed persons should be allowed and encouraged to choose training for which there is a reasonable expectation of a job."

Seidman noted the burden the long recession has put on state unemployment insurance reserves and suggested that Congress reimburse all states from general revenues for their share of additional costs resulting from recession. He urged a flexible repayment schedule for states that have borrowed unemployment insurance money from the federal government so that repayment would not have to begin until the state program has replenished its reserves.

For the future, he suggested a system of federal reinsurance.

Seidman also protested an Administration proposal that would set stricter eligibility standards—requiring a longer work history in the year before unemployment—for the supplemental benefits program.

The present 20 weeks of work requirement is "more than sufficient to demonstrate long-term attachment to the labor force." Seidman said. Adding an additional 10 weeks would deny benefits to hundreds of thousands of unemployed men and women.

Steelworkers seek security, aid for jobless

Pittsburgh—Bargaining goals laid out by the Steelworkers for 1983 contract negotiations with major steel companies call for job security and help for unemployed members who are the victims of today's "harsh economic climate."

Negotiations on local issues with the "Big Eight" companies began Feb. 7, and industry-wide talks on wage and benefit issues are expected to get under way by Feb. 15.

A statement of overall bargaining strategy adopted by the union's Basic Steel Industry Conference earlier this month says USWA negotiators will consider some wage and benefit reductions to help the depressed industry "get over the hump" of the current economic crisis.

But in return, they will insist on a contract that will repay workers for any concessions, require that savings to the companies be put back into their industry and provide job security.

Early agreement

Although the current three-year agreement runs until Aug. 1, Steelworkers Vice President Joseph Odorcich said both parties hope to reach agreement on a new contract by Mar. 1 before major customers place orders that could otherwise go to foreign producers.

The major companies involved in the negotiations are U.S. Steel Corp., Inland Steel Co., Republic Steel Corp., Bethlehem Steel Corp., Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., Armco Inc., Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp. and National Steel Corp.

The statement adopted by the 230 local union presidents who make up the conference—and who will vote on a final agreement—notes that the USWA is going into negotiations in "the severest economic climate" since the union was founded in the 1930s. It charts an overall bargaining strategy meant "to stem the tide of unemployment and make jobs more secure" and "to provide benefits for those on layoff."

Before the union talks about concessions, the conference said, it must be satisfied that the company is really in trouble and that any wage "relief" be answered by commitments to "materially improve" job prospects.

Concession protection

The USWA said it wants "safeguards" if any concessions are made, including a plan to repay any wage or benefit cuts during the life of the contract, such as by cash, preferred stock, profit-sharing or related programs. The union will also insist that cost-of-living structures are maintained.

Companies will be pressed to make "enforceable" commitments against permanent shutdowns of plants during the term of the agreement. The USWA also will want guarantees that "savings realized from any relief negotiated by the union," will be reinvested in plants and facilities where union members work, not in other "corporate ventures."

Summer or winter

Lower youth pay hit as 'wrong approach'

Reducing the minimum wage isn't the answer to high youth unemployment, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald insisted at House hearings.

Oswald told the House Education & Labor Committee that the AFL-CIO's opposition to past proposals for a subminimum youth wage applies also to the Reagan Administration's new focus on summer jobs.

Some surprise

The Administration wants to drop the minimum wage to $2.50 an hour for persons under 22 between May 1 and Sept. 30 each year. At a budget briefing, Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan predicted "a pleasant surprise" at the number of $2.50-an-hour summer jobs that would open up for youth, although he conceded that some of them would come from the replacement of adults by younger and lower-paid workers.

Oswald told the House committee that there is a need for youth employment and training programs and for improved vocational education. "Unfortunately, the Administration is taking the wrong approach" by supporting a special summer subminimum wage.

The $3.35 minimum has already been reduced 15 percent in real buying power, Oswald noted. And an accompanying AFL-CIO fact sheet noted that the Administration proposal would also undercut the special $2.84-an-hour rate now paid to some 500,000 full-time students working part time and to handicapped workers in sheltered programs.

It stressed that the major impediment to youth summer employment is the depressed state of the economy.

Labor's alternative

Oswald's testimony described the principal ingredients of labor's job program and emphasized the need for direct government job creation.

The $200 billion deficit now projected for this fiscal year would have been substantially less if the AFL-CIO's job proposals had been adopted last year, Oswald said. But at that time, he noted, President Reagan was contending that any jobs program would be too costly.

"Job creation is a moral, social, political and economic imperative," Oswald insisted.

Every one million jobless workers cost the nation nearly $30 billion. Added to that, Oswald testified, are the "tremendous social losses" from unemployment, including "physical and mental illness, family disorganization, social alienation and crime."

Yet the Administration response "has essentially been a hands-off approach," Oswald protested. "America clearly needs jobs, yet the President continues to reject all jobs programs."

Oswald told the committee that the new community development supplemental jobs program the AFL-CIO is advocating would be targeted to high-unemployment areas.

Such a program, he said, should require that at least 85 percent of federal funds go to payroll costs and should prohibit reducing existing community jobs.

Program possibilities

As examples of jobs that could be created under such a program, Oswald cited:

- Helping working mothers with child care.
- Traffic control to free regular police for full-time duty.
- Increased staff support for adult and juvenile correctional facilities.
- Security guards for schools and housing projects.
- Staff support for community health centers and preventive health screening and immunization programs.
- Rat and mosquito control.
- Twice-a-week garbage collection.
- Patching potholes and other minor road repair.
- Traffic control signs and removal of road sign obstructions.
- Park and streams clean-up.
- School crossing and intersection markings.
- Home security for elderly and low-income people.
- Weatherization of public buildings and low-income homes.

"Each community could use the funds for whatever jobs it deemed most appropriate," Oswald testified.

Agenda for recovery

Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale and Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), right, are welcomed to the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League national conference by IAM President William W. Winpisinger. The union's 1983 legislative agenda was spelled out at the four-day conference in San Francisco that drew IAM representatives from locals across the nation.

Kirkland rips 'shoddy' study on service contract protection

A report by the Government Accounting Office recommending that Congress repeal the Service Contract Act isa "shoddy and unbalanced work" that concentrates on the act's costs to the government while ignoring the interests of workers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged in a letter to Controller Gen. Charles A. Bowsher.

The report, which the GAO said was based on three years of research, cited the difficulty in administering the act and concluded that Congress should repeal it and "allow competitive labor market forces to establish wages and fringe benefits for service contract employees." The act is designed to assure that service workers employed under contracts with the federal government are paid the wages and fringe benefits prevailing in the area where the work is performed, but at least the federal minimum wage.

Kirkland's letter commented that the GAO's draft report "represents one political point of view rather than a balanced analysis" of the act.

"The authors have emphasized the interests of the procurement community while ignoring the legitimate income maintenance and job security interests of workers directly employed by the government and those indirectly employed through service contractors—the individuals Congress intended to protect in enacting the SCA."

Faulty methods

The responses from Kirkland and the Labor Dept. both found fault with the methodology of the GAO research. Kirkland noted that the study was limited to wage determinations in 21 Sunbelt states. He pointed out that "the report's authors state that 'we cannot statistically project our sample results . . .' and then go ahead and make projections. This is only the beginning of the study's methodological imperfections."

AFL-CIO economist John Zalusky said the report was "so shabbily done" that there is little chance Congress will act on its recommendation.

Zalusky pointed out that nearly all the outside business organizations contacted by the researchers were hostile to the intent of the act, and some of the labor organizations the authors said they had contacted were never approached.

The SCA covers service contracts in excess of $2,500. The report noted there are 46,461 contracts—valued at more than $10,000 each and totaling about $5.7 billion—that are subject to the act. The GAO report said repealing the act "could reduce annual government expenditures for contract services by hundreds of millions of dollars."

SCA coverage

Of all of the contracts the government makes each year, the ones covered by the SCA represent only 4 percent of the total dollar amounts contracted out, Zalusky said. He noted that most of the workers employed under these contracts are in lower wage classifications.

The White House's Office of Management & Budget called the report's recommendation "premature" because the Labor Dept. "is making changes in its regulations that would correct or alleviate many of the problems of coverage and administration of SCA."

Zalusky pointed out that the Labor Dept.'s proposals would significantly change the SCA through redefinitions of coverage and exemptions. These would reduce or eliminate protections for a wide range of workers, from custodians to high-technology maintenance personnel.

Labor has expressed strong opposition to these changes in SCA regulations, and Zalusky said it is "very likely" that the AFL-CIO will go to court to block their implementation if the Labor Dept. issues them.

Real family earnings down 1.7%

Real earnings of American families declined by 1.7 percent between the fourth quarters of 1981 and 1982, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Although the median family earnings of $453 a week in the final quarter of 1982 were up 2.7 percent from a year earlier, adjustment for inflation during that time resulted in the decline in real earnings, BLS noted. Inflation, as measured by the government's consumer price index, rose 4.5 percent between the fourth quarters of 1981 and 1982.

The 1981-1982 decline in real family earnings compares with a 2.7 percent drop between the fourth quarters of 1980 and 1981, BLS said.

For individual full-time workers, real earnings rose nine-tenths of 1 percent from fourth-quarter 1981 to fourth-quarter 1982, compared to a decline of seven-tenths of 1 percent a year earlier. Median earnings among this group, without adjustment for inflation, rose 5.3 percent to $316 a week during the 1982 fourth quarter.

Working couples lose

For married-couple families with two wage earners, the median weekly wage increased to $619 in 1982, but again inflation caused a two-tenths of 1 percent decline in pay.

Other highlights of the BLS report:

- Of the nation's 61.8 million families, the number with earnings derived solely from wages and salaries fell 600,000 from 1981 to 1982 to 40.7 million.

This decline "reflected the difficult employment situation that prevailed during 1982," BLS observed. Last year's average jobless rate of 9.7 percent was the highest since 1941.

No income

At the same time, BLS said, the number of families with no earned income from either wages and salaries or self-employment rose by about one million.

- There was an 800,000 decline in the number of families with two or more workers. Multi-earner families, however, still accounted for 51 percent of all wage-earning families. At $605, their median weekly earnings were nearly double those for one-earner families.
- Married-couple families averaged $500 a week in wages and salaries during the fourth quarter of last year. In general, their earnings were higher when the husband was employed—$405 where he was the only worker, $603 where he and his wife worked, and $809 where he, his wife, and at least one other family member had jobs.
- Median weekly earnings for families maintained by women were $257, about half that of married couples. BLS said this reflected not only the lower average earnings of women but also the fact that only 27 percent of the families maintained by them had more than one worker, compared with 56 percent of the married-couple families.
- White families continued to bring home substantially higher weekly earnings than black or Hispanic families. The overall weekly median of $507 for white married-couple families was 21 percent greater than for blacks, $418, and 30 percent higher than for Hispanics, $391.

The number of families with at least one unemployed member jumped 1.8 million over the year to 8.4 million in the fourth quarter, bringing the proportion of all families with an unemployed member to 13.7 percent, up from 10.9 percent a year earlier. About 2.7 million families—nearly one-third of all families with unemployment—had no earners whatever.

Farmers earn least

Among individual workers, median weekly earnings were $316 in the final quarter of 1982—$379 for men and $248 for women. Among the major occupational groups, managers and administrators continued to have the highest median weekly earnings, $433, while farm workers earned the least. The highest-paid occupation for women continued to be the professional and technical category.

Median weekly wages for women were about 65 percent of median male wages, BLS said, noting that the female-to-male ratio of median earnings has risen about one percentage point a year since 1979.

Talks termed no substitute for Trade Act enforcement

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to reject a new trade bill that only substitutes more talk for action to persuade other countries to open their markets to give equal access to U.S. goods.

Federation Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan testified to a Senate trade subcommittee that the so-called reciprocal trade and investment act would not "mandate action for reciprocity," but only acquiesce to Reagan Administration demands that new trade legislation should be limited to providing a "blank check" for more negotiating authority to get other countries to drop their barriers.

What really is needed, Koplan stressed, is active enforcement of existing trade laws.

"There is no way that mere negotiations can get us out of the current unfavorable trend in world trade. If we are to be effective, we must have something to withhold and then negotiate about," he said.

Presidential power

Koplan pointed out that the Trade Act of 1974 already gives the President the authority to end or pull out of trade agreements if other parties are discriminating against U.S. goods. The same law, he said, gives the President power to take "all appropriate and feasible steps" to get other nations to drop "unreasonable trade restrictions or subsidies affecting U.S. commerce."

Past administrations have been reluctant to use the authority, Koplan said, but he stressed that the Reagan Administration's proposals for new trade legislation would "unilaterally encourage U.S. imports at the expense of American industries and jobs."

No reciprocity

He noted that Administration policies, like the Caribbean Basin Initiative that would funnel more imports into the United States, contain no reciprocity standards.

Another part of the proposed bill, Koplan said, would give the President a five-year authority to cut existing tariffs on a number of high technology products.

The effect would be an incentive for U.S. companies to move their production to other countries that still have tariffs and export goods back into the United States where tariffs have been unilaterally dropped. The result, Koplan warned, "will be the U.S. export of highly skilled jobs."

Other parts of the bill would also encourage direct U.S. investment abroad, Koplan said. Pointing to record high unemployment and the declining industrial base, he said the AFL-CIO does not think that "in these troubled times" investments overseas should be a "negotiating priority of our government."

Koplan told the panel that U.S. trade policy "cannot afford to substitute a cosmetic gesture for effective programs and action to make reciprocity a reality."

Fast-track recovery

Tax reforms pressed to fund jobs program is based on an economic assumption that unemployment will stay close to 10 percent through 1984 and would still be above 7 percent in 1987.

That's not the "course" most Americans want, he testified.

Beyond the immediate task of alleviating suffering, Kirkland renewed the AFL-CIO's call for a government-labor-industry partnership to channel public and private funds and loan guarantees into projects to modernize and strengthen America's industrial base. He spoke of the high promise of the National Accord reached during the Carter Administration, but aborted with the change of administration.

Kirkland put the price tag for labor's jobs program at $22.5 billion for the remainder of this fiscal year and $46 billion for the fiscal year that starts next Oct. 1.

It can be achieved, he stressed, without adding to Reagan's deficit projection and with the added bonus of making the federal tax structure more equitable.

As a first step, he urged Congress to put a $700 ceiling on the next scheduled step of the income tax cut, which is to take effect in July. Such a ceiling would have little or no effect on taxpayers with incomes under $45,000, he noted, thus leaving in place a substantial consumer buying stimulus.

As it is now structured, Kirkland noted, $10 billion or about one-third of the July tax cut would go to the wealthiest 5 percent of taxpayers. "That $10 billion is just about equal to the amount of proposed reductions in food stamps, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Supplemental Security Income and child nutrition programs over the next five years," he reminded the committee.

That immediate step should be joined by repeal of the tax-bracket indexing provision scheduled to take effect in 1985 and by a sharp paring of revenue-losing features of tax law, including closing of loopholes added in the 1981 tax legislation.

Kirkland told the Budget Committee that the AFL-CIO's tax proposals would save the Treasury about $40 billion in fiscal 1984 and about $175 billion in the 1984-86 period.

By contrast, he said, the Administration's complex standby surtax plan would continue inequities, while new tax credits proposed by the Administration, such as private school tuition, would inject new inequities into the system. At the same time, the Administration wants to tax workers on the value of the most comprehensive health care programs.

Starting over

Kirkland asked the committee to undertake a "wholesale rewrite" of the Administration's budget and to reject proposals that would:

- Divert federal unemployment funds into a voucher system that would reward employers who hire jobless workers with tax credits equal to the value of unused unemployment benefits. Nothing would prevent employers from hiring voucher-carrying workers to collect the subsidy and firing current workers, Kirkland noted.
- Require Medicare patients to pay more for hospitalization up to 60 days. For an average elderly widow, Kirkland said, the added cost would amount to nearly two months of social security payments.
- Escalate the Administration's "war on federal and postal employees" who would be hit with reduced retirement protection and increased contribution costs, a pay freeze and substitution of social security for civil service retirement coverage for new employees.
- Reduce mass transit funding by almost $1 billion from levels authorized by the Surface Transportation Act.
- Terminate all Trade Adjustment Assistance benefits for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by imports.

Warren Smith named to key Ohio cabinet post

Columbus, Ohio—Warren J. Smith is taking a leave of absence from his post as secretary-treasurer of the Ohio AFL-CIO, to become the director of the Ohio Dept. of Transportation.

Smith was appointed to the cabinet position by Democratic Gov. Richard Celeste. Smith has been secretary-treasurer of the state labor federation since 1967.

U.S. urged to suspend military aid to Salvador

Doherty, who has also recommended the military aid suspension earlier before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was accompanied by leaders of several Salvadoran trade union organizations representing some half-million workers. They included Sec. Gen. Francisco Zaldana of the Federation of Unions of Construction, Transport & Aliled Workers, Sec. Gen. Samuel Maldonado of the Salvadoran Communal Union, Sec. Gen. Euladio Lopez of the Confederation of Salvadoran Workers, and Sen. Gen. Jorge Camacho of the Association of Integrated Cooperatives of Agrarian Production, all of whom support the AFL-CIO position.

Doherty also warned the AFL-CIO will favor immediate suspension of economic aid to El Salvador if that country's "land to the tiller' program is terminated, as threatened, on Mar. 3. The agrarian reform plan, begun in 1980, would permit campesinos, or peasants, to buy the small plots of land they work as tenant farmers or sharecroppers.

Proper solution

Doherty and the Salvadoran trade union leaders stressed that the land redistribution process set in motion under Decree 207 is fundamental to the solution of the country's complicated social and economic problems.

"Closing down the program on Mar. 3 by not extending the degree is tantamount to killing the land reform, when it is only approximately 40 percent complete," Doherty warned.

It was the land reform effort that brought Pearlman and Hammer to El Salvador. They and Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of the Salvadoran government's Institute for Agrarian Transformation, were killed by gunmen as they sat in the coffee shop of a San Salvador hotel on Jan. 3, 1981. Two Salvadoran National Guard corporals have sworn they carried out the murders under orders from a politically influential lieutenant, an army captain, and a wealthy Salvadoran businessman.

The corporals currently are being considered for trial, but the persons who issued the orders are not.

Overwhelming evidence

"We will not be satisfied with the prosecution of two triggermen," Doherty said, adding that evidence compiled by a special investigating committee appointed by Salvadoran President Alvaro Magana is overwhelming in the case against the two officers and businessman.

Doherty leveled scathing criticism of what he called El Salvador's "thoroughly rotten" judicial system, which has allowed the trio to escape justice. The judges often are intimidated or bought, he charged. He called for the issuance of new arrest warrants and trials of the three men.

Given this legacy of judicial corruption and the need to overcome it, Doherty recommended broadening the certification requirement for military aid to provide that El Salvador not only comply with internationally recognized human rights but also take concrete steps to "restructure and reform the judicial system, and to remove it from corruption and political control and influence."

Certification that the Salvadoran government has made progress in human rights, economic reforms, political democracy, and national reconciliation is required by law every six months for the Reagan Administration to continue giving military aid.

At a hearing of the House subcommittee on Western Hemisphere affairs, Assistant Sec. of State for Inter-American Affairs Thomas O. Enders defended President Reagan's certification last month that sufficient progress had been made to warrant further aid. Such certification is not needed in granting economic assistance.

Cautious optimism

While the AFL-CIO opposes certification on the basis of El Salvador's handling of the prosecution for the murders, Doherty said, other aspects of the human rights situation there seem to be improving. He said that presidential elections are scheduled for March 1984 and that workers' representatives are beginning to be placed on Salvadoran advisory commissions. He noted, with cautious optimism, that the Popular Democratic Union—the umbrella trade union movement in El Salvador—openly criticizes governmental actions today, something that would have been unheard of three years ago.

On the land reform program, Doherty said that significant progress has been recorded during the last six months, especially since November. During November and December of 1982 and January of 1983, he said, the number of new title applications from peasants working the land has averaged approximately 5,000 a month.

Slow process

Statistics on the issuance of titles are less encouraging, however, Doherty said. Only 1,050 such titles have been given to the campesinos because the law states that compensation must be paid to former landowners before a title can be awarded. Because of its economic difficulties, the government has delayed payments. Also, landowners' right to challenge a campesino's provisional title have produced a spate of appeals, which can be expected to accelerate as the landowners meet success in the appeals procedure.

If the land program is ended, as threatened by right-wing elements in the nation's Constituent Assembly, it would not constitute progress under the certification process. The AFL-CIO would immediately withdraw its support of continued economic aid and urge Congress to bring it to a halt.

AFL-CIO news

Vol. 28, No. 6 FEBRUARY 12, 1983

1982 Supplemental Report on the 97th Congress

The 1982 voting record of Congress appeared in the October 9 issue of the AFL-CIO News, so union members and their families could study their legislators' records before the Nov. 2 election. After publication of that report, the 97th Congress voted on a number of additional issues of importance to working people, and returned after the election to wrestle with job-related issues until the week before Christmas. These votes, which are detailed in the following pages, tell you whether or not your legislators were concerned enough about the hardship of recession to take strong action, or whether they chose to "stay the curse" of Reaganomics, no matter what the harm to the economy and peoples' lives.

Because these votes are of such major importance, the AFL-CIO for the first time is publishing a supplemental voting record to provide you with a complete record of the work of the 97th Congress.

Among the most important of these votes were:

- The balanced budget amendment—a radical right-wing formula to write Reaganomics, into the U.S. Constitution and force massive cuts in government programs, including social security.
- The domestic auto content legislation to require foreign auto manufacturers to stock their cars with an increasing level of U.S.-made component parts and, thereby generate 800,000 jobs in auto production and its supplier industries.
- The so-called Caribbean Basin Initiative bill—just another scheme to export U.S. jobs and technology.
- Legislation to put America back to work through job-creating public works, housing and highway programs.

This special supplemental Report on Congress outlines these and other key votes cast by Congress in late 1982. This voting record tells you where your representative and senators stood—for you or against you.

NOTE: Seven key votes in the House of Representatives and eight votes in the Senate are contained in this report. These votes have been added to each member's previous votes on issues the AFL-CIO considers of prime importance. New cumulative totals, right and wrong, and a new lifetime "correct vote" percentage are listed for each member.

Labor's Stand on Major Issues in the Senate

1. Protecting Union Political Rights

As Congress approached adjournment for the campaign recess of November 1982, Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) attempted to legislate a sweeping attack on the rights of unions to undertake get-out-the-vote drives and other voter education activities among their members. A Helms amendment to an appropriations bill sought to stop unions from spending funds for any political purposes. Helms contended that such a punitive restriction was necessary in order to be ". . . consistent with the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court." In fact, no Supreme Court decision ever inflicted upon unions the broad prohibitions of the Helms amendment. Helms's real purpose was twofold: to prevent unions from exercising their First Amendment right to communicate with their members on political issues; and to prevent unions from encouraging their members to participate in the democratic election process.

Realizing that Sen. Helms was fronting for the anti-worker National Right to Work Committee, the Senate approved, by a 62-37 vote on Sept. 29, a motion by Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.) to table and thus kill the Helms amendment.

For tabling—Right Against tabling—Wrong

2. Creating Jobs for the Unemployed I

Although unemployment was the number one issue in the 1982 elections, efforts by congressional Democrats to pass job-creation legislation were thwarted by Republicans in the Senate and by the repeated threat of veto by President Reagan. Despite this opposition, the House passed a $5.4 billion job-creation package of proven public works projects (See House Vote 5).

In the Senate, Minority Leader Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) offered a similar package of jobs programs as an amendment to the highway repair bill. The Byrd amendment provided that the job-creating work would be financed by "capping" the planned 1983 income tax cuts for high-income individuals—a measure long advocated by the AFL-CIO. The tax cut would be delayed only for those with incomes greater than $50,000 per year. The Byrd amendment also included an extension of unemployment benefits. As a package, the Byrd amendment combined a concern for the 12 million unemployed Americans with a commitment to fairness in tax policy. Unfortunately, Republican opposition killed this initiative as the Byrd amendment was defeated 44-53 on Dec. 14.

3. "Buy American" Protection to Save U.S. Jobs

Long-overdue legislation to rehabilitate the nation's highways was passed in the lame-duck session to provide badly needed maintenance of the U.S. transportation network while giving some measure of relief to the unemployed by putting an estimated 320,000 Americans back to work. During Senate debate, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) tried to create even more jobs by offering an amendment to the bill requiring that only U.S.-made steel and cement be used in projects funded by the bill. This would ensure the greatest amount of "ripple effect" in creating jobs in supplier industries for this highway program.

Once again, Republicans thwarted this job-creating effort. Sens. John Chafee (R-R.I.) and John Danforth (R-Mo.) filibustered the Metzenbaum amendment after which Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) offered a motion to table it. Over labor's objections, the Senate approved the Baker motion by a 51-47 vote on Dec. 15. (However, a "buy American" provision which had been approved earlier by the House was maintained in the bill as signed into law.)

4. Protecting Consumers by Containing Health Care Costs

In the closing days of the 97th Congress, special-interest lobbies led by the American Medical Association (AMA) tried to eliminate the consumer protection, anti-monopoly powers of the FTC in the area of professional services. In essence, the AMA sought to carve out for itself and certain other professions a special anti-trust immunity. In the health care field this proposal would allow medical associations to thwart efforts by unions and other groups to lower health care costs for their members.

After the battle was lost in the House (see House Votes 2 and 3), the Senate turned the tables on the AMA. During debate on an appropriations bill, the Senate approved a motion by Sen. Warren Rudman (R-N.H.) to table and thereby kill an amendment by Sen. James McClure (R-Ida.) to bar use of FTC funds to

Labor's Stand on House Issues

1. Keeping Reaganomics Out of the Constitution

In 1982 President Reagan and the radical right teamed up with congressional conservatives in an unprecedented attack on the U.S. Constitution. Within less than a month the President proposed three constitutional amendments, the most serious of which would have written Reaganomics into the Constitution. The President proposed to do this through a so-called balanced budget amendment which he offered even as his own federal budget policies were producing the largest budget deficits in U.S. history.

The AFL-CIO led a broad-based coalition effort against the amendment, which would require the United States to have a balanced budget regardless of economic conditions. It could be waived only for a national emergency or a three-fifths vote. Over 500 nationally known economists and constitutional scholars announced their opposition to it. The coalition opposed the amendment for several reasons: Such a constitutional straitjacket would prevent Congress from using its taxing and spending authority to end depression, natural disaster or to meet other emergencies; a three-fifths majority required by the amendment to pass a deficit undermines majority rule, handing the congressional power of the purse to a two-fifths minority; and finally, the budgetary fallout of the amendment would wipe out most federal programs that help working Americans.

Although the Senate passed the amendment, an intensive AFL-CIO grass roots lobbying campaign culminated in its defeat by a 236-187 vote in the House on Oct. 1 (a two-thirds vote—290 votes—is required to pass a constitutional amendment).

2. Protecting Consumers by Containing Health Care Costs I

Organized labor for years has been in the forefront of legislative and collective bargaining efforts to promote low-cost alternative health care systems for its members. Recently, however, labor's efforts as well as those of consumer, governmental and other groups have been thwarted by anti-competitive practices of state medical associations. In several instances, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), a watch-dog consumer agency of the federal government, intervened and used its statutory authority to stop such activities through

In the closing days of the 97th Congress, special-interest lobbies led by the American Medical Association (AMA) tried to eliminate the consumer protection, anti-monopoly powers of the FTC in the area of professional services. In essence, the AMA sought to carve out for itself and certain other professions a special antitrust immunity.

During House debate on a bill to provide funding for the FTC, Rep. Tom Luken (D-Ohio) offered an AMA-sponsored amendment to prevent the FTC from intervening to stop monopolistic practices in the health care marketplace. In a strategy designed to sidetrack the Luken amendment, the AFL-CIO joined consumer groups in backing a bipartisan, compromise substitute amendment by Reps. Jim Florio (D-N.J.) and John Dingell (D- Mich.) which essentially retained the FTC's jurisdiction. This strategy failed, however, when the House rejected the substitute amendment 195-208 on Dec. 4, after which the House agreed to the Luken proposal. (Fortunately, the Senate rejected a similar amendment—see Senate Vote 4—so this anti-consumer proposal did not become law.)

3. Protecting Consumers II

The defeat of the Dingell/Florio amendment (House Vote 2) paved the way for approval of the Luken amendment to eliminate the FTC's consumer protection authority in this area. As passed by the House, the Luken amendment gave the AMA the anti-trust exemption it sought. By a 245-155 vote the House approved the Luken amendment on Dec. 4.

4. Saving Davis-Bacon Fair Wage Protections

Very few public works projects are approved by Congress without first facing right-wing attempts to remove the protections of a key federal fair wage law—the Davis-Bacon Act. This 1931 law ensures that workers on federally financed construction projects will be paid at the wage rates that prevail in their area of the country. For 50 years the Davis-Bacon Act has guaranteed that local contractors who uphold community labor standards will not be undercut by out-of-state firms using cut-rate labor.

There were three anti-Davis-Bacon amendments offered to the highway repair/job creation legislation of the 1982 lame-duck session. The most serious threat was an amendment by Rep. Buddy Roemer (D-La.) to restrict the Davis-Bacon requirements to "initial construction" projects in the highway bill. This amendment could have removed Davis-Bacon protections from all highway resurfacing and repair work under the bill. Fortunately, the House rejected the Roemer amendment 191-194 on Dec. 6.

5. Creating Jobs for the Unemployed

National unemployment in 1982 climbed to the highest level since the Great Depression. By year's end more than 11 million workers were officially counted as jobless. Yet as additional hundreds of thousands of American families suffered layoffs and joined the ranks of the "new poor," President Reagan urged patience. By the fall elections, the patience of the voters had worn thin, and many Congressional adherents of "stay the course"—known as "Reagan robots"—were defeated. The message from the electorate was clear: Change course, take action now to reverse the decline in the economy.

Congress returned to Washington for the post-election, lame-duck session with Democrats and Republicans alike declaring that creating jobs would be their Number 1 priority. House Democrats crafted a $5.4 billion job-creation program designed to swiftly put the unemployed back to work on a wide variety of programs, including sewer and waste disposal, flood prevention, veterans' hospital modernization, parks, public housing maintenance, and prison and jail repair. "Do nothing" Republicans tried to kill even this modest job-creation program. Their efforts were in vain as a motion by Rep. Silvio Conte (R-Mass.) to send the bill back to committee to kill the job-creation package was defeated 191-215 on Dec. 14. (Ultimately, however, the job-creation package was killed by the threat of a veto by President Reagan.)

6. Restoring Jobs in America's Auto Industry

The flood of foreign imports into the United States has contributed to the decline of major domestic industries over the last decade. For example, in the auto industry and its many supplier industries—steel, rubber, glass, textiles and electronics—750,000 jobs were lost between 1978 and 1981. During that same period. Japanese auto imports jumped by more than 33 percent while domestic auto sales plummeted by the same amount.

To help put America back to work and restore the health of this key industry, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to adopt legislation to require foreign auto manufacturers with a large share of the U.S. market to manufacture increasing portions of their vehicles here, using American labor and materials. Called the domestic content bill, the legislation would produce an estimated 800,000 jobs in auto production and supplier industries.

By the closing days of the 97th Congress, after an intensive labor lobbying effort, a majority of House members had agreed to cosponsor the domestic content bill. On Dec. 15 the content bill was passed by a 215-188 vote. Although a similar bill failed to reach the Senate floor for a vote, the record of committee hearings and the strong House vote were expected to encourage action on the content bill in the new 98th Congress.

7. Stopping the Export of U.S. Jobs

The Reagan Administration's so-called Caribbean Basin Initiative, strongly backed by big business, contained special trade privileges for this region that would encourage U.S.-based multinationals to close their domestic plants and build new plants abroad in order to funnel their products through the Caribbean.

The AFL-CIO warned Congress that this misguided proposal would do little to improve industry or working conditions in the Caribbean. Rather it would accelerate the flood of imports into the United States and export thousands of American jobs at a time of record high unemployment. Earlier, the federation reiterated its commitment to Caribbean workers and supported congressional passage of an economic aid program to help the region meet its massive problems and develop its economy. Despite labor's opposition, the House passed the job-destroying Caribbean Basin bill by a 260-142 vote on Dec. 17. (The Senate, however, failed to bring the measure to a vote, so the Caribbean bill did not become law.)

5. Maintaining Federal Employee Health Care Protections

Federal employees have undergone more than their share of misery caused by Reagan budget cuts. Early in his Administration, the President declared that his goal was to cut the federal work force by 75,000 workers. Those federal employees who survive the Reagan reductions, are finding that the Administration is determined to raise premiums and reduce coverage under their health care plans.

Congressional conservatives, taking their cue from the Administration, repeatedly tried to eliminate abortion coverage now available under federal health insurance policies, for which federal workers pay 60 percent of the premium. While the AFL-CIO has taken no position on the issue of abortion, to the federation the key issue is not abortion but whether Congress can disregard the limited collective bargaining rights of federal workers by arbitrarily removing certain health benefits that are now available to workers in the private sector. During the lame-duck session a continuing appropriations bill contained language to eliminate this health care coverage. However, during final debate a labor-backed committee amendment to remove the harmful language was approved 49-48 on Dec. 16.

6. Creating Jobs for the Unemployed II

After Sen. Robert Byrd's (D-W.Va.) package of job-creating programs failed to achieve passage (See Senate Vote 2), Democrats and some Republicans worked to attach a smaller, $1.2-billion public works package to the continuing appropriations bill that Congress needed to pass before adjournment. This modest attempt to create jobs in the face of massive unemployment had bipartisan support. A key vote came on an amendment by Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) to delete the job-creation programs from the resolution. The Domenici amendment failed 46-50 on Dec. 16. (However, with President Reagan threatening to veto the vital continuing appropriations resolution if it included any jobs programs, House and Senate conferees decided to delete the job-creating public works provision from the resolution in order to avert a wasteful shutdown of most government agencies.)

7. Maintaining Davis-Bacon Prevailing Wage Protections

Davis-Bacon prevailing wage provisions of the highway rehabilitation legislation underwent attack in both the House and Senate, as conservatives attempted to remove assurances that workers on federally contracted construction projects will be paid the wages prevailing in their area of the country (See House Vote 4). In the Senate, Don Nickles (R-Okla.) offered an amendment to delete provisions specifying that Davis-Bacon protections would apply to major interstate highway repairs, as well as new construction. At the urging of organized labor, Sen. Robert Stafford (R-Vt.) moved to table, and thereby kill, the Nickles anti-labor amendment. By a 48-46 vote on Dec. 19, the Senate approved the Stafford motion.

8. Creating Jobs—Restoring Highways and Transit

Labor's hopes for passage of major job-creating legislation in the post-election lame-duck session were thwarted by "do nothing" Republicans led by a President committed to "staying the course" instead of putting America back to work. One casualty was a broad-based package of job-creating public works programs approved by the House and Senate only to be dropped in conference after being threatened with a Presidential veto. Even the highway repair bill, which most observers expected to sail through Congress, was delayed by a stubborn right-wing Republican filibuster in the Senate. Eventually the Senate voted to stop the filibuster and passed the AFL-CIO-backed highway measure by a 56-34 vote on Dec. 20. As enacted, the highway bill will create an estimated 320,000 jobs in the repair and maintenance of interstate and other highways and improvements to mass transit systems. It will also help save thousands of lives by rehabilitating some of the most dangerous stretches of our nation's highways.

Job data hide growth of working poor

By Susan Dunlop

The recession is pushing more and more Americans into the ranks of the working poor, including many once considered middle class. The real scope of this problem can't be measured if traditional unemployment or poverty statistics are looked at separately, according to new studies of economic and social hardship.

Robert Taggart and Sar A. Levitan, in a series of studies on labor market problems, contend that the dramatic rise in joblessness over the past two years has focused attention on the plight of the unemployed, and the jobless rate has become a closely watched indicator of "who and how many are the victims of the recession."

Yet millions of people who have low-wage jobs, and thus don't show up in unemployment counts, are unable to support themselves and their families at a level American society considers adequate.

The swelling numbers of the working poor contradict the Reagan Administration's claims that "nine out of ten workers are better off" because of the recession-spurred decline in the inflation rate, Levitan and Taggart stress.

Troubling trio

In 1981, they note, the combination of low wages, periods of unemployment and reduced work hours "led a staggering 34 million of the 120 million Americans in the labor force to earn less than what a minimum wage job would have yielded for the number of work hours for which they were available."

Levitan and Taggart propose that new methods of measuring hardship brought on by labor market problems should be a part of analysis of the nation's economic crisis, and of policy-making to solve those problems.

Levitan is director of the Center for Social Policy Studies at George Washington University, and Taggart is president of the Remediation & Training Institute in Washington, D.C.

Their findings appear in two reports: "Hardship—the Welfare Consequence of Labor Market Problems," by Taggart and "The Bitter Fruits of Labor," written by both.

Hardship, they point out, is a deeply rooted structural problem that calls for long-term solutions combining changes in the labor market with aid programs to ease deprivation.

Politically induced pain

The suffering of the jobless, the working poor and those on the margin of poverty has been made worse by the Reagan Administration's sudden reversal of government social and economic policies and the slashing of aid programs, they note.

Far from "just throwing money at problems," these programs were useful and successful "emergency" treatments for critical situations, Levitan and Taggart say.

They define hardship as a situation "when an individual earns too little by acceptable minimum standards to clothe, feed and shelter himself or herself, plus any dependents, and when no other income compensates for deficient earnings."

The dimensions of hardship can be measured by looking at the numbers of both the unemployed and the employed who have inadequate earnings and income.

Government jobless or poverty data, viewed separately, don't present a full, clear picture of all those who are really suffering, they say.

When unemployment rises and stays high, deprivation increases. Yet monthly jobless figures include many people for whom unemployment will be relatively short, and they count laid-off workers who can fall back on other family income or who are kept above poverty, for a time at least, by unemployment compensation or other income.

People who have inadequate earnings because they are unemployed for several periods over a year are not counted. Levitan and Taggart stress that two to three times as many workers are unemployed at some time during the year as are unemployed in any month, and for every person counted in monthly jobless figures, there is another working part time because a full-time job is not available, or someone who wants but can't find any work.

And measures of poverty, as well as policies to alleviate it, concentrate more on the elderly, the handicapped and those who have family responsibilities that keep them out of the labor force than on the depth of the deprivation endured by the working poor.

Hardship is a structural problem that quick fixes and even a modest recovery won't completely cure, the researchers observe, but they assert that the current recession has made a bad situation "intolerable."

Millions in poverty

Between 1979 and 1981, they note, the number of workers unable to achieve minimum wage annual earnings increased by 6.1 million. The number of households that could not achieve enough combined income to stay above poverty increased by 3.3 million, and the number of workers in poverty went up by 2.5 million.

The studies estimate that by the end of 1982 with the recession in full swing, at least a million additional workers fell below the poverty line.

They point out that even before the onset of the current recession, hardship was already widening compared to 1975, the last time unemployment set post-war record highs. That year the combination of unemployment compensation, social security, welfare and other social programs kept 35 percent of workers who would have been poor without those payments above the poverty line. By contrast, similar aid kept only 28 percent of the "at risk" workers out of poverty in 1981.

Over the threshold

"There is no question," Levitan and Taggart say, "that unemployment insurance, social security, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and other cash transfers improve the well-being of workers and their families. A total of 13.2 million workers would have been poor if they and their families had received no transfers in 1981, but 3.7 million were lifted above the poverty threshold by cash benefits. Adding the estimated value of food stamps, housing benefits and free school lunches to cash income, total government aid saved 4.5 million workers . . . from deprivation."

They dispute the contention of the Reagan Administration and its supporters that although unemployment is high, hardship is not. Jobs programs, minimum wage boosts, work incentive programs and unemployment insurance extensions are not "failed policies of the past" as the Administration has called them, but "sensible, human and absolutely essential emergency treatments for a patient who is going critical," Levitan and Taggart stress.

And, they sugggest, the problem of hardship calls not only for immediate aid for the needy, but also "more basic, longer term measures such as large scale investments for the working poor to encourage work efforts while improving well-being" and "reform of labor market institutions to reverse increasing segmentation."

Jobless rate dip fails to justify claims of economic rebound

in December if the military personnel had been included then.

President Reagan immediately hailed the new unemployment figures as proof that the country was "on the mend." At a White House news conference, he discounted warnings that the drop in the jobless rate may be a statistical quirk and instead called it the start of a trend toward lower unemployment. Meanwhile, the layoff of thousands of workers continued.

The same day Reagan called his news conference, recession-related layoffs were announced by Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Group in Hartford, Conn., Diamond Shamrock Corp. in Dallas, and Bethlehem Steel Corp. at Sparrows Point, Md.

Norwood told the congressional panel only 49 percent of today's jobless workers are covered by any form of unemployment compensation, and that workers are experiencing more difficulty finding jobs. The median duration of unemployment rose to 11.5 weeks in January from 10.1 weeks in December, she said.

Workforce drop-outs

The 579,000 drop last month in the size of the workforce, including the 1,667,000 military personnel, nearly matched the 590,000 decline in the seasonally adjusted unemployment total. BLS did not account for the huge labor force reduction, but the AFL-CIO economists concluded the decline represented "discouraged" workers who simply stopped looking for jobs believing they were not to be found.

The number of discouraged workers, who are not counted as unemployed by the government, is reported on a quarterly basis. There were 1,849,000 such workers at the end of December, BLS said.

The January data showed a 1.4 million increase in the number of Americans forced to work part time because full-time employment was not available. Like the discouraged workers, these are not factored in when determining the nation's unemployment rate. Federation economists said that when the discouraged workers and one-half the 6.8 million part-time workers are added to the 11,446,000 officially unemployed, the true measure of unemployment would be a jobless rate of 15 percent.

Civilian employment, at 99.1 million in January, held steady for the third month in a row, seasonally adjusted, BLS said. Since the start of the Reagan Recession in July 1981, civilian employment has dropped by 1.6 million, with adult men and teenagers accounting for the decline.

Public employment down

Among industry groupings, employment in construction and retail trade benefitted most in January. Government employment declined, largely at the state and local levels.

Manufacturing employment, which has borne much of the brunt of the recession, however, "leveled off in January and small job increases occurred in many of the individual manufacturing industries" BLS said. A big loser, though, was machinery which dropped about 20,000 workers.

The average number of hours worked per week rose four-tenths of an hour in January to 35.2, seasonally adjusted, while the factory workweek rose from 38.9 to 39.7 hours, "the first real improvement in this leading indicator since early 1981," Norwood told Congress.

Among major worker categories, the jobless rate for adult men fell from 10.1 percent in December to 9.6 percent last month. The jobless rate for adult women dropped two-tenths of 1 percent to 9 percent, while the rate for teenagers fell 1.8 percent to 22.7 percent.

Unemployment among whites declined six-tenths of 1 percent in January to 9.1 percent, but the jobless rate was unchanged for blacks at 20.8 percent and up two-tenths of 1 percent at 15.5 percent for Hispanics.

Looking good

The barbers and cosmetologists division of Food & Commercial Workers Local 400 sponsored an all-day event called Looking Good 83 to help raise funds for the Children's Hospital National Medical Center. Held at the new Washington Convention Center, the event featured the skills of some 100 local members in competition for three awards, along with guest appearances by members of the Super Bowl champion Washington Redskins.

Federal unions see dangers in social security conversion

The NCSC strongly opposes as a benefit cut any change in the existing social security retirement age and the formula for early retirement, Clayman said. Such a move was not part of the consensus recommendations, but was advocated by Republican-appointed commission members.

- Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers, testifying on behalf of the Community Council of Greater New York, suggested the possibility of compensating retirees for the postponement of their cost-of-living adjustment after economic conditions improve and the system is in better financial shape.

He also proposed that the taxation of social security benefits for persons with other income exceeding $20,000 for an individual or $25,000 a couple include an indexing provision that would raise the trigger level for taxation to offset inflation.

Sheinkman endorsed the basic compromise proposals, and stressed that "economic growth, not benefit cutbacks," is needed to ensure the stability of social security.

Hospital health hazards

Hospital workers are putting their own health on the line to keep hospitals operating, a booklet issued by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. warns. The booklet, titled "Hospital Workers: Who Cares About Your Health on the Job?" explains how laundry workers are exposed to viral infections, tuberculosis and hepatitis and how nurses and pharmacy workers can be harmed by the medications they prepare and administer. Other hazards are radiation, anesthetic gases, burns, puncture wounds and job stress. The booklet encourages hospital employees to work through their unions to get health and safety protections written into their contracts because they lack full federal safety law coverage.

Reagan asks tax on health benefits, higher hospital costs for elderly

The Reagan Administration is forging ahead with its budget to check health care inflation at the expense of those least able to pay.

The Administration wants to tax workers for health insurance benefits and increase co-payments for Medicare beneficiaries. Both proposals have been sharply criticized by organized labor and senior citizens.

Under the Administration's proposal, any health insurance benefits paid by employers over $175 a month for a family plan and $70 a month for an individual plan would be subject to federal income tax. Currently, employer-paid fringe benefits are not considered part of income and are not taxed.

Shopping around

The Administration's rationale is that any health insurance benefits over these amounts provide "excessive" health insurance coverage which contributes to health care cost inflation because consumers have no incentive to hold down costs. If workers have to pay some of the costs, it theorizes, either through taxation or out-of-pocket expenses under more limited insurance coverage, then they will be encouraged to shop around for lower cost services or use fewer health services.

The Administration estimates the proposal would mean added taxes for about 30 percent of the 160 million people who receive health insurance through their employers. The proposal would bring an estimated $2.3 billion in additional federal revenue in fiscal 1984.

There is little support for the plan outside the Administration.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman branded the proposal a "travesty." He said it is a "myth" that Americans are not cost-conscious about health care.

Appearing on public television's MacNeil-Lehrer Report, Seidman said the proposal would place an unfair tax burden on workers or would increase out-of-pocket expenses and reduce access to health services by forcing them to choose less expensive and more limited health insurance plans.

It would particularly affect older and handicapped workers as well as workers in areas with higher health care premiums, such as New England and the West, Seidman said, or any workers with high health care costs.

He charged that the plan includes no genuine actions to control health care costs. In fact, he said, it would do just the opposite by discouraging the preventive care that keeps people out of hospitals, the most expensive part of health care. It also would discourage workers from joining pre-paid comprehensive health care plans which focus on preventive medicine, Seidman warned.

Reagan's Medicare scheme, based on a similar theory, provoked equally harsh criticism. The proposal, estimated to save the federal government $1.7 billion in fiscal 1984, would require Medicare patients to pay more for the first 60 days of hospital stays, for visits to doctors, for doctors' services in the hospital and for Medicare Part B premiums which cover doctors' services.

Front-loaded costs

Under the hospitalization part of the Administration's plan, Medicare patients would pay the initial $350 estimated for 1984 for the first day in the hospital, about $28 a day for the second to the 15th day and about $17.50 a day for the 16th through 60th day. Only after that, the government would pay all hospitalization costs.

Medicare patients currently must pay the initial $350, nothing for the next 60 days, an estimated $82.50 a day for the 61st to 90th day, $175 a day from the 91st to the 150th day and the full cost of $350 a day or more after that.

The Administration claims proposed changes in payment will give Medicare patients an incentive to keep hospital stays short while protecting the severely ill from catastrophic costs.

Jacob Clayman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, said the Reagan scheme would cause hardships for millions of Medicare beneficiaries.

Since the average hospital stay for the elderly is only 11 days, Clayman said, the Administration's catastrophic coverage plan "seems to be only a smokescreen for its real aim—to pass along more and more of the burden of rising health care costs to the Medicare beneficiary."

"Millions of poor elderly simply cannot afford what the President is asking," Clayman said. He pointed out the average monthly social security benefit is only $375 and the elderly would have to pay over $600 for an average 11-day hospital stay under the proposed changes.

Indefensible proposal

In a joint statement, Wilbur J. Cohen, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare in the Johnson Administration, and Arthur S. Flemming, HEW Secretary in the Eisenhower Administration, called the proposed Medicare payment hikes "indefensible and unfair."

Instead of imposing cost-containment restraints on the medical industry to check health care inflation, they said, the Administration "seeks for the third year in a row to dip into the pockets of beneficiaries," calling on them to pay a higher percentage of their income for health care than before Medicare became law.

Cohen and Flemming said the theory behind Reagan's Medicare plan is "nonsense," adding, "It proceeds from the tired old myth that patients determine how long they will be hospitalized. In fact, this decision is made exclusively by doctors and hospitals, who often have a vested interest in keeping beds full and the money rolling in."

They said they agree that the catastrophic protection in the plan is necessary for many people, "but it should not be added to the law at the expense of the vast majority of Medicare beneficiaries."

Other health and health-related proposals included in Reagan's budget would reduce federal payments to states for Medicare and allow states to make Medicaid recipients pay a small part of hospital and doctor visit costs. The budget proposals also would fold migrant health, family planning and black lung clinics into primary care block grants to the states and freeze block grant spending at 1983 levels; eliminate public health tuberculosis, fluoridation and health planning programs; and reduce funding for immunization programs, the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Course offered on plant shutdowns

A short course on the role of unions in plant closings has been added to the spring calendar of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. It will be held Apr. 5-7 at the Silver Spring, Md., campus.

The program will examine such topics as the human hurt of plant closings; what a union can do to help affected workers; status of union bargaining rights when a plant closes; federal aid to workers, corporations and communities threatened with plant shutdowns.

Instructors will be trade unionists and other specialists who have lived and worked through plant closings. More information about the course is available from David G. Alexander, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Trans World pay gains won by Machinists

The Machinists approved a new agreement providing wage and fringe benefit increases for some 10,000 mechanics and related workers at Trans World Airlines, while union negotiators faced uphill bargaining elsewhere in the airline industry.

- In San Francisco, IAM lawyers sought a court injunction to end a lockout of 230 union members employed by Qantas Airlines, an Australian carrier.
- In Dallas, bargainers for the Transport Workers and American Airlines agreed to a news blackout as talks went on in the face of a Feb. 12 strike deadline.
- In Denver, the IAM, Air Line Pilots and Flight Attendants announced they would not consider any concessionary terms with Frontier Airlines prior to the start of regular contract talks.

The new three-year contract for 10,000 Trans World Airline employees was ratified by a margin of nearly 9-1, the Machinists reported.

Under the agreement, workers will receive a 10.1 percent increase in wages retroactive to Nov. 1, 3.7 percent next Sept. 1, and 4.5 percent on June 1, 1984.

Strike deadline

Talks between the Transport Workers and American Airlines are continuing in Dallas in face of a Feb. 12 strike deadline. Some 12,000 mechanics and other ground employees represented by the TWU are affected by the negotiations.

The old contract with American came up for renewal last Aug. 1. Under the Railway Labor Act, the National Mediation Board entered the discussions and mediated the talks for four months before releasing the parties, thereby starting a 30-day cooling-off period.

Airline unions are prohibited from striking under the Railway Labor Act until they are released by the mediation board and the cooling-off period is completed. TWU, which has authorized a strike, already has turned down a request by American to accept a 5 percent pay reduction.

The Qantas lockout began Feb. 6, the date on which both the company and the Machinists were legally free to adopt economic sanctions. While IAM wanted to continue bargaining, the airline resorted to locking out the union mechanics and other employees. IAM's contract with Qantas expired a year ago.

Senate enlarges Labor Committee to settle dispute

The Senate enlarged its Labor & Human Resources Committee to resolve a Republican squabble. The old lineup was nine Republicans and seven Democrats. It has now been changed to 10 Republicans and eight Democrats.

The controversy stemmed from second thoughts by Republicans Paula Hawkins (Fla.) and John P. East (N.C.), who last December chose to move to other committees. They were then replaced on the Labor & Human Resources Committee by Republicans Charles E. Grassley (Iowa) and Alfonse D'Amato (N.Y.).

After the new Congress convened, Hawkins and East sought to get back on the Labor & Human Resources Committee. But D'Amato didn't want to leave.

After some weeks of behind-the-scenes jockeying, Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) got an agreement that D'Amato would replace Hawkins as a member of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress and Hawkins would get back on the Labor & Human Resources panel. The Senate then approved the addition of a Republican seat, which went to East, and an added a Democratic seat, which has been filled by the appointment of Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.)

Holes in the Wage Floor

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S sometimes startling off-the-cuff remarks have been keeping the White House press office busy putting out explanations that the President really didn't mean what he clearly said.

That hasn't yet been the fate of the President's comment that the only reason the Administration isn't pressing for complete elimination of the minimum wage is that Congress would balk at such a drastic step backwards.

But "that would be the right thing to do," the President insisted after recalling with nostalgia a summer construction job for which he got paid in cash without such burdensome nonsense as a minimum wage law. Anyway, as the next best thing, the Administration is seeking to lower the federal wage floor for persons under 22 to $2.50 an hour between May 1 and Sept. 30.

"Half a loaf is better than none," the President said. But, he added, "I am very stubborn. I come back and ask for more the next time around."

So let Congress be on notice. At least unless the White House again contradicts the President, a summer subminimum youth wage is the first step toward outright repeal.

The Working Poor

THIS ISSUE of the AFL-CIO News carries an account of the impressive studies by Robert Taggart and Sar A. Levitan on economic hardship in America—among those who are counted as employed as well as among the jobless.

Even in more prosperous times, there are a lot of working people who over the course of a year make less than the minimum wage for the hours they worked or were available for work. Either they were employed part-time because full-time jobs weren't available or they were in jobs where layoffs were frequent or work was seasonal.

In 1981, when the recession was just getting under way, there were more than 34 million such Americans.

Today, their numbers have surely grown, and the reduced buying power of the minimum wage has pushed many with year-round, full-time jobs below the poverty level.

In a more humane time, our society erected safety nets for our working poor such as food stamps, housing assistance and health services.

These are the programs that this Administration has been cutting—at the same time that it insists on "staying the course" of huge tax windfalls for the wealthy.

False Economy

A BYPRODUCT of the cuts made in our society's safety net has been a return to the concept that only those totally destitute should receive help from their government in times of temporary hardship.

Many union members have experienced cycles of unemployment and hard times, have had to scrimp to manage on reduced incomes, but with the help of various public assistance programs have pulled through until times got better.

Is it really economy, as the Administration seems to believe, to compel families to sell off every asset and to sink perhaps irreversibly into poverty before being eligible for help?

If the value of a car exceeds $1,500, is it really necessary to insist that it be sold before a family is eligible for assistance? When a jobless family can't afford private health insurance, what level of poverty must be demonstrated to qualify for Medicaid?

A sensible editorial in the Feb. 6 issue of the Washington Post pondered these questions and urged as a start the suspension of the harsh new rules that are keeping many of the "new poor" from getting basic welfare, food stamps and medicaid benefits.

"It makes no sense," the editorial concluded, "to require an unemployed father to abandon his family or to sell his car in order to get basic help for that family. Beggaring families is not exactly the way to get them back on their feet."

Want ads offer little hope to long-term unemployed

By Press Associates, Inc.

President Reagan was asked in an interview with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch how far he would be willing to go on job-creation programs. He replied that it was far more important to stress training, as his budget did, because newspaper want ads show that jobs are available.

Meanwhile, a malaise appears to be gripping the nation.

A recent New York Times/CBS survey reported that unemployment had reached into a third of all American households in the past year. The unemployment contributed to family stress and conflict, forced down living standards, and spread pessimism about the future of the nation.

This is how the survey results broke down: Of the 36 percent of households in which an adult had been unemployed, 63 percent bought lower quality food; 53 percent fell back on savings; 50 percent cut medical or dental care; 33 percent borrowed money; 32 percent missed payments on homes, cars, apartments or loans, and 18 percent accepted food stamps or welfare.

The survey said that 47 percent of households with unemployment reported more family arguments. Family conflict was reported mostly where unemployment lasted more than three months.

Long-lasting effect

Harvey Brenner, a sociology professor at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, told the Times that the relationship of family conflict and long-term unemployment is of critical importance because many jobs may be permanently lost in the current recession.

Brenner, who has carried out extensive research on the social consequences of high-level unemployment, said the family conflict probably was understated in the survey because the issue is personal and embarrassing.

He said the survey could not be expected to measure the "extreme violence and aggressive behavior" that has caused more homicides and suicides.

The Times also quoted Harvard University government professor Sidney Verba as saying the family conflict level showed that unemployment was having "a kind of generalized depressing effect on the quality of all our lives." The survey showed that only 26 percent of those from households with unemployment believed the country was going in the right direction.

Out of work longer

The latest data from the Labor Dept. would seem to indicate the problems might be worsening rather than improving. The department, in its report on the job picture for January, said the duration of unemployment had lengthened to a median duration of 11.5 weeks. This means about half of the 12 million jobless would fall into the Times's survey category where more family conflict is occurring. Nearly 600,000 dropped out of the labor force in January, pushing the "discouraged" total to some 2 million—and these people are not counted in the official total because they have stopped looking for jobs.

The President's budget revealed his priorities. There are no jobs in it, only dubious gimmicks like subminimum wages and tax credits for employers. Despite Reagan's claim of "fairness," the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities documented cuts of 19 percent in federal programs for the poor—food stamps, child nutrition, aid to families with dependent children, and low-income energy aid.

If there is going to be any leadership in pulling the nation out of its despair and putting people back to work, it is going to have to come from Congress.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Reagan Freeze Rejected; AFL-CIO Urges Emergency Aid Program

In submitting his third annual federal budget to Congress, President Reagan spoke of "bipartisanship" and "compromise." But the new Reagan proposal is like the old Reagan proposals: rewards for the wealthy and privileged, and "do-nothing," "wait and see" promises for the victims of recession.

The AFL-CIO has been on Capitol Hill every day since Congress got down to work on Jan. 31, urging that action be taken now to bring economic recovery and safeguard the jobless until recovery arrives.

President Kirkland told the House Budget Committee on Feb. 8 that the Reagan budget is intolerable. He detailed programs to create jobs in housing, public works, and community development, as well as tax reforms to pay for these programs. These include a $700 "cap" on this July's tax cut, which would maintain full tax cuts for those with incomes less that $45,000.

While President Kirkland was before the Budget Committee, other federation officials were before the Ways and Means Committee urging that unemployment compensation be extended on a permanent basis instead of the current temporary extenstions.

The AFL-CIO also was before the House Commerce Committee, warning that high joblessness takes a toll on the health of American families; nearly 60 percent of those laid off lose their health insurance immediately or within a month of termination. The federation outlined several ways to solve this problem.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to reject the Reagan "do-nothing" approach to recession. Ask them to enact AFL-CIO alternatives, including public works, community development and housing job-creation programs, extended unemployment compensation, health care for the jobless, and closing of tax loopholes to pay for these programs.

REAGAN PROPOSALS

- More cuts in government programs
- 10.7 percent unemployment in 1983, 9.9 percent unemployment in 1984. $8.1 billion cut in unemployment compensation
- "Freeze" on federal workers' pay and retirement, plus new Social Security taxes
- NO job-creation programs
- More unemployment for adults as employers hire teenagers at a $2.50 per hour subminimum wage

AFL-CIO PROPOSALS

- An end to unfair budget cuts
- Community development jobs for the unemployed: child care, school security, health screening
- Public works jobs: roads, bridges, water systems, transit and port facilities
- Construction jobs through restoration of housing programs
- Health care coverage for the jobless
- Emergency food and shelter programs
- Repeal of tax loopholes for the wealthy

You Tell Us, and We'll Tell Congress: Are Imports Stealing Your Jobs?

Many members of Congress are becoming convinced that they must do something soon to stop the damage to our economy caused by unrestrained imports. But Congress isn't sure what to do about trade. You can help by completing the survey, right. Tell us how imports are affecting your community, and we'll use the results in our testimony and lobbying efforts.

The anecdotes below illustrate the harm that imports can do to our economy.

'ATARI DEMOCRATS' TAKE NOTE: ATARI IS MOVING OVERSEAS

Several members of Congress are called "Atari Democrats" because they claim that young "high-tech" industries such as computers will lead the United States to long-lasting economic recovery.

Unfortunately, Atari recently announced that it is shifting production to Hong King and Taiwan. Mattel Electronics already makes all its computers in the Orient, while Magnavox (Odyssey) prefers Mexico.

HITACHI STEALS IBM SECRETS, THEN SELLS COMPUTERS TO U.S.

Last June, the U.S. Justice Department indicted officials of Hitachi, the Japanese electronics firm, for conspiring to buy trade secrets that had been stolen from IBM. The companies are engaged in a tough battle to produce the most advanced new computers.

Hitachi, after initially denying any wrongdoing, recently pleaded guilty and paid a $10,000 fine (the company's sales are more than $13 billion annually).

Incredibly, the U.S. Social Security Administration in December awarded a $7 million contract for two new Hitachi computers to replace current IBM models. So the government is slapping the wrists of Hitachi but rewarding its wrongdoing with a fat contract.

WE'RE AMERICAN AIRLINES, DOING WHAT WE DO BEST. IN BARBADOS.

American Airlines recently announced that it is moving about 200 data-entry jobs at its computer center in Tulsa to Barbados, West Indies.

An airline official noted that the company expects to pay the Barbados workers less than what the Tulsa employees were earning.

They want jobs

Those are job applications, not handouts, that outstretched hands are seeking. A state employment office in Kansas City was jammed with 3,000 recession victims when it began taking applications for 250 new jobs at a local hotel.

Unions fight move to scrap assistance for import victims

By David L. Perlman

America's unions pressed Congress to salvage the trade adjustment assistance program and reaffirm a national commitment of special help for workers whose jobs are wiped out by imports.

Trade adjustment assistance was cut back drastically during the first two years of the Reagan Administration. Cash benefit entitlements were first reduced, then virtually eliminated. Retraining was advocated as a goal but left unfunded in the fiscal 1984 budget. The remnants of the program would be junked entirely if Congress goes along with the President's budget proposal.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan and other labor witnesses urged a House Ways & Means subcommittee not to allow that to happen.

The assistance program "is needed now more than ever," the AFL-CIO testified.

Commitments made to workers as part of the trade legislation that cost them their jobs "must be honored," the AFL-CIO insisted.

The breach of faith represented by the Administration attempt to scuttle the program was stressed also in testimony by Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan and by Auto Workers Attorney Leonard R. Page, who noted that imports of manufactured goods are at record levels even as unemployment climbed to new highs.

Compact with workers

Sheehan described trade adjustment aid as a binding "compact" that the government had made in full awareness that a tilt to "free-trade" policies would hurt trade-sensitive industries and their workers.

The chairman of the trade subcommittee, Rep. Sam Gibbons (D-Fla.), announced at the hearing that he will join Rep. Donald Pease (D-Ohio) in cosponsoring the bill, an endorsement seen as virtually assuring favorable committee action.

The legislation they have introduced would make job training for displaced workers an entitlement and would also provide a modest subsistence allowance of $15 a day for persons enrolled in training programs who were not receiving any other unemployment compensation.

Before the Administration's earlier cutbacks, workers eligible for trade adjustment assistance received TAA benefits of 70 percent of lost pay up to a ceiling equal to the national average manufacturing wage, for up to 52 weeks with an additional 26 weeks allowed to complete training programs.

The higher payments were scrapped in 1981 and the new ceiling was the regular state unemployment benefit.

The proposed legislation would also rectify a "suitable work" definition of present law so that workers eligible for trade adjustment retraining couldn't be forced to take jobs at the minimum wage at the end of 26 weeks of unemployment compensation.

The new test would be work at "substantially" the skill level of past employment at not less than 80 percent of previous weekly wages.

Unemployment climbs in 47 states over year

Unemployment last year increased in all but three states, with West Virginia experiencing the sharpest rise, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

As the Reagan Recession relentlessly took its toll, national unemployment for all civilian workers jumped 2.2 percentage points in 1982, from 8.3 to 10.5 percent prior to seasonal adjustment.

West Virginia's jobless rate during the year rose 7.8 percent to 17.8 percent. Three other states—Alabama, Arizona, and Nevada—all with double-digit jobless rates, also experienced increases of 4 percentage points or more.

Metropolitan area unemployment rates equaled or exceeded the 10.5 percent national rate in 88 of the 211 localities for which December 1982 data were available, BLS said. Johnstown, Pa., had the highest rate—22.7 percent, compared with 14.7 percent a year earlier.

All but three

The only states to escape the upsurge in unemployment in 1982 were Delaware, whose rate dropped from 7.7 percent in 1981 to 7.4 percent last December; Maryland, where joblessness declined from 8 to 7.9 percent, and Alaska, whose rate remained at 10 percent.

The government attributed the huge rise in joblessness in West Virginia to reductions in the state's mining and manufacturing industries. Michigan's 17.3 percent jobless rate was the second highest in the nation, followed by Alabama at 15.9 percent, both the result of layoffs in manufacturing.

Nineteen states had unemployment rates at or above the 10.5 percent unadjusted national rate in December 1982, BLS said. Other states where jobless rates were high were Illinois, 12.6 percent; Indiana, 12.9 percent; Nevada, 12.2 percent; Ohio, 14.1 percent; Pennsylvania, 12.5 percent; Tennessee, 13.3 percent; Washington, 12.5 percent, and Wisconsin, 12.2 percent.

Hawaii recorded the lowest national unemployment rate, at 6.3 percent last December, up a full percentage point from the year-earlier level. South Dakota had a 6.6 percent rate, up from 5.4 percent a year earlier. Oklahoma and Vermont both had 6.8 percent jobless rates last December, with Oklahoma's jumping sharply from 3.8 percent a year earlier and Vermont's climbing one full point from 5.8 percent in December 1981.

Employment, as measured by BLS's monthly survey of nonfarm establishments, fell in 48 states and the District of Columbia between December 1981 and December 1982. Every state experienced decreases in manufacturing employment. Two-thirds or more of the states also re-

Bankruptcies prove persistent as economic ills

An upturn in business bankruptcies, including the failure of the largest bank in eastern Tennessee, widespread joblessness and an increase in claims for unemployment benefits underscored the severity of the nation's economic troubles.

The latest quarterly survey of consumer attitudes conducted by the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research reflected slight improvement due to lower prices and interest rates but no widespread optimism over the long term.

"Income declines and the expected persistence of the double-digit unemployment levels left consumers' evaluations of their current financial situation and of business conditions at very low levels," the survey report observed.

A glimmer of hope showed up in the government's report on January factory production, up nine-tenths of 1 percent from the December level, and in January's 1 percent decline in wholesale prices. And housing starts in January climbed 35 per-

For bipartisan action

First-step jobs bill gains support

A policy switch by President Reagan has opened the way to bipartisan enactment of a first-phase jobs bill but a much larger package of anti-recession measures will be needed to fuel the nation's economic recovery.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison welcomed the prospect that quick-moving assistance to the jobless and the needy can be enacted by early spring. But even if Democratic "add-ons" boost the $4.3 billion package agreed to by the White House up to the $5 billion mark, it will remain "far too little," Denison said.

House Democratic leaders voted to back the $4.3 billion emergency jobs bill, to be funded largely through a supplemental appropriation covering the current fiscal year, which runs through Sept. 30. But they will seek to add about $1 billion to the measure, including funds for a nutrition program for pregnant women and small children, low-income energy assistance and an expanded summer jobs program for youth.

Program step-up

The agreed-on Administration package includes stepped-up federal construction work, such as repairs to veterans hospitals and other government buildings, along with funds for emergency food programs and day care services.

Its job component carries a $4 billion price tag and $300 million would be earmarked for humanitarian aid to the needy.

By contrast, Denison noted, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's proposals to the House Budget Committee earlier this month sought $22.5 billion in supplemental appropriations for this fiscal year and an additional $46 billion for fiscal 1984.

The Administration has not offered any concessions to date on its budget proposals for fiscal 1984, or on Democratic proposals to put a ceiling on this year's scheduled tax increase and to repeal a revenue-losing indexing provision for the future.

Also cleared for bipartisan approval is an Administration proposal for a $2.9 billion appropriation to continue the federal supplemental unemployment insurance program through the balance of the fiscal year. Otherwise it would be shut down on Mar. 31. And there is no controversy about a $5 billion supplement to enable states whose unemployment insurance reported job losses in mining, construction, transportation, public utilities, and trade, while half of the states posted reductions in government employment.

Fighting back

Strategy by a coalition of 48 federal employee groups to fight Reagan Administration slashes in pay and benefits is mapped out by union presidents, from left, Moe Biller of the Postal Workers, Kenneth Blaylock of the Government Employees and Vincent Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers.

The largest overall employment decrease over the year occurred in Pennsylvania, 267,000. Four other states—California, Ohio, Michigan, and Illinois—experienced job losses exceeding 100,000. The primary factor in these states, BLS said, was a loss of employment in manufacturing industries.

The two states reporting increases in employment during 1982 were Alaska and Florida. Alaska's gains were in trade, services and government. In Florida, losses in construction and manufacturing were offset by increases in trade and services.

Employment fell by 4 percent or more over the year in eight states—Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Wyoming. Only one state, Alaska, had an increase of this magnitude.

Stamford, Conn., again had the lowest rate, at 4 percent, followed by Raleigh-Durham, N.C., at 4.3 percent.

Besides Johnstown, Pa., other industrial cities hard hit by the recession were Flint, Mich., where unemployment rose over 1982 from 16.8 to 22 percent; Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, up from 16 to 21.1 percent over the year, and Duluth-Superior, Minn., where 20.9 percent unemployment in December 1982 was more than double the year-earlier level of 10.1 percent.

CWA protests AT&T move to alter negotiated pensions

The Communications Workers filed an objection to the AT&T reorganization plan with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, accusing the company of seeking unilateral changes in current employee benefits.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts charged that AT&T "is attempting to use the reorganization to modify the pension and other benefits that are in present contracts as the result of collective bargaining."

AT&T had filed its reorganization plan with the court in December after Judge Harold Greene ordered it to divest itself of its 22 operating companies following an antitrust suit brought against it by the Justice Dept.

The union also objected that AT&T's final plan violates both federal labor policy and the intent of the court and the Justice Dept. that nothing in the consent decree preclude or interfere with bargaining or employee protections.

Splintering provision

"Our primary objection to the AT&T proposal," said Watts, "is the provision to splinter the Bell System Pension Plan (BSPP) into eight separate plans and to cancel interchange agreements covering pensions. One of the most significant features of the BSPP is the ability of our members to carry with them pension credits between AT&T and its Bell operating companies."

The proposal would end the CWA-AT&T negotiated agreements and could possibly reduce benefits for members, since the eight resulting plans would not necessarily be uniform.

Watts added, "We are asking that the court delete the AT&T proposal on pensions and that the company negotiate with us on that and other changes in labor related matters."

Judge Greene will give AT&T a chance to respond to objections filed with the court and then allow a rebuttal period before issuing a final modified ruling sometime in the spring, Duayne Trecker of the CWA said.

48-group coalition

Federal, postal unions battle Reagan slashes

By Susan Dunlop

A broad-based coalition of organizations representing federal and postal workers and retirees, outraged by Reagan Administration budget proposals that would cut their pay and benefits, has launched an "all-out" lobbying effort to urge Congress to reject the Reagan moves.

AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. President Kenneth Blaylock said at a news conference following a "summit meeting" of the employee groups that the 48-member coalition agrees "we cannot, will not stand by idly and watch Ronald Reagan—and his congressional allies—destroy the income, careers and 'golden years' of the people we represent."

Blaylock, who is president of the Government Employees, termed Reagan Administration plans to freeze federal pay, gut retirement protections and reduce federal support of senior citizen programs "an unconscionable attack on the well-being of millions of our members and their families."

Resignations of protest

In a separate development, Blaylock, PED Executive Director John Leyden and other officers of federal employee organizations resigned in protest from the Federal Employees Advisory Pay Council following a meeting with Reagan Administration officials to discuss the proposed pay freeze.

The newly formed coalition includes a number of AFL-CIO unions who represent federal and postal workers and other public employees as well as unaffiliated unions, senior citizens organizations, and associations of federal professional and management employees.

Blaylock said the coalition is the largest ever formed to deal with federal employee issues. He told reporters the group's activities will be in addition to other efforts launched by federal employee groups to oppose mandatory inclusion in the social security system of all new federal employees.

Proposed strategy

The coalition released an outline of its lobbying strategy to persuade Congress to reject the Administration's programs. Plans include:

- A massive lobbying effort on Capitol Hill in February and March, targeting members of Congress whose constituents are most affected.
- Informational picket lines at congressional home district offices when Congress is in recess.
- A freeze on all political action fund contributions until after Congress completes its action on the Reagan proposals.
- A telephone and mail campaign to members of Congress.
- Information centers in each federal agency to urge workers to participate in the action.
- Leafleting at Washington, D.C. subway stations, federal buildings and other public places.
- Symbolic action such as wearing of black armbands at work.
- Newspaper advertising campaigns.

Futile exercise

Blaylock said he, Leyden, AFGE Vice President John Sturdivant, National Treasury Employees Union President Vincent J. Connery and National Federation of Federal Employees President James Pierce resigned from the federal pay council because participation was becoming "an exercise in futility."

The council was created by Congress in 1970 to find ways to bring federal wages in line with those for comparable jobs in the private sector. A recent Bureau of Labor Statistics survey showed wages in the private sector were 18.4 percent higher overall than federal pay for similar work.

Management members of the panel are Office of Personnel Management Director Donald Devine, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan and Office of Management & Budget Director David Stockman.

Blaylock pointed out that one of the new coalition's objectives is to fight the freeze on federal wages this year and to press the Reagan Administration to live up to the law requiring pay comparability.

He said the campaign will also oppose Administration moves to increase the retirement age for federal workers, to downgrade and reclassify some 14 percent of the federal and postal workforce and to eliminate in-grade pay increases for workers.

Other goals

The group will also fight proposals to slash and delay cost-of-living increases for retirees, to raise federal and postal employees' contributions to their pension plan from 7 to 11 percent, to change the formula for calculating retirement benefits from the highest three-year average salary to the average highest five years, and to require that new federal employees be covered by the social security system.

Among the AFL-CIO unions participating in the coalition in addition to AFGE are the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers, Boilermakers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Laborers' Mail Handlers Division, Professional & Technical Engineers, Teachers, the State, County & Municipal Employees, Plate Printers, Service Employees, Union of Police Associations, National Maritime Union, Graphic Arts International Union, Masters, Mates & Pilots, Marine Engineers Weather Service Employees, and the Metropolitan Washington Metal Trades Council.

Congress prodded on jobs mandate

The AFL-CIO renewed its summons to Congress to carry out the federal government's responsibility to provide jobs for America's unemployed when the private sector falters.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald protested to the congressional Joint Economic Committee of this mandate of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act, which has been largely ignored since Congress adopted it in 1978.

Oswald cited the Reagan Administration's own economic forecast, keyed to the President's "hands-off approach," which points to unemployment still higher than 8 percent until 1987 and staying above 1979's level throughout the decade.

Move jobs

That isn't good enough, Oswald insisted. It is clearly in the national interest "to put Americans who are able and willing to work into productive jobs which generate taxes, produce useful community services and community facilities, and stimulate the economy in communities with high unemployment," he testified.

Oswald outlined the mix of job programs the AFL-CIO has urged including federally financed community development programs that would enable cities to hire additional workers for jobs that need doing, an accelerated public works program, housing assistance and a start toward reindustrialization.

Impact on deficit

While the Administration claims such a large-scaled program would be too costly, Oswald noted that if such an effort had been put into effect last year, unemployment would have been significantly reduced and the long-term budget deficit substantially trimmed. "Each 1 percent of unemployment costs the federal treasury $30 billion," he reminded the panel.

He warned that "if the priorities of the Reagan Administration prevail," this year will bring "still more lost output, more lost income, and more loss of the sense of fairness and social justice that holds our nation together."

Apart from the savings resulting from reduced unemployment, anti-recession programs can be funded through tax reforms that include putting a $700 ceiling on the final step of the tax cut scheduled for this July and repeal of the tax bracket indexing plan scheduled to take effect in 1985. Additional billions could be recovered by revoking some of the tax giveaways to corporations enacted in 1981, Oswald testified.

Employer of last resort

"When the private sector cannot provide enough jobs, the federal government must step in," Oswald insisted.

When unemployment rises 1 percent, another 1.1 million Americans are left jobless. "Americans cannot tolerate the cruelly high unemployment rate projected by the Reagan Administration," he said.

Jobs, COL protection major union concerns in copper bargaining

By Arlee C. Green

Job and income security top a 12-page list of bargaining objectives set by the National Nonferrous Coordinated Bargaining Conference for this year's round of negotiations on 174 contracts covering about 50,000 workers in the copper, lead, zinc and other metals industries.

The proposals represent a general policy statement of the 21 unions involved in the coordinated bargaining.

Among other things, the 750 delegates to the four-day conference in Phoenix called for maintaining cost-of-living provisions, ending moves to combine jobs or contract-out work, and providing increased pension, insurance and unemployment benefits.

Copper crunch

The copper industry, the largest nonferrous metal segment, is in severe economic straits, and the unions in the coalition have taken this into account, Cass Alvin of the Steelworkers stressed. Alvin, who serves as a coordinator for the unions, pointed out that nearly half of the workers in the highly organized copper industry currently are unemployed.

The proposals of the nonferrous conference contain these key elements:

- Retention of the provisions for cost-of-living wage adjustments, which have been in the copper industry contracts for a decade. Equal pay for equal work throughout the industry and improvements in premium pay. Establishment of apprenticeship programs.
- Protection from erosions caused by the combining of jobs, reassignment of job skills, disregard for craft practices, and contracting out of work within the scope of the bargaining unit.
- Job security. Moratorium on plant closures and adequate advance notice of shutdowns with development of alternatives. Broadened seniority opportunities in the event of layoffs and more meaningful interplant transfers. Restriction on the use of overtime when members of a department are on layoff.
- Income security. Removal of any caps on pension benefits, and union oversight of pension fund investments. Improved health care, life insurance and sickness and accident benefits. Continuation of insurance coverage during layoff, work stoppage, plant closure and disability. Improved funding, eligibility and benefits from the supplemental unemployment benefits program.
- Improvements in other benefit programs, such as longer vacations, more holidays and personal time off, "remain an imperative."

Seeking solutions

The conference delegates considered the market conditions and new technology to be problems for which unions and management must seek solutions.

The proposals pointed to the need for restrictions on foremen doing bargaining unit work, for appropriate health and safety provisions, for the right to refuse unsafe work and for proper labeling of chemicals that are hazardous.

Conference Chairman Frank S. McKee, USWA treasurer, and Machinists President William W. Winpisinger, both urged the unions to resist attempts by management to win bargaining concessions in the form of "givebacks" that would wipe out existing benefits.

The bargaining history of the coalition and the industry has been marked by a strike every three years with the longest—8½ months—occurring in 1967.

McKee, warned the industry against a "power play" this year and said he could not rule out another strike. He blamed the current problems in the copper industry on the economic policies of the Reagan Administration, on competition from the Third World nations, and on foreign investments by the multinational copper producing conglomerates.

No trickling

Winpisinger called Reagan's economic policy a "recipe for disaster," and urged the delegates to join in giving a message to Reagan and the Republicans: "Don't trickle down on me."

Alvin said the general policy statement has a "moderate tone," but he stressed that "these people are tough. They don't want to give anything back and most certainly not cost of living."

In the past, he said, the companies have bargained themselves into a strike, using that time for a reduction in their stockpiles and for rebuilding of smelters and other maintenance. "I think the approach will be different this year," Alvin said.

The unions participating in the coordinated bargaining are: Steelworkers; Machinists; Sheet Metal Workers; Operating Engineers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Chemical Workers; Maintenance of Way Employees; Laborers; Railway Carmen; Carpenters; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Office & Professional Employees; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Plumbers & Pipefitters; Boilermakers; United Transport Union; Bricklayers; the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Auto Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters and International Guards Union.

No help wanted

Portland, Ore.—Nearly 200 persons showed up outside a cable installation firm, some waiting over night, for a chance to get one of 50 jobs that had been advertised in the Sunday Oregonian's help wanted section.

The company, Henkle & McCoy, had no jobs to offer and denied placing the ad. A company official said the company had been laying off workers.

Similar instances of hundreds, even thousands, of persons showing up for jobs that don't exist have occurred in cities across the country, according to Editor & Publisher magazine.

The heavy turnout of the jobless in these situations tends to refute President Reagan's insistence that want ads go begging.

Economic rebound wavers as business failures increase cent to an annual rate of 1.72 million units, the highest since September 1979. But number of initial claims for jobless benefits and the surge in commercial and industrial business failures.

Business and labor economists viewed the Labor Dept.'s report that new jobless insurance claims rose 52,000 to 517,000 in the week ended Jan. 29 as an indication that the nation's mounting unemployment has not peaked despite the drop in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate from 10.8 to 10.4 percent last month. In actual numbers, there were 12.5 million workers on the unemployment rolls in January, an increase of 900,000 from December.

"We're far from out of the woods," said AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald. "You have more and more people out of work for a longer and longer period of time."

Over adjustment

Several economists have warned that the January decline in the jobless rate may have been exaggerated by the process of adjusting data for seasonal factors.

Business failures in the week ended Feb. 3 climbed to 690 from 654 the week before and 449 in the comparable 1982 week, Dun & Bradstreet Inc. reported. That was the largest weekly total since a record 696 bankruptcies in late August.

The latest failure pace boosted the 1983 total to 3,145 bankruptcies, a 55-percent increase from the year-earlier period, the credit service said.

Announcement of the collapse of the United American Bank of Knoxville sent shock waves throughout the banking community as well as the bank's depositors. With assets of about $760 million and deposits of about $590 million, the Knoxville bank was the fourth-largest commercial bank to fail since 1933.

Loans at fault

Tennessee's Commissioner of Banking, William C. Adams, said that loan losses had made the bank insolvent. The shutdown was of short duration, however, as the bank was taken over two days later by First Tennessee National Corp., the state's largest bank holding company, for about $54.5 billion.

Meanwhile, the domestic auto industry reported that U.S. new-car sales in early February fell 3 percent from a year earlier. Deliveries of passenger cars built in this country were still at recession levels. The industry said it sold 136,568 units in the Feb. 1-10 selling period, compared with 140,818 units during the same 10-day period in 1982.

In other economic news, the Commerce Dept. reported that American businesses reduced their inventories of unsold goods six-tenths of 1 percent in December, despite weak sales, by holding down production.

Labor keeping an eye on revised CPI

AFL-CIO economists are advising affiliates involved in contract negotiations this year and next to adopt a wait-and-see attitude toward revision of one of the government's consumer price indexes.

"Stay with what you know and have until we have some experience with both the revised CPI-U and the current CPI-W," Federation Economist John Zalusky recommends.

The CPI-U or all-urban index covers about 80 percent of the nation's population, including professional, managerial, and technical workers, the self-employed, retirees, and the unemployed as well as wage earners and clerical workers. The CPI-W includes only urban wage earners and clerical workers, and represents about half the population covered by CPI-U.

Rental equivalence

On Feb. 25, the Bureau of Labor Statistics plans to release its revised CPI-U for the month of January. The new index will embody the BLS's "rental equivalence" approach to the cost of consumer housing instead of reflecting the direct costs of home ownership, a change opposed by organized labor.

When the government's decision to use a new measure of housing costs was announced in October 1981, BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood said the rental equivalence approach, as opposed to the traditional asset-value method of calculation, more accurately reflects market conditions.

This argument is disputed by the AFL-CIO. "We don't accept the investment angle," Federation Economist Markley Roberts observes. "Most people don't buy a home as an investment. House prices should be included in the index."

Force behind inflation

Zalusky points out also that with mortgage interest eliminated as a factor in calculating the monthly CPI, economists and the public alike will tend to overlook the impact interest rates have as a driving force in inflation.

An overwhelming majority of collective bargaining agreements between AFL-CIO affiliates and employers are keyed to CPI-W. The measure is generally used to calculate wage and benefit increases due under cost-of-living provisions of union contracts and government entitlement programs, including social security.

The BLS will continue the old CPI-U, factoring in house prices and mortgage interest, for the next six months. Revision of the CPI-W in line with the rental equivalence approach is not scheduled until January 1985.

"We think that CPI-W is a better measure," said Zalusky, "because it is based on urban wage earners, while CPI-U includes retirees, executives, and the self-employed. The effect of going from the homeownership concept to the rental equivalence concept tends to reduce the awareness of the cost of interest."

The business community has urged BLS to take another look at its decision to revise the two basic CPIs at different times. It wants the government to issue a single measure at the earliest possible date. Labor generally welcomes the two-year period between revisions of the CPI-U and the CPI-W as a chance to review the indexes before deciding whether to switch from CPI-W in wage agreements.

Experimental results

Price data for 1982 offer a guide to what might happen this year with the two indexes. Last year, both the CPI-U and the CPI-W rose 3.9 percent, the smallest increase since 1972. An experimental BLS index using the rental equivalence method, however, rose 5 percent for the year as higher rent costs pushed it above the two official measures tied directly to mortgage interest rates.

Forecasts for 1983 indicate that the revised CPI-U will move at a faster pace, at least in the first half of the year, than the unrevised CPI-W.

Graphic representation from a State Dept. study on exploitation of forced labor in the USSR shows a workers' camp at the site of a pipeline compressor. The study says 1,100 such camps exist in the USSR.

Soviets still using forced labor, State Dept. reports to Congress

By James M. Shevis

The use of forced labor in the Soviet Union is a grave violation of internationally recognized basic human rights, and the world community should dedicate itself anew to eliminating such a practice, a State Dept. study declared.

In a final report to Congress, the State Dept. charged that Soviet exploitation of forced labor flouts the United Nations Charter and the Anti-Slavery Convention of 1926.

Under-Sec. of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger observed in a letter to Sen. William L. Armstrong (R-Colo.) that while Soviet forced labor practices have changed considerably since the Stalin era, the USSR continues to exploit forced labor on a large scale.

Senate hearings

Eagleburger's letter and report were in response to a congressional resolution sponsored by Armstrong, who chaired hearings of a Senate Banking subcommittee last summer investigating the charges of forced labor practices in the USSR.

"Forced labor, often under harsh and degrading conditions, is used to execute various Soviet developmental projects and to produce large amounts of primary and manufactured goods for both domestic and Western export markets," Eagleburger said.

As the department noted in an interim report last fall, forced labor in the USSR is a longstanding and grave human rights issue. The Soviet forced labor system embraces 4 million involuntary workers, of whom at least 10,000 are considered to be political and religious prisoners, in some 1,100 camps covering most areas of the country, Eagleburger said.

For nearly 30 years, the International Labor Organization—a specialized agency of the United Nations headquartered in Geneva—has investigated allegations concerning the Soviet labor practices. Soviet authorities, however, refuse to provide the ILO satisfactory responses.

Eagleburger said there is clear evidence that forced labor has been used in domestic pipeline construction but was less definite about charges that forced labor has been used in construction of the Trans-Siberian gas pipeline to western Europe. Both interim and final State Dept. reports, however, point to "a number of reports (that) suggest that forced labor was used in the difficult and dangerous site preparation and other preliminary work related to the export pipeline."

"The publicity, we believe, has made Soviet authorities sensitive to the additional problems that would attend future exploitation of forced labor on the export pipeline project," Eagleburger added.

The State Dept. study, quoting Central Intelligence Agency sources, said some of the labor camps are located along the route of the Siberian pipeline.

"The burden of proof is on the USSR," said Eagleburger, urging an impartial international investigation of the forced labor charges.

He noted that the ILO has accepted "in principle" an invitation from the Soviet All Union Central Council of Trade Unions, the official Soviet trade union apparatus, to send an on-site mission to examine charges of forced labor on the Siberian pipeline. Arrangements for the ILO visit have yet to be worked out, he said.

Unions delay Philadelphia transit strike

Philadelphia—Twelve unions postponed a strike against the transit authority operating commuter rail service in the Philadelphia area pending further negotiations.

The delay came just hours before the scheduled Feb. 14 walkout by employees of the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transit Authority (SEPTA). The rail system handles an estimated 50,000 commuters daily.

SEPTA took over the system from Conrail Jan. 1 under the Northeast Rail Services Act of 1981. Three unions—the Yardmasters, Carmen and the Transport Workers — reached agreement with SEPTA, but 12 others have not. Their leaders set the strike deadlines to protest the lack of good-faith bargaining by the transit authority.

Workforce reductions

Since SEPTA took over the service, it has reduced the number of operating trains as well as the workforce. Conrail had used approximately 1,500 workers from the 15 unions to provide the area with about 550 trains each work day. SEPTA trimmed the number of workers to about 900.

Union leaders cited two reasons for the strike postponement. Several of the negotiating unions reported sufficient progress in the past week to continue talks, and the Philadelphia City Council has stepped in with a petition to a Philadelphia court to oversee the bargaining.

During the talks, SEPTA has sought to hold wages for the former Conrail workers to or near the level paid to workers in the authority's transit divisions, where the pay is lower.

Cutting across craft lines

SEPTA also wants to change numerous work rules, particularly those having to do with jurisdiction craft lines.

The 12 unions that have yet to settle with SEPTA are the Railway & Airline Clerks, Signalmen, United Transportation Union, Maintenance of Way Employees, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Firemen & Oilers, Train Dispatchers, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, the Railway Supervisors, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Teleconference mobilizes Postal Workers

The Postal Workers conducted a nationwide teleconference exploring ways to combat a recommendation of the Social Security Reform Commission to phase out their civil service retirement coverage.

The APWU teleconference was broadcast from WETA-TV facilities in Arlington, Va., to 47 locations across the country where some 8,700 APWU members joined in to voice their concerns at the proposal to shift new employees to the social security system beginning Jan. 1, 1984, while learning how to combat the measure before Congress.

The two-hour program featured a brief explanation of the proposal and the union's objection to it, plus instructions on how APWU members can get the union's message across to Congress. This was followed by a question-and-answer period via telephone hook-up between the central studio and the 47 sites.

How they did it

A pre-recorded discussion of the commission's recommendation by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and APWU President Moe Biller detailed how the commission's recommendations were developed.

Biller told the APWU membership, "The social security issue represents one of the most dangerous threats we have ever faced as a union, and the APWU is going to respond with the most intensive preparation as we have ever made for any legislative battle." The teleconference was designed as part of a massive "battle plan," Biller said.

Kirkland noted that he was the only commission member who opposed expanding the social security system to include federal and postal workers.

He said he had "serious reservations about the assumption that a fair method of extending it to federal employees could be devised or that the likelihood of that was sufficient to make it possible to honestly count the financial effects of that as a part of the revenue-raising methodology."

Kirkland noted the federation has taken the position in convention and Executive Council action to "oppose coverage of federal employees under social security unless certain criteria are met."

The establishment of safeguards to merit AFL-CIO support for inclusion of federal and postal workers under social security are:

- The level of pension benefits now available to government workers and their beneficiaries is not reduced.
- No additional financial burden is imposed on public employees, without a commensurate adjustment in benefits.
- The identity for government workers' retirement plans is not lost.
- The opportunity for those employees to improve their retirement systems in the future is not diminished.

"It was my position that they should not expect federal employees to embrace this as a pig in a poke without seeing the complete details and having an opportunity to have the benefits of effective representation," he said.

Kirkland noted the battle facing the federal unions is "an uphill struggle, but I think the merits of it are strong and the criteria that was set forth in the convention resolution are sound and designed to assure no system would get our support unless it absolutely assured that federal employees would at least be no worse off, and I would hope better off."

Consumer groups issue warning on Reaganomics

A review of the second year of the Reagan Administration by the National Consumers League in cooperation with other consumer-oriented organizations confirms a pattern of government withdrawal from its obligations to safeguard the health, safety and economic well-being of its citizens.

That's the conclusion of a report titled "Warning: Reaganomics Is Still Harmful to Consumers."

It documents the impact of two successive years of budget cuts on consumer programs, the weakening of food and health protections through deregulation and lack of enforcement and the added cost to consumers from these policies.

Gramm spends $600,000 on election

The Texas congressional district that sent conservative Phil Gramm to the House as a Democrat last November sent him back as a Republican in a Feb. 12 special election.

Gramm had resigned from the House after Democrats voted to strip him of his Budget Committee assignment, which he had been using as the command post for garnering conservative Democratic support for legislation that embodied President Reagan's economic program.

He won under the Republican label with 55 percent of the vote—with the help of a $600,000 campaign fund that compared with $30,000 spent by his principal Democratic opponent, Dan Kubiak. Gramm's support came from Republican-tilted suburban areas of Houston and Dallas, but he received less than a majority in 11 of the district's 14 counties, a largely rural area of traditional Democratic strength.

'Steel Mill Blues'— anthem for the jobless

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers have kicked off national distribution of a new song, "Steel Mill Blues," sending recordings of the song to President Reagan and every member of Congress.

The USWA urged the government leaders to listen closely to the message in the lyrics that point to the fears and frustrations of 160,000 jobless steelworkers, idled by a depression in their industry that the government's own policies helped create:

What am I to do now that jobs are hard to find?

I'm so damn sick of standing in the unemployment line.

I got a wife and three children depending on this man.

I got a government in Washington who does not give a damn.

"Steel Mill Blues" was written by an 18-year-old college student, Mike Pickering of Wellsville, Ohio, as a way to "cheer up" and show support for his uncle, Bob Sullivan, who was laid off—along with nearly 5,000 other workers—with the closing of the Midland, Pa., mill where he had worked for 18 years.

What it's like

Sullivan said the song "describes what I'm going through and what the 12 million unemployed people in the country are going through . . . the worst feeling in the world when they tell you you're done. You wonder if you're ever going to work again."

He wrote about "Steel Mill Blues" to KDKA-TV where reporter Liz Miles arranged to have Pickering record it at Air Craft Communications and to have National Record Mart distribute it.

Community benefits

All commercial and professional services involved in the production and distribution of the record have been donated and all proceeds from sales of the 45 rpm record are going to community food banks that serve laid-off USWA members.

In sending President Reagan a copy of the record, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride wrote the President that his State of the Union message was "strong on hope" but "short on the mechanisms for turning hope into reality" for the unemployed. McBride urged Reagan "to move toward a firm commitment and then to the actual economic stimulative steps that truly will put America on the mend."

USWA Sec. Lynn Williams called the record distribution and sales plan "an opportunity not only to get the message of frustration against Reaganomics to the public, but also a chance to carry on with the idea started in Pittsburgh to have all proceeds from sales of the record to go directly to USWA foodbanks."

The Steelworkers have already distributed 10,000 copies of "Steel Mill Blues" among the union's 20 district offices, and many USWA local unions are selling the record in their communities.

National Record Mart turned over one check for $15,000 to the union in January for Pittsburgh area sales of "Steel Mill Blues."

Copies of the record are available for $2 each from USWA regional offices and many local unions. Single record orders will also be filled by USWA headquarters. Checks for $2 plus $1.25 for postage and handling should be sent to USWA/Steel Mill Blues, Public Relations Department, Five Gateway Center, Pittsburgh, Pa. 15222. The department will also provide information on bulk orders.

Reagan switch opens way for first-phase jobs bill serves have been exhausted to continue to pay benefits.

The Reagan switch came after a broad spectrum of congressional Republicans, first privately and increasingly publicly, warned the President of the political damage resulting from his do-nothing approach to increasingly grim unemployment and apparent indifference to the hardships of the poor.

Veto threat

Just two months earlier, during the lame-duck session of Congress, Reagan had killed emergency jobs legislation with a veto threat.

The House had added a Democratic $5.4 billion jobs bill to the final appropriations resolution and the Republican Senate had adopted a smaller-scaled $1.2 billion measure.

But Reagan said firmly that he would veto any additional money for jobs and a House-Senate conference committee took him at his word and dropped both add-ons from the resolution sent to the President.

The new White House package includes some of the provisions of the Democratic bill the President had so vigorously denounced.

The President continued to insist, however, that the earlier measure was "make-work" while the new proposal merely speeded up the timetable for projects that are "needed."

There was a growing consensus on Capitol Hill for a follow-up economic recovery package, although not on its components.

Reagan said in a Feb. 16 news conference that he will send Congress "proposals for reducing long-term structural employment." But the provisions that he mentioned included only such warmed-over proposals as tax incentives for business to hire the unemployed, a subminimum youth wage which the President described as "incentives for summer youth employment" and retaining funds.

Meanwhile, Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.) proposed a jobs package slightly larger than the White House version and offered reporters a theory for the President's apparent change of heart.

Hatfield suggested that the White House now accepts the fact that it must negotiate with the House Democratic leadership because Democratic gains in last November's elections have made it "less possible" to put together a winning House coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats.

Housing costs squeeze buyers, renters

High housing costs are pricing both home buyers and renters out of the market and forcing America's families to double up, the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, said a dip in interest rates and the pent-up demand after a long construction slump had brought o ynlatemporary upturn in the number of housing starts.

Now, he noted, mortgage rates give signs of moving up again and rent increases have been outpacing the overall consumer price index. With a shortage of affordable housing, "there has been a significant increase in families living doubled up."

The Senate's Housing & Urban Affairs subcommittee is holding exploratory hearings on the nation's housing problems, and Schechter warned that the situation will worsen unless more housing is built.

Housing is crucial

He urged further reduction in interest rates through Federal Reserve action to ease monetary policy. If this is not done because of fears that it would reignite inflation, "there should be resort to credit controls such as were used in 1980 to bring down interest rates quickly," Schechter said.

When that was done, he stressed, "home building rapidly rose and so did the economy in its wake."

Schechter called for the government to continue federally assisted housing construction instead of switching to an Administration-backed voucher program that low-income families could use to pay rent of existing units they can find in the market.

"A sizable expansion of demand without a matching increase in supply will increase inflationary pressure," he warned.

Schechter said an additional $15-$16 billion in budget authority for the current and next fiscal year could add 200,000 units of housing for low-income and moderate-income households. This could include housing for the elderly as well as for younger families, Indians and rural households, he suggested.

The AFL-CIO has pressed for a government program to prevent families suffering unemployment from losing their homes because they can't meet mortgage payments. The need is increasingly urgent, Schechter testified. He said the percentage of home mortgage loans in foreclosure process rose to a record high last year.

Not everyone who can't afford high-priced housing is able to move in with relatives, Schechter reminded the committee. He cited reports of growing numbers of homeless in the nation's cities and episodes such as the dispersal by authorities of a tent city that had been home to families who had come to Houston in a futile search for work.

United union way

President Charles H. Pillard, center, of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers receives an award for his service as chairman of the United Way of the National Capital Area's International Union 1982 Campaign from Oral Suer, executive vice president of the local chapter. Despite the economic recession, international unions in the Washington area raised a record $132,710 —15 percent more than in 1981, Suer told AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the award presentation.

Mediation agency names Williams to deputy post

Richard D. Williams has been named deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation, FMCS Director Kay McMurray announced.

Since 1979, Williams had been FMCS western regional director in San Francisco. Earlier he was midwest regional director in Chicago. Before joining FMCS in 1963, Williams was an international representative with the Auto Workers.

Williams, 56, succeeds Kenneth E. Moffet, who is now executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association.

Sidewalk sweatshop

In Macao, a semi-autonomous Portuguese colony off the coast of China, the garment finishing shop is a sidewalk where elderly women and young mothers with babies work for about 20 cents an hour. Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin and ILGWU Vice President Edward Schneider got a first-hand look at the colony's garment industry during a detour from an international trade union conference.

Flaws cited in plan to cut Medicare's hospital costs

An Administration proposal to change the method of reimbursing hospitals for treatment of Medicare patients has some desirable features but is too flawed to be adopted in its present form, the AFL-CIO testified at House and Senate hearings.

Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a House Ways & Means subcommittee that labor supports the concept of "prospective budgeting" as superior to the present policy of "paying hospitals whatever they spend."

Costs could rise

But he questioned the Administration's decision to apply its cost control plan only to Medicare patients and warned that the unintended result could be a switch of hospital costs to bills covered by private health insurance plans and a consequent rise in health insurance premiums.

Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten carried the same message to a Senate Finance subcommittee hearing.

McGlotten and Seidman also stressed the AFL-CIO's concern at a separate Administration proposal to increase the share of Medicare hospitalization costs that patients are required to pay.

The argument that health care costs can be held down by making individuals more "cost-conscious" is usually just a smokescreen for reducing benefits, they testified.

Under the Administration's "pro-competition" plan for paying hospitals for care of Medicare patients, there would be 467 fee schedules covering all of the ailments that might require hospitalization. With some slight local flexibility, all hospitals would be paid the same amount for treating a patient with the same condition. Presumably, the more efficient hospitals would profit by the arrangement and the less efficient institutions would lose out.

Bad for inner cities

The AFL-CIO testimony cited numerous concerns about such an arrangement, including the fact that inner-city hospitals, which normally treat patients whose health has been most neglected and have more complications, would be at a disadvantage. Nor would health maintenance organizations—HMOs—benefit from their pre-admission health care and the lower-than-average stay of their members.

Instead, the AFL-CIO urged, Congress should adopt a "prospective reimbursement system for all payers, public and private, with flexibility for states to design their own systems so long as they meet federally established guidelines."

The federation's testimony emphasized labor's continued support of comprehensive national health insurance but termed health containment an important goal that should be applied to all forms of health care, including physician services.

Zero Corp. unit recognizes IUE after long battle

Monson, Mass.—The Zero Corp. has decided after four years of legal battles to recognize the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) as the bargaining agent for its workers at the Zero East division plant here.

Management of the Burbank, Cal., based company posted a notice to its workers that it was recognizing the IUE and would not further appeal the June 29, 1982, National Labor Relations Board order that it bargain with the union.

The company's decision came after the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston unanimously upheld the NLRB order, which had cited "some 50 separate violations of the (National Labor Relations) Act" by the company.

The various company actions, including promises and threats, made a fair election impossible and contributed to a 157-116 vote against union representation, the NLRB found. It ordered Zero East to bargain with the IUE, regardless of the election results. IUE had 188 signed representation cards in the unit of 340. The unit has since grown to nearly 400, the IUE reported.

The NLRB's order also requires Zero East to stop committing unfair labor practices and rescind a stricter absenteeism/tardiness policy established after IUE had signed a majority of the workers.

AFTRA's board backs ratification of network pacts

New York—The national board of the Television & Radio Artists has recommended that AFTRA members ratify a new agreement with the broadcasting networks.

Terms of the tentative three-year contract, retroactive to November 1982, were unanimously approved by the AFTRA board, and the contract will go to the membership for a vote at meetings in key cities in AFTRA's eastern, central and western regions. AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff said voting should be completed by mid-March.

Final ratification of the agreement, that covers all TV and radio network news and programs except dramatic prime-time, also depends on completion of negotiations with locally owned and operated stations that are going on now, AFTRA said.

AFTRA and the Screen Actors Guild will jointly negotiate a separate contract for performers in dramatic prime-time programs. The contract expires June 30.

Provisions of the tentative agreement include a 6½ percent increase in minimum scale for all programs and other fees in the first and second years and a 5 percent cost-of-living increase in the third year if the government's consumer price index rises above that amount.

Minimum weekly salaries for news employees will go from a current $750 to $800, $850 and $925 in each year of the agreement.

Substantial improvements were bargained in overtime and excess day and hour fees, rehearsal rates and fees for opening, closing and promotional announcements.

Improvements in wages and conditions were also won for singers and dancers.

For salvaging aid

Unions battle move to scrap Trade Act aid

Koplan told the subcommittee that this type of assurance is necessary to fulfill the goals of the law "rather than to create a new group of working poor whose jobs were lost because of the federal government's trade policy."

Other labor-supported provisions would raise the allowance for relocation and job search from $600 to $800 and fund the program through a trust fund set up from proceeds of customs duties on imports.

The labor witnesses urged strengthening of various provisions of the bill and asked the subcommittee to consider broadening trade adjustment entitlement to employees of independent suppliers of parts and services, whose customers have been largely wiped out by imports.

Only partial remedy

Even with suggested changes, the AFL-CIO noted, the legislation would only "partially redress some of the injustices inflicted on this program in the last Congress."

Labor doesn't consider trade adjustment assistance "a substitute for a fair trade policy," Koplan said. But at least the promises made in the past should be honored, he urged.

"It is sad that we must come to Congress to plead that this body carry out its promise to provide a measure of financial, relocation and job training assistance under the original legislation.

Predictable consequence

"Particularly sad is the fact that the harm that we argued would come from this government's trade policies has come to pass," he added.

But unless Congress acts promptly, Koplan stressed, even the remaining "small measure of aid" to victims of the government's trade policies would be wiped out.

The UAW testimony expressed concern at the Labor Dept.'s administration of the trade adjustment assistance program, citing examples such as an insistence that relocation of a plant to a foreign country does not qualify workers for relief unless increased imports actually preceded the move.

As a result, Page noted, "workers making bicycle parts at a Bendix plant in Elmira, N.Y., were denied certification when the company moved the plant to Mexico and imported the bicycle parts back into the United States."

In his testimony for the Steelworkers, Sheehan warned that the nation's industrial base "is being eroded by imports" at the same time it is being "devastated by recession." The result has been "permanent job losses in areas which have provided the means of livelihood for generations of Americans."

Where job loss results from government policy, he said, Congress should provide "meaningful adjustment assistance from the time of layoff until workers can secure equivalent employment."

New pamphlets include Dartmouth College talk

New AFL-CIO pamphlets reproduce the recent speech by Federation President Lane Kirkland at Dartmouth College and the series exposing Lyndon LaRouche and his followers that appeared in the AFL-CIO News last fall.

The pamphlet on Kirkland's Dartmouth speech, titled "The Constructive Use of Government," is Publication No. 158. The News series, collected under the title "Lyndon LaRouche's Strange Cult," is Publication No. B67.

Single copies of both are available free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Prices for No. 158 are 50 cents each up to 100 and $45 a hundred in larger quantities; for No. B67 the rates are 25 cents each up to 100 and $20 per hundred.

Half a Turn

OBVIOUSLY it is far better to have President Reagan supporting an earnest if inadequate effort to put people to work and deal with some of the hardships of his economic policies than to have vital legislation stymied by vetoes and veto threats.

Many of the emergency job measures the President now embraces would have been in place two months ago if his veto warning had not intimidated the post-election session of Congress.

So the President's conversion is welcome.

Equally obviously, this nation's unemployment crisis is too serious and too long lasting to be cured by a half-loaf measure, however well intentioned.

If responsible members of Congress from both parties accept this premise, it should be possible to move ahead quickly with a somewhat enhanced "first phase" legislative package that represents a bipartisan consensus on emergency first aid for a badly damaged economy. But the effort must not end there.

Effective economic recovery calls for more than quick-acting, short-term work projects.

Fortunately, the nation's needs and the needs of the unemployed mesh. There is a pent-up demand for affordable housing that can lead to the employment of a large number of jobless or underemployed workers and send out a big ripple of economic stimulus.

There is welcome inclusion of some food distribution and humanitarian relief in the bipartisan package being shaped in Congress. But there remain huge rips in America's safety nets that call out for repair.

Families that are temporarily down, but not out, need protection from mortgage foreclosures and continuation of health insurance lost through unemployment, not just soup kitchens and emergency shelters.

IT WON'T be all bipartisan accord and consensus in shaping a recovery program, nor is there any compelling reason why it should. The time for compromise—on both sides—isn't always before the issues and differences have been clearly defined.

As of now, the Reagan White House is talking in terms of more "incentives" for employers to hire and train workers.

That's not going to get America back to work, no way.

When there is work to be done, employers don't need tax credits as an incentive for doing what they would do anyway. Trickle-down prosperity hasn't worked. It's time to give trickle-up a chance.

It's too much perhaps to expect this Administration to embrace the change of course that the American people clearly seek. But perhaps, at least, it can accept it.

Salt in the Wounds

BY PROPOSING to abolish the last vestiges of the trade adjustment assistance program, the Administration is rubbing salt into the wounds of workers whose jobs have been wiped out by the increased imports resulting from the government's open-door trade policies.

Over the past two years, shamefully with the concurrence of Congress, the Reagan Administration has breached the compact written into the 1962 Trade Act and renewed with every revision of the law since then. It substantially cut back the special assistance for import victims, reducing cash payments to the level of state unemployment insurance.

At the same time the Administration is seeking to junk the program entirely, President Reagan has renewed his request to Congress to enact the balance of his Carribbean Basin Initiative plan, which would in effect subsidize more job-destroying imports into the United States.

Trade adjustment assistance was never a substitute for jobs. But it stretches the boundaries of outrage for the White House to advocate further job-destroying trade policies in the same breath that it seeks to do away with the program set up to help the victims.

Job training no substitute for needed jobs creation

By Press Associates, Inc.

As almost everyone knows, job training only works if there are jobs available at the end of the training. So, while top priority should go to the current push for job creation programs, training also has a role to play in achieving economic growth once again.

Unfortunately, the Reagan Administration has been portraying training for jobs as a kind of wise alternative to federal programs to create jobs now.

With this in mind, it is useful to examine the federal job training program enacted by Congress last fall to replace the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA). The new Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) has good potential, but also contains some serious flaws.

The Administration's proposed funding level—$3.5 billion for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1—is inadequate, and less than current funding.

For the current fiscal year, Congress appropriated $3.7 billion for training, about twice the amount requested by the Administration. In fiscal 1981, the last pre-Reagan year, about $5 billion was provided for training under CETA programs.

A positive feature of JTPA is that, for the first time, the displaced or dislocated worker is singled out for meaningful assistance. The Administration has asked for $240 million in federal matching funds for retraining, job search and relocation assistance for workers.

Inadequate funding

Although the Administration plays up the fact that its proposed funding is 10 times more than the $24 million allocated for dislocated workers this fiscal year, it is still woefully inadequate.

The Congressional Budget Office estimated that this year the number of displaced workers is likely to exceed 2 million. Under the Administration budget, only 96,000 of these workers would receive training in the coming fiscal year. The AFL-CIO said JTPA is "only a start."

Also under JTPA, the Administration proposes $1.9 billion in block grants to the states for training the long-term unemployed.

By the Administration's own estimates, nearly 7 million of today's jobless are "structurally" unemployed, meaning they cannot expect to find employment during an economic upturn unless they receive specialized training.

When President Reagan said in his State of the Union message that JTPA would provide "training for over one million Americans annually," he failed to mention that this is only one out of seven of the nation's "structurally" unemployed.

But the proposed funding level isn't the only potential problem with JTPA. Congress shifted much of the responsibility for planning and running local job training programs from cities, counties and unions, as under CETA, to governors and business.

Local Private Industry Councils (PICs), which will direct the programs in cooperation with local officials, must have a majority of business members. Still, labor is to be represented on the PICs and at the state planning level.

The Administration's fiscal 1984 budget proposals would reduce by $500 million, or 12 percent, overall spending for employment and training programs.

The Work Incentive Program, which now provides $271 million in job training for welfare recipients, would be eliminated as would the Trade Adjustment Assistance program for workers displaced by imports.

Job training is a vital part of what must be a massive national effort to reduce jobless levels, but training is no substitute for direct, immediate job creation. Jobs are needed now.

MEMO FROM COPE

The Other Side of the Looking Glass

On Jan. 20, 1981 this nation was led through the looking glass.

With the inauguration of Ronald Reagan, a whole new world was revealed. Up traded places with down (that is, all the time the economy was pointing down, we were told things were looking up).

What had been thought good became not good, and we were instructed that nearly 40 years of mostly prosperity and great progress and success in dealing with problems of working people and needy people had brought the nation to the brink of failure.

Public discussion was shifted by the Reagan Administration from how much a nation as strong as ours and rich as ours can and will do to make life a little more tolerable for the weak, the jobless and the poor to how much it can't and won't do.

In other words, we had been at our worst when we thought we were at our best. A program was introduced and enacted to correct this wrong-headedness by trying to convince us that it was the other way around—we are at our best when at our worst.

This was expressed by the administration's tactic of taking from workers and the poor with one hand, while giving to corporations and the wealthy with the other. It cut food stamps, for example, and some forms of unemployment compensation (at the outset, extended benefits and special aid for workers displaced by imports) and handed billions of dollars in tax breaks to business and rich individuals.

It told us inflation was the nation's most dangerous enemy, so it fought the foe with policies that helped drive more than 4 million additional workers onto the jobless rolls in just two years.

It took government "off the backs" of business by wiping out regulations that had protected workers and consumers, but put government on the backs of average Americans of the present and the future by saddling them with $200 billion federal deficits that make the deficits of the Administration's "tax and tax, spend and spend" predecessors look like small change (the last Carter deficit was in the range of $55 billion).

All the while, the Reagan Administration invoked the nation's "traditional values" as if vengeance against the weak and solicitude for the strong were among the most cherished of them.

This became known as the "Reagan Revolution." It ended with election day, Nov. 2, 1982, but its damage will linger for years, because ground lost is not often easily or quickly regained.

This President in his Wonderland blames all present economic problems on the "wild spending" of his predecessors (among them, Republicans Eisenhower, Nixon and Ford) and none on his own policies. But it's ironic that the nation's deepest recession and greatest economic peril in more than 40 years did not arise from feeding the hungry, attending the sick, housing the ill-housed, training the untrained, cushioning the unemployed and the elderly, opening up educational opportunities for our youth.

The peril arrived with the election of an Administration that decided doing these things cost too much, but turning over billions of dollars to corporations and the rich cost nothing. This idea hasn't panned out.

Reagan was perhaps unaware, or had forgotten, what led to programs he has gone about repudiating. Many other Americans perhaps had forgotten, too. Maybe one example will restore memory.

Take food stamps—which Reagan has cut drastically and would choose to cut further. He's had a joy ride whacking away at food stamps and reciting horror stories about the abuses in the program and about the tremendous growth in its cost.

Food stamps came in as a pilot program in 1965 under Lyndon Johnson, at first serving 633,000 persons in communities scattered around the country. It grew into an enormous program serving nearly 20 million Americans because there was a need for it. Its spread was spurred by a Field Foundation study that shocked the conscience of the nation. In 1967, physicians who conducted the study testified to Congress:

"Wherever we went and wherever we looked, we saw children in significant numbers who were hungry and sick, children for whom hunger is a daily fact of life, and sickness in many forms an inevitability. The children we saw were more than just malnourished. They were hungry, weak, apathetic.

"Their lives are being shortened. They are visibly and predictably losing their health, their energy, their spirits. They are suffering from hunger and disease, and directly or indirectly, they are dying from them—which is exactly what 'starvation' means."

Again in 1977—10 years later—a second Field Foundation study found "far fewer grossly malnourished people in this country and many fewer children with the swollen stomachs and the dull eyes and poorly healing wounds characteristic of malnutrition."

They concluded the food stamp and other federal nutrition programs were responsible.

Yet, in a speech last fall to the National Black Republican Council, Reagan argued that what he calls the "binge" in social spending for programs like food stamps has crippled the economy by "eating away at the underpinnings of the free enterprise system." (It also, he said, "threatened the character of our people.")

He pins the blame for the double-digit inflation of the last two Carter years and for high unemployment on the cost of these social programs and, from that other side of the looking glass, manages to ignore the soaring oil and other energy costs that were credited with causing 4-5 inflationary points. (A barrel of Saudia Arabian light crude oil, as one example, zoomed from $1.80 in 1970 to the present $34 level.)

The President also gives a topsy-turvy picture of the impact of social programs on the extent of poverty in the nation. He claims Great Society and other social programs brought "economic progress for America's poor . . . to a tragic halt."

Yet, Census Bureau statistics argue against his conclusion. In 1981, they show, 14 percent of American citizens lived below the poverty level. In 1959, that figure was 22 percent. In 1969, after the Kennedy-Johnson years and their anti-poverty programs, it had dipped to 12 percent.

Perhaps it is true that "the poor are always with us," but why punish those who are and why create more of them while you're simultaneously shifting billions to the wealthy? Here's the Reagan Administration clobbering social programs in the same new budget proposal that points out the President's tax cuts have "reduced revenues as projected under current economic assumptions by more than one trillion dollars over 1984-88."

That tax cut presented—for the 1983 tax year—$120 to a family whose income is $10,000 and $15,250 to a family earning $80,000—almost 130 times as much for the family that already has so much. Nobody's going to clamber out of poverty or near-poverty on the strength of an extra $120 a year.

Not opening up that trillion dollar tax hemorrhage could have saved a lot of grief—like Reagan's proposed 9 percent food stamp reduction; his 8 percent child nutrition cuts; his 6 percent slashes in secondary and higher educational aid; the 30 percent whack out of low-income home-heating assistance; the 12 percent lopped off summer youth employment programs; the 5½ percent slice out of Aid to Families with Dependent Children; the proposed shift of nearly $60 billion of Medicare and Medicaid costs over the next five years to the ailing and the aged. (All these on top of cuts already made in the first Reagan budget.)

There might have been no need to turn the screws on the disabled and drop 300,000 from social security disability rolls, with another 250,000 projected for dumping this year.

And for the many millions of unemployed, how much might have been done—quickly—with the funding Reagan kissed off in his tax program.

The farce of the Administration's new budget is that—for all the cutting that's been done and is proposed—a deficit in the range of $200 billion is foreseen. And if there's one promise Reagan the candidate made time and again, it was that Reagan the President would balance the budget within a few years of taking office as a fundamental step toward economic health.

What with things as they are on the other side of the looking glass, maybe the next thing we'll hear will be the President claiming enormous deficits are just the tonic we need for recovery.

Whatever Happened To Corporate Taxes?

President Reagan's recent off-the-cuff statement that corporate income taxes are "hard to justify" touched off a mini-storm, and the administration backed away. But the fact is, corporate taxes seem to be on the way out, anyway.

In fiscal 1977, the corporate tax provided 15.44 percent of federal revenue. In fiscal 1982 the percentage slumped to 7.97, thanks to Reagan tax changes in 1981. This amount, too, will diminish in the years ahead.

Many firms, which take shrewd advantage of tax breaks, already pay nothing to the government. The 46 percent statutory rate is a laughing stock for almost all businesses with income over $100,000. The big oil companies for years, even with enormous profits, have been paying a lower percentage than individuals earning $10-15,000.

Disputing Reagan

Nobody knows just who President Reagan has in mind when he talks about how the "truly needy" are not hurt by his budget cuts, but he's got plenty of challengers to the claim.

The Children's Defense Fund, for one, charges already enacted cuts, plus those proposed in the current budget, will slash spending by $12.5 billion for poor and crippled children and their families. The fund says Administration claims that it is only curbing the rate of increase of programs for the needy are flat out untrue.

It says, "Without Reagan Administration changes in program levels and eligibility . . . federal budget authority for 20 key poor-people and children's programs would have been $67.4 billion in fiscal 1984, but if he gets what he wants, it will be only $54.95 billion."

Among the programs: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Medicaid, food stamps, child nutrition, compensatory education, education for the handicapped, maternal and child health, Head Start.

Stockman Tells All

Budget Director David Stockman made an admission recently, one which his President has never made—at least publicly.

Stockman told the press that too little notice was given the tight-money policy the Administration encouraged—indeed, at first insisted upon—to fight inflation. Said Stockman:

"The whole economy was cut down in the process of trying to disgorge this inflation. . . . It really happened in a big way. It threw all calculations off, all projections off."

Too, Stockman acknowledged how far the Administration has fallen short of goals—even while the President again hails what he claims are signs of recovery. Says Stockman, writing in the fiscal 1984 budget proposal, the projections "vary substantially from the path envisioned in the original economic and budget plan."

What he's saying with that jargon is this is the year the Reagan Administration had promised to balance or almost-balance the budget, and that they're off by a little matter of $200 billion.

Council spells out program of job creation, tax fairness

International solidarity

The Executive Council is briefed on the worldwide activities of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions by ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken. Economic plan charts full employment road

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A major national effort to provide jobs for the unemployed and ease the suffering brought on by the Reagan recession was pressed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its winter meeting here.

A council statement spelled out the ingredients of the AFL-CIO's "Economic Program for Jobs and Fairness," which it said would "put us on the road to full employment" by generating some 900,000 jobs this year and 1.8 million in 1984.

"Needed public services would be expanded," the council said, and "planned public works would be built, low- and moderate-income housing constructed and rehabilitated, more youth trained and placed in jobs and displaced workers assisted."

The package also calls for a new program of extended unemployment insurance to give longer support for the jobless, health insurance protection for the unemployed, and mortgage and rent payment relief for jobless workers faced with foreclosure or eviction.

The council called the token jobs program proposed by the Administration "recognition of the serious problem of unemployment," but only "a small first step."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, at a news conference following adoption of the council's statement, said of the jobs measure taking shape in Congress: "We'll accept anything that is offered that promises to help anyone at all. But we are not satisfied; we will not be satisfied with that, and we continue to press for our full program."

Recovery costs

The total program would require a supplemental appropriation of $22.5 billion in fiscal year 1983 and increase the projected 1984 deficit by $4 billion to $10 billion. But both of these figures would be reduced somewhat by the effects on the budget of employment gains.

And the 1983-84 stimulus programs would produce reductions in the federal deficit of $100 billion in 1985 and $150 billion in 1986, the council estimated.

The council's economic program incorporates recommendations of the AFL-CIO Committee on Defense that increases in military spending over the next several years be held to a range of 5-to-7 percent, with a number of council members urging that the limit be the lower end of that

House panel asks extension of jobless aid

A House Ways & Means subcommittee voted to go beyond Reagan Administration half-measures and expand the supplemental unemployment insurance program.

The federally funded program, which is scheduled to expire on Mar. 31, now provides from eight to 16 weeks of benefits for persons still unemployed after their state payments have run out. The number of weeks of entitlement is linked to the insured unemployment rate in the state.

Under the Administration proposal, the supplemental program would be extended, but workers who have already used up their benefits would not be eligible for any additional weeks of payments. For those newly qualified, eligibility standards would be tightened so as to reduce the number of participants. A voucher plan would be injected into the program to encourage employers to hire the long-term jobless. In effect, it would let them pocket the unused unemployment benefits of workers they hire.

Instead, the subcommittee approved a proposal by Subcommittee Chairman Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), which would take effect on Apr. 1, 1983, when the present program expires.

It would provide additional weeks of

Equitable funding plan urged for social security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The social security system can be strengthened without weakening the separate retirement program for federal and postal employees, the AFL-CIO insisted.

An Executive Council statement affirmed the federation's commitment to social security as "the cornerstone of our national retirement system."

It promised that the AFL-CIO will pursue "a constructive role" in shaping legislation to "deal responsibly" with social security's financial difficulties. And it endorsed all but one of the consensus recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Labor's dissent is on the commission's proposal to cover newly hired postal and federal workers under social security instead of including them in the existing Civil Service Retirement System.

The mandatory coverage is being proposed solely to bring revenue into the social security program, the Executive Council noted, without concern for the effect this might have on the current and future pension rights of federal sector workers.

Until these unanswered questions are resolved, the council said, action on that recommendation should be deferred.

The AFL-CIO proposed instead that the employer share of the social security payroll tax be applied to a company's total payroll, not just the wage base on which the employee share of the tax is levied.

More productive

"This would bring in more revenue than covering federal and postal employees," the council noted.

At Senate Finance Committee hearings in Washington a day after the council action, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray

Defense spending restraint sought

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for a substantial cutback from the 9-10 percent annual increases in defense spending proposed by the Reagan Administration over the next several years and warned that savings in the defense budget should not be sought through pay freezes for the armed forces or civilian personnel.

The Executive Council also renewed its call for a special surtax on corporate and individual income to pay for real increases in defense spending.

These were the three specific recommendations of the AFL-CIO Committee on Defense approved by the council as it received an interim report of the committee.

The council accepted the committee's finding that "taking into account the security, economic and budgetary realities . . . increases in defense spending in the coming years can and should be held within the range of 5 percent to 7 percent a year in real terms, without being detrimental to national security."

Some for less

The report noted that a number of council members "have expressed the strong opinion that the increase should be held to the lower end of this range or below."

On the Administration's proposals to achieve defense budget savings from its earlier projections by freezing pay and cost-of-living adjustments, the council agreed with the committee's assessment that "pay freezes, whether military or civilian, are not the way to achieve defense savings." It warned that such freezes can "adversely affect morale, as well as the recruitment, readiness and retention of military personnel."

On the surtax, the council proposed that it be levied, starting in July 1984, "on the corporate and individual income tax plus the income of the wealthy currently sheltered from taxation," at the rate of ap-

PATRICK J. CAMPBELL

Heads of three unions elected vice presidents of federation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Three new AFL-CIO vice presidents were elected by the Executive Council to fill vacancies caused by death and retirement. In each case, the new council member is from the same union as his predecessor.

William H. Bywater, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, was elected to succeed David J. Fitzmaurice, who died Nov. 12.

Marvin J. Boede, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, replaces the late Martin J. Ward.

Patrick J. Campbell, president of the Carpenters, was chosen to succeed William Konyha and will take his seat when Konyha retires from the council at the conclusion of the current meeting.

Bywater, 62, became IUE president on Nov. 17, 1982, following Fitzmaurice's death. Before that, he had been secretary-treasurer of the union since Jan. 1, 1981.

Bywater became a union member in 1941 when he went to work for Ford Instrument Co., a division of Sperry Rand, at Long Island City, N.Y. After holding a number of offices in IUE Local 425, including seven years as president, he became chairman of the IUE-Sperry Rand Conference Board in 1961. He became a vice president of the union in 1968 as president of IUE District 3 embracing New York and New Jersey.

Boede, 54, became president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters last Oct. 14 after Ward died unexpectedly. He was initiated into Milwaukee Local 601 as an apprentice in 1951 and became a journeyman in 1956. After serving in a number of local union offices, including vice president, Boede became a business agent of Local 601 in 1964 and four years later was elected business manager.

Boede was appointed an international representative of the union in 1975, assigned to Michigan. He moved to the union's Washington headquarters in 1977 when he was appointed assistant general president at Ward's recommendation.

Campbell, 64, became President of the Carpenters last Jan. 1, effective with Konyha's retirement from the post. He is a native of New York City and joined Carpenters Local 964 in Rockland County, N.Y., following World War II service in the Army Air Corps. He was elected president of the local in 1954.

Campbell became an international organizer for the Carpenters in 1955 and two years later was named a general representative. In 1966, he was appointed an assistant to the late Maurice Hutcheson, who then headed the union.

He was elected to the international executive board in 1969, representing District I, and five years later was named second vice president of the union. He became first vice president in 1980, a post he held until he became president of the Carpenters at the beginning of this year.

Mid-East peace keyed to secure Israeli borders

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council expressed strong support for a "free and independent" Lebanon from which all foreign troops have been removed, but stressed that it is "unreasonable" to expect Israel to withdraw without assurances its borders won't be vulnerable to attacks from southern Lebanon.

The council said it was disturbed by statements from the Reagan Administration suggesting that the chief obstacle to withdrawal is Israel even though the Syrians have not agreed to pull out and pockets of Palestine Liberation Organization forces still remain in Lebanon.

The real block to peace in the area is the continuing "refusal of Arab governments, except Egypt, to recognize Israel's right to exist"—coupled with the refusal of Jordan's King Hussein to actively enter the peace process, the council observed.

Weakened resistance

That Arab "intransigence" is delaying serious negotiations on Palestinian autonomy and weakening the Arab nations' ability to resist the spread of Arab "extremism," the council's statement said.

The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its position that peace and resolution of the Palestinian question can only come "through serious negotiations between Israel and her Arab neighbors, with American help" that result in secure borders for Israel.

The council also said the report of the Israeli commission investigating that country's responsibility for the massacre in Beirut—which held that the government failed to act to prevent the killings by Lebanese extremists—"dramatically testifies to the vibrancy of Israeli democracy and underlines the political values at stake."

There has been no similar self-criticism and internal public debate in Lebanon, the council observed, adding "those directly responsible for the massacre, the Christian Phalangists, have displayed shocking moral indifference to this atrocity."

Funding hike supported for social security

Denison said the proposal met the test of equity as well as revenue. As it stands now, he noted, the employer portion of the social security tax takes less of a bite than the tax paid by workers. An employer can deduct the tax as a business expense while employees are not allowed to deduct it.

Denison and AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman also expressed the federation's concern with a proposal that split the bipartisan consensus of the social security commission. Its Republican-appointed members supported phasing in a higher retirement age under social security, starting in the year 2000.

Raising the retirement age amounts to a reduction in benefits, the labor witnesses testified. They noted that raising the normal retirement age from 65 to 66, with the possibility of further increases thereafter, would also compel additional reductions in benefits for those who find it necessary to retire at 62.

Hardship on workers

The Executive Council said the AFL-CIO is "unalterably opposed" to any rise in the eligibility age for social security retirement. "This would break faith with younger workers and would work a particular hardship on the majority of workers forced out of the labor market because of poor health and inability to find jobs," the council declared.

At the Senate hearings, Denison noted also the impact of a higher social security retirement age on private pension plans with benefit structures that take into account anticipated social security payments.

The AFL-CIO testimony urged a "fail-safe" provision to assure that payment of social security benefits would not be endangered by economic swings, such as the severity of the present recession. The council urged temporary general revenue financing in such emergencies.

The council statement also asked that the Social Security Administration be given independent agency status "to insulate it from political manipulation" with rights of beneficiaries written into law.

Other features

The consensus recommendations on social security funding supported by the council included advancing the date of a scheduled rise in the social security tax rate—with a one-time tax credit to offset the loss in take-home pay. Other features included a higher social security tax on self-employed persons, partly offset by a tax deduction, and a one-time six-month delay in the cost-of-living adjustment. It also provides for higher-income retirees to pay income tax on one-half of their social security benefits, representing the employer contribution.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who served on the commission, supported those revenue-raising measures as the way "to make the program secure for present retirees and future generations of workers."

Deceased council members lauded for service to labor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Four former AFL-CIO vice presidents who died in recent months were memorialized by the federation's Executive Council.

The council called former Ladies' Garment Workers President David Dubinsky, who died Sept. 17, 1982, at the age of 90, "one of the giants of American labor."

Dubinsky, the council said, was "one of the most innovative thinkers ever to apply himself to workers' needs in pension and welfare," and was a pioneer in urging trade unions to become deeply involved in legislation, political action, public relations and union staff training.

The council praised former Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers President David J. Fitzmaurice for his contributions to the advancement of collective bargaining and particularly to coordinated bargaining.

Fitzmaurice's death Nov. 12, 1982, at age 69 deprived the cause of trade unionism of "a tireless proponent of economic justice," the council said.

Former Carpenters President Maurice A. Hutcheson was "an indispensable architect" of the growth and achievements of his union, the council declared.

Hutcheson made "memorable contributions" to the eventual merger of the AFL and CIO, and to the cause of craft cooperation during his leadership of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., the council said. Hutcheson, 85, died Jan. 9.

With the death of former Plumbers & Pipe Fitters President Martin J. Ward Oct. 9, 1982, at 64, the council lost "one of its wisest and most respected voices," the statement observed.

Ward was "one of the most knowledgeable and forceful proponents of the apprenticeship system," and he extended his influence "and deep sense of trade unionism" world wide in his work as chairman of the council's international affairs committee, the statement said.

Patrick Tyson appointed to No. 2 post at OSHA

Patrick R. Tyson has been named deputy assistant secretary for occupational safety and health at the Labor Dept. He succeeds Mark Cowan, who became chief of staff for Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan in October.

Tyson joined the Labor Dept. in 1973 as a lawyer in the solicitor's office and later headed OSHA's federal compliance and state programs.

range or below. This compares with Administration proposals for defense spending increases of 9-to-10 percent a year. (Story, Page 1.)

The lower rate of increase would result in cuts of $3 billion to $5 billion in defense outlays and up to $14 billion in military authorizations in 1984 plus savings of $23 billion to $47 billion in outlays and $78 billion in authorizations over the ensuing three years, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Also part of the economic program is the defense committee's recommendation that any increase in real spending for defense be paid for with a surtax on corporate and individual income.

The council urged Congress to reject the Administration's proposal for some $19.4 billion in further budget cuts for non-defense programs, such as job training, education, housing, Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps and child nutrition. It also rejected the President's announced plan to achieve defense savings by freezing the pay and cost-of-living benefits of the armed forces and civilian employees of the Defense Dept.

Policy approval

Approval of the economic program and the recommendations of the defense committee were the major policy actions taken by the council at its early sessions.

The meeting opened with memorial tributes to two federation vice presidents, Martin J. Ward and David J. Fitzmaurice, and two retired council members, David Dubinsky and Maurice Hutcheson, all of whom had died since the council's August meeting. In another statement, the council noted with sadness the recent death of Otto Kersten, who had been general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions since 1972.

To fill the two vacant vice presidencies, the council elected William H. Bywater, who succeeded Fitzmaurice as president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Marvin J. Boede, who became president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters following Ward's death.

A retirement

In addition, Patrick J. Campbell, who became president of the Carpenters on the retirement of William Konyha last Jan. 1, was chosen to succeed Konyha as an AFL-CIO vice president upon Konyha's retirement from the council at the end of the current meeting.

John Vanderveken, who succeeded Kersten as general secretary of the ICFTU, was introduced to the council by Kirkland and reviewed the organization's progress since the reaffiliation of the AFL-CIO.

Another guest was Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), who as a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination exchanged views with council members in an hour-long discussion. Another prospective candidate, Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.), was scheduled to meet with the council at a later session. Two others, Senators John Glenn (D-Ohio) and Gary Hart (D-Colo.), appeared at the council's meeting in New York last August.

The meetings with candidates are part of a program initiated by Kirkland to sound out prospective candidates and give them an opportunity to present their case to federation leaders in preparation for a decision on a pre-primary endorsement by the AFL-CIO next December.

International affairs

Besides the interim report of the defense committee presented by Vice President John H. Lyons, the council heard a report by Vice President Thomas W. Gleason, who succeeded Ward as chairman of the committee on international affairs, and by Irving Brown, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs.

Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald presented an analysis of the current state of the economy in advance of the council's action on its economic program.

In other statements involving economic and social issues, the council called for congressional action to establish a fair trade policy, urged re-establishment of authority for selective credit controls to help bring down interest rates, and endorsed all but one of the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform, urging specific protections for federal and postal employees before social security coverage is broadened to this area.

On international matters, the council adopted statements dealing with events in Poland, the Middle East, Suriname and South Africa, and on the forthcoming 1983 economic summit conference.

Tax measures

The statement on the council's economic program outlined a series of tax reforms to help pay for the new job initiatives and the preservation of existing social programs. The council called specifically for a $700 cap on the individual income tax cut slated for fiscal 1983 along with the repeal of future indexing of tax rates. It also urged the closing of a number of loopholes that benefit particularly wealthy individuals and corporations.

A background paper accompanying the statement presented detailed proposals for job-creating measures and aid to the unemployed:

- A large-scale community development jobs program to be fully funded by the federal government for jobs on local government payrolls.

Lane Kirkland fields reporters' questions between council sessions.

- An expanded program of accelerated public works, building on the start made by the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982.
- A program to support construction of 170,000 new housing units a year.
- Expansion of the Job Corps, establishment of a new youth conservation corps. and other employment and training projects to alleviate the special problems of jobless youth.
- Supplemental funds allocated under the new Job Training Partnership Act's program to help workers hit by plant closings and major layoffs, developing a variety of pre-layoff assistance and services as well as training to help these workers move back into regular jobs.
- A new permanent program of supplemental unemployment benefits with a maximum duration of at least 65 weeks to meet the needs of the long-term jobless, including more than 5 million who have exhausted their regular benefits.
- A federal program to assure health care coverage for jobless workers and their families, most of whom lose their insurance protection within a month after layoff yet are denied Medicaid assistance because they have not been poor long enough to meet state eligibility criteria.

On recovery

Kirkland, in response to questions raised by reporters at his news conferences, commented on a variety of topics:

- On the prospects for recovery from recession, "I don't expect any long-run improvement in the economy, absent a significant change in the policies that are driving it. . . . There will probably be some indicators that are going to show some recovery. The question—the real question—is its extent and durability."
- Persistence of the unemployment rate above 10 percent over the next two years as the Administration projects would leave the country in a "recession-depression, and there would be no recovery. I don't think you can have any sort of a recovery or any improvement in the health of this country based on massive unemployment . . . Unemployment doesn't breed recovery; it breeds further unemployment."

Labor will be heard

- Labor's endorsement of a candidate for the presidency will be made with the hope that it will have a major effect on the outcome. "If we did not feel that it might or that our role in American political life was not important, then it would hardly be worth the effort that we put into it. I'm under no illusion that we can, or ought to, dominate American political life. . . . The political process in a democracy is a chorus of voices. We simply want to make absolutely certain that not only the sopranos and the altos but the basses and baritones are in that chorus as well, so that we have the proper degree of harmony and it is not tilted in favor of interests that are hostile to working people."
- "The Administration has effectively shattered what had emerged as a consensus in this country in support of an increased defense effort. It shattered it by exempting the rich from any share of that burden of cost by giving them an enormous and irresponsible tax cut, stripping the coffers of this country of the revenues needed to support a defense effort as well as other responsibilities of the government, and imposing that heavy burden on the least privileged in our society by dismantling programs that had been developed over the years to give them some helping hand, to give them a break in life, an opportunity to get schooling and a job, and to relieve their distress in times of suffering."

Tighter limit urged on defense spending rise

proximately 3 percent in its first year. This would raise about $11 billion to $15 billion, the council estimated.

The Committee on Defense said in its report that holding defense spending to real growth rates of 5-to-7 percent a year would reduce actual outlays by $3 billion to $5 billion and spending authority by $3 billion to $14 billion for fiscal year 1984.

"A strong national defense can only be sustained by a strong national economy and by budgetary policies that fairly distribute the defense burden," the committee declared. "In the absence of such policies, defense spending cannot enjoy broad political support.

Dual considerations

"We are therefore compelled to assess defense spending not only in the context of national security, but in the economic and budgetary context imposed upon us by the Reagan Administration, which includes massive tax cuts amounting to revenue losses of $877 billion from 1982 through 1988.

"A budget which proposes to increase defense spending by 9-10 percent in real terms while cutting social spending by 3 percent, in the wake of earlier severe cuts, does not meet the test of fairness—or of national security. It would shift the defense burden to those least able to bear it, thus jeopardizing the base of social cohesion and political unity which a strong national defense requires.

Welfare and defense

"As the AFL-CIO has repeatedly reminded this Administration, the Constitution proclaims that the purpose of our government is to "promote the general welfare" and to "provide for the common defense"—not to choose between the two, and not to sacrifice either on the altar of economic theory."

The committee's major recommendations were incorporated into the economic policy statement subsequently adopted by the Executive Council, in which it set forth the federation's program for job creation and fairness in the government's tax and budget policies.

AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons, who is chairman of the defense committee, noted in his summary for the council that the panel has met 16 times since it was formed a year ago, has heard 25 defense experts, observed military exercises in this country and sent a delegation to tour NATO facilities in Britain.

Among the committee's broad conclusions as set forth in its interim report to the council are:

- A massive Soviet military build-up in the 1970s has eliminated clear-cut U.S. strategic nuclear superiority.
- The Soviet Union's increased ability to project its military power far from its own borders "poses a potential threat" to U.S. interests and to vital sea lanes.
- U.S. reliance on nuclear weapons to deter a conventional attack instead of matching Soviet conventional forces "has produced an imbalance in the Western military posture which should be redressed."

Stay with triad

- The triad of land, air and sea-based U.S. weapons systems should be maintained.
- "We remain to be convinced—and are open to argument—that an acceptable basing mode for the MX (missile) can be devised."
- "Until nuclear weapons can be abolished altogether, accurate counterforce weapons—that is, weapons capable of destroying other weapons—are preferable to weapons systems that can only be used effectively against population centers."

Nuts and bolts

- While much of the defense debate has centered on the value and affordability of "big ticket" weapons systems, "the most seriously neglected aspect of national defense in the last decade has been the nuts and bolts of our military capability."
- Improvements are needed in operations and maintenance, mobility, training and procurement procedures.
- The decline of the U.S. merchant fleet from 1,400 to 500 ships over the past 30 years while the Soviet merchant marine has increased five-fold to 8,000 vessels is a cause of serious concern.
- The erosion of the U.S. industrial base could result in bottlenecks in some industries as defense procurements mount, generating inflationary pressures that otherwise would not arise.

Failing policies assailed

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) at the executive board meeting of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. denounced Reagan Administration policies that have thrown millions of Americans out of work.

Coordinated effort stressed to combat worldwide slump

Bal Harbour, Fla. — This year's economic summit conference of the leading industrialized nations offers participants a golden opportunity to develop domestic and international economic strategy to deal with the worldwide slump, the AFL-CIO declared.

"The worsening world economic, financial, and monetary crisis underscores the great need for international economic measures and agreements, especially among the industrialized nations," the Executive Council said in a statement.

"No nation can return to prosperity alone. There must be equitable international burden-sharing based on jointly spelled-out monetary, fiscal, industrial, investment, energy and employment policies. These policies should be developed through appropriate machinery involving labor, management, and government."

The seventh annual summit meeting of the United States and six other big, free-market countries will be held in May at Williamsburg, Va.

Joint solutions needed

The council warned that the meeting of the seven leading industrial democracies must not be used once again for the repetition of cliches instead of joint efforts to solve critical economic issues.

The AFL-CIO has proposed to previous summit meetings, both through the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development and through its own recommendations, a whole set of policies concerning jobs, investment, energy, industrial reconstruction, international trade, and development.

Over 30 million people, a third or more of them Americans, are jobless in the two dozen countries that make up the OECD. TUAC has estimated that unless an internationally coordinated recovery is achieved, the number of unemployed is likely to rise to 40 million by the end of 1983.

The "alarming" events of the past few months demonstrate the need to address unsolved international financial issues, the council said.

"The international monetary chaos is one of the major factors of this protracted and worsening economic recession, and has reached a point where it can undermine the policies pursued in any other sector of the world economy," the council declared.

It warned that the present system of floating exchange rates undermines international cooperation in the monetary field and contributes to inflation, especially through the volatile fluctuations of exchange rates. Currency warfare has thus been added to trade warfare as one of its strategic elements, it said.

"If the International Monetary Fund goes on indiscriminately imposing on the debtor countries drastic reductions of their imports, the industrialized nations—from whom the finance for the rescue operations must ultimately come one way or another—will lose export markets," the AFL-CIO warned.

About one-third of American exports go to the developing countries. It is in these countries that the badly needed expansion of export markets can most easily be achieved, the council observed.

Kersten remembered as ICFTU's leader

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council praised the accomplishments of Otto Kersten, the late general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Kersten, who died last November, served for a decade in the ICFTU's top post, "where he accomplished one of his longstanding goals in the reaffiliation of the AFL-CIO" in 1981, the council said. He devoted his life to the labor movement in Germany, working with European trade union secretariats and as deputy chairman of the international and European committees of the German Trade Union Federation, the council statement observed.

Maritime Trades

Revived U.S.-flag fleet tops legislation agenda

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A broad legislative program aimed at restoring the health of the American merchant fleet was given fresh impetus by the executive board of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. at its winter meeting here.

More than 200 representatives of MTD affiliates approved 45 statements encompassing economic and special policies as well as maritime issues. The board also received reports from the department's officers: President Frank Drozak, Vice President Stephen J. Leslie and Executive Sec.-Treas. Jean Ingrao.

Centerpiece of the MTD program is the proposed Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act introduced by Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.) and cosponsored by 45 House members. This measure would require that a fair share of the bulk cargoes in U.S. foreign trade be carried by American-flag ships, starting at 5 percent of such cargoes in 1984 and gradually increasing to at least 20 percent by 1999.

The MTD said passage of the bill would create a demand for construction of 158 new bulk-cargo vessels in American shipyards over the next 15 years.

Positive measure

"This would have a positive impact not only on shipyards, but also on this nation's basic industries such as mining, steel and manufacturing," the statement stressed. It estimated that the measure would result in the direct creation of about 13,000 jobs in shipyards and aboard ship while preserving some 200,000 additional jobs in maritime-related industries. The bill would thus generate new federal and state tax revenues and would also help reduce the U.S. balance of payments deficit.

The statement also cited the legislation's importance to national security in building up a bulk-carrier fleet capable of serving as a military auxiliary in time of national emergency.

The two-day meeting of the MTD board was punctuated with sharp criticism of the Reagan Administration's policies by nearly every speaker.

Drozak charged that "Reaganomics is not working" and is "killing the American maritime industry." He condemned Reagan's action in eliminating funds for construction differential subsidies while encouraging operators to continue ship construction abroad.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assailed the Administration for again proposing to sell Alaskan oil to Japan, "violating the solemn commitment to secure the benefits of the Alaska pipeline for the exclusive use of the American people."

High priority

Kirkland also charged that the Administration's refusal to support "a measure of justice" in cargo allocation through bilateral agreements with other nations "is a serious injury to American interests." He said the MTD's efforts to win corrective action "will be high on the list of legislative priorities of the AFL-CIO and the entire labor movement."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., denounced the Administration for two years of policies that have brought "the strongest economy in the world to the point where soup kitchens are running out of food and hundreds of thousands of Americans are living in cars and shanty towns." O'Neill outlined a program to begin putting the jobless back to work, bring down interest rates, encourage industrial investment, and establish fairness in foreign trade.

"We will balance the budget when we have full employment," the Speaker declared. "We want a recovery budget, not a hard times budget. We want a fair budget, not a budget that breaks the backs of the poor."

Congressional speakers

Other congressional leaders addressing the MTD board meeting included the chairman and vice chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, Representatives Walter B. Jones (D-N.C.) and Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.); Senate Minority Whip Alan Cranston (D-Calif.); House & Ways Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.); Rep. Don Bonker (D-Wash.); Rep. Joe Moakley (D-Mass.).

Among other speakers were Rafael Hernandez Colon, former governor of Puerto Rico who is again the Democratic candidate for that office, and the directors of four AFL-CIO headquarters departments: Rudy Oswald, Economic Research; Ray Denison, Legislation; John Perkins, COPE, and Alan Kistler, Organization & Field Services.

Poland's union-busting condemned

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO will continue to assist the banned Polish free labor movement, Solidarnosc, in any way it deems helpful and to oppose any relaxation of sanctions against the communist governments of Poland and the Soviet Union.

An Executive Council statement also urged the United States to declare Poland in default of its debts to American lenders and to halt the flow of credits to East European nations until Polish workers are given the freedom to create and control their own unions.

Solidarnosc's temporary coordinating commission in Poland sent AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland a telegram expressing appreciation for the support the federation has given Polish workers since the union's inception two and a half years ago.

"We are particularly grateful to you for considering our peaceful struggle for the respect of basic human rights, democratic freedoms, and trade union rights in Poland as a universal matter of importance to all working men and women around the world," Director Jerzy Milewski of the Solidarnosc coordinating office said.

Misleading ploy

The council described the "suspension" of martial law in Poland last December as "a hollow gesture" designed to persuade world opinion that the military regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski has relaxed its repression of the Polish people.

"The repression continues with Soviet encouragement," the council said in its statement. "Many of the worst features of martial law have been institutionalized in civil law. Mines and factories have been militarized, workers subjected to military discipline and denied the right to leave their jobs. Cases involving 'public order and security' are now tried by military courts."

Held in isolation

At a press conference here, Kirkland provided an example of the continuing repression in Poland. A letter from the wife of Edmund Baluka, imprisoned for more than a year in an isolation cell in Szczecin for his activities in connection with Solidarnosc, urged Kirkland to use his office to press for his release.

Now residing in Paris, Francoise Baluka wrote Kirkland that "the Polish authorities have decided to use all means in order to break Edmund's resistance." Baluka, who has been on a hunger strike since Jan. 23, refuses to sign a loyalty oath or to request voluntary exile.

Kirkland told reporters that Baluka is in poor health "and, indeed, we don't really know whether he's still alive, nor do we know how many others are suffering similar treatment at the hands of the Jaruzelski regime.

"As we note in our statement," Kirkland said, "a regime capable of such behavior does not deserve to be underwritten and reinforced by the savings of American workers in the hands of American bankers."

While Solidarity leader Lech Walesa and several hundred other detainees have been released, between 5,000 and 10,000 other political prisoners remain in jail under one-to-ten-year sentences, the council pointed out. Trials and imprisonment of Solidarnosc activists continue, and leaders of KOR, the Committee for Self-Defense in Poland, who were former advisers to the Polish free labor movement, are also threatened with jail and possible execution.

"The AFL-CIO stands with the workers of Poland and with the only trade union movement they have freely chosen—Solidarnosc," the council declared.

Phony unions

The council said that Poland's new labor code outlawing Solidarnosc establishes a "phony" trade structure and in effect denies workers the right to strike. The function of these government-decreed "unions" is not to represent the workers but to "cooperate with management to improve national production," the statement said.

"The new 'unions' are being boycotted by the vast majority of Polish workers, who maintain their allegiance to Solidarnosc, which continues its struggle underground," the council stressed in its statement.

Job drain linked to flawed trade policy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—American workers are losing jobs and U.S. companies are losing sales because of unrealistic trade and investment policies, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

It pointed with alarm to a record $47.8 billion U.S. trade deficit last year and the possibility that this might double in 1983.

"Other nations restrict U.S. products while pushing their own exports into the United States," the council said. Meanwhile, "the Reagan Administration ignores these facts and continues to make speeches about free trade."

The AFL-CIO statement suggested moving the debate over trade away from outdated labels of "free trade" and "protectionism."

Workers' risk

It acknowledged "the vital importance of trade" to the U.S. economy, but called for recognition of the risks to workers and industries.

Job-destroying imports have been encouraged in the guise of enabling developing countries to repay loans from the International Monetary Fund, the council noted. Communist countries have erected barter systems that flout the concept of international trade. Global firms and banks "all too often collaborate with nations that are waging economic warfare against the United States," the Executive Council charged.

Pricing U.S. out

It called on the Federal Reserve Board to drop tight-money policies that have driven up the exchange value of the dollar so as to price U.S. exports out of international markets and give imports a big advantage in the domestic market.

The council statement reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to trade and tax aspects of the Administration's Caribbean Basin Initiative that threatens U.S. jobs. It affirmed labor's opposition to export of Alaskan oil and critical technologies. And it said at least a portion of U.S. raw material exports, such as grain and logs, should be processed in this country before being shipped abroad.

Trade adjustment assistance for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by increased imports should be restored, not scrapped entirely, the council urged. It asked improved and better-enforced Buy American laws and asked "realistic reciprocity" with other nations that would deal with unfair trade practices as well as tariffs.

The council voted to support a new legislative effort to strengthen the role of the International Trade Commission.

It said the ITC should be required "to evaluate more accurately and quickly the impact of imports upon an industry and its workers" and to fashion a remedy. The ITC's determinations "should not be overturned by the President except with the explicit agreement of Congress," the council said.

Recommendations

To deal with specific problems of industries hard-hit by imports, the Executive Council affirmed the AFL-CIO's support for:

- Domestic content legislation "which would assure that the United States has an automotive products industry, including parts and components of cars."

The labor-endorsed Fair Practices in Automotive Products bill, which passed the House in the last Congress, would require that companies which sell large numbers of cars in the United States produce a fair share of the parts and components in this country so as to provide jobs for American workers.

Merchant fleet

- A Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding bill that would require an initial 5 percent of all waterborne cargoes to be carried in U.S.-flag vessels, increasing by 1 percent a year until 20 percent of all U.S. bulk tonnage is shipped on American-flag vessels built in the United States.

- A "sense of Congress resolution" asserting the need to stem "the massive influx of job-destroying imports of garments."

The Executive Council statement called in effect for a change of course "to establish a fair trade policy" that will enable a strong America to continue to cooperate with its trading partners.

"This nation needs a policy to assure a healthy and diversified economy that offers work opportunities to all job seekers," the council insisted.

Rollback in interest rates termed vital for recovery

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A further reduction in interest rates is essential to stimulate sustained economic recovery, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement calling on Congress to take needed measures.

"To bring down interest rates and get the economy out of the strait jacket of across-the-board, tight monetary policies, a supplementary tool is needed," the council said.

Selective controls

That tool is the type of credit controls used successfully by the Carter Administration in 1980 under the now-expired Credit Control Act of 1969, the council said. It urged Congress to re-establish authority for selective credit controls to supplement general monetary policy.

"The nation cannot fully recover from the current deep recession until changes in monetary policy allow interest rates to come down further," the council said.

Real interest rates remain two to three times above historic levels, even though they have receded from the highest levels of the last three years, the council observed. Consumer-loan and home-mortgage rates have declined far less than the prime rate charged by banks.

With inflation at about a 4-percent annual rate, consumers are paying 12 to 22 percent for most loans, home mortgages are 12 to 14 percent, and prime rates are 11 percent. The best commercial customers get lower rates.

Tight-money results

"The tight-money policy pursued by the Federal Reserve Board, with the active encouragement of the Reagan Administration, helped push the economy into a prolonged recession," the AFL-CIO charged, adding that the punishing debt-service burdens inflicted by high interest rates have been a major factor in the commercial and industrial business failures and personal bankruptcies of the past three years.

Soaring financing costs have frozen millions of Americans out of the consumer markets, particularly the housing and auto markets. At the same time, new capital investment has been stymied and needed investments in public facilities have been curtailed. Debt-servicing costs have become a major part of federal expenditures, the council pointed out, with the result that budget deficits are at an all-time record, the economy is in deep recession, and unemployment is massive.

Effect of strong dollar

Another effect of the extraordinarily high interest rates has been to increase the international exchange value of the dollar relative to the currencies of America's trading partners, the statement observed. Between January 1981 and January 1983, the dollar rose by 29 percent against other world currencies. That meant a sharp drop in the price of foreign imports while the price of American exports rose abroad.

The council noted that credit controls are a part of Japan's basic monetary policy, and have been used successfully by other industrialized nations to implement their national economic policies.

The federation also renewed its call for changes in the membership of the Federal Reserve Board and its district bank boards to assure representation of workers, farmers, and consumers. The agency is dominated by banking interests unresponsive to workers and less well-to-do Americans, organized labor has long held.

Constitution plan for South Africa scored as racist

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO declared its opposition to constitutional proposals by the South African government headed by Prime Minister P. W. Botha, saying their enactment would totally exclude blacks and perpetuate their status as aliens and outcasts in the land of their birth.

The Executive Council adopted a statement supporting the position taken by Chief Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi, leader of Inkatha, the largest liberation movement in South Africa.

"No sane person can really believe that any setup in South Africa which excludes the largest segment of South African people, the Africans, can last or succeed," Buthelezi has said. He is the co-recipient of the 1982 George Meany Human Rights Award.

The council said it will continue to aid Buthelezi's efforts to build a multiracial democracy with full trade union rights for blacks.

The proposed constitution would entrench and perpetuate South Africa's system of apartheid, with its discrimination based on race and color. Botha's government, responding to international criticism, has proposed replacement of the current all-white parliament with a three-chambered legislature — one each for whites, Indians and people of mixed race, known as coloreds.

But the basic tenets of apartheid would remain intact—and whites would still remain firmly in control, with blacks totally excluded from meaningful participation.

Buy union, create jobs

Strategies to help create jobs through the promotion of union-made products and union services and a program to publicize the damage done to the economy by excessive imports are discussed at the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. executive board meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla. Seated, from left, are Union Label President James Hatfield and Sec.-Treas. John Mara and, standing, Vice Presidents Rene Rondou and Kenneth Brown.

Dotson wins confirmation as chairman of labor board

The Senate confirmed by voice vote President Reagan's nomination of Donald Dotson as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

Dotson was a management lawyer before becoming Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations at the start of the Reagan Administration, and he was the President's second choice for the NLRB chairmanship.

Reagan's first choice, John Van de Water, was unable to win Senate confirmation and left the post after serving for 16 months under interim appointments. The AFL-CIO had fought his appointment, citing "smoking gun" evidence of Van de Water's union-busting role as a management consultant.

The AFL-CIO didn't testify against Dotson because the case against him wasn't solidly documented, but Federation President Lane Kirkland expressed "grave reservations" about the selection of a management partisan to protect workers' rights under federal labor law.

Reagan is now expected to formally submit the nomination of Patricia Diaz Dennis, also a management attorney, to the remaining NLRB vacancy. Her confirmation would give Reagan appointees a 3-2 majority on the labor board. His first appointee, Robert P. Hunter, joined the board in 1981.

The White House announced last November the President's choice of Dennis, a nominal Democrat who is a labor relations attorney for the American Broadcasting Co. But the President held up the submission of her name pending the confirmation of Dotson.

John C. Miller, an aide to Van de Water who has been nominated as general counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, has been serving as NLRB chairman under a recess appointment. Van de Water, meanwhile, has moved to the Labor Dept. as a special assistant to Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan.

On the Senate Labor Committee, three of the 18 members abstained on Dotson's confirmation—Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. (R-Conn.), Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) and Spark M. Matsunaga (D-Hawaii). The Senate then approved the nomination routinely, without debate.

At the Labor Dept., Dotson had picked for his executive assistant a former attorney for the anti-labor National Right to Work Committee.

Letter Carriers protest

Some 3,000 Letter Carriers delivered a message to Congress protesting a proposal to switch new postal and federal workers to the social security system. Following a legislative rally, they visited members of Congress. NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto reinforced their protest in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee.

benefits for persons who at that time had used up all or part of their benefits under the old program. If still jobless, they would be entitled to an additional six to 10 weeks of supplemental benefits, depending on the insured unemployment rate in their states.

Persons who exhaust all state or federal-state extended benefits after Apr. 1 would be entitled to eight to 16 weeks of payments, depending on the state jobless rate, along the lines of present law. The Ford plan would not include the labor-opposed provisions of the Administration bill.

Bipartisan challenge

In the Senate, there were signs that the Administration can't count on automatic support from the Republican majority. At a Senate Appropriations Committee hearing, Office of Management & Budget Director David Stockman found some Republican conservatives challenging the Administration's proposals as vigorously as liberal Democrats.

Sen. Mark Andrews (R-N.D.) charged the Administration with viewing child nutrition programs only in terms of the "dollar signs." And Sen. Alfonse M. D'Amato (R-N.Y.) termed the Administration's attempt to cut back on mass transit subsidies "repulsive and blatant disregard for the will of Congress."

Social security

In another high-priority legislative area, a House Ways & Means subcommittee on social security reached agreement on a legislative package that will still require approval from the full committee.

It incorporates virtually intact the consensus recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform—including the mandatory coverage of new federal and postal workers to which the AFL-CIO objected.

The subcommittee's closest votes were over additional measures to remedy anticipated funding problems reaching into the next century.

Voting along party lines, the subcommittee rejected the Republican proposal to raise the "normal" social security retirement age from 65 to 66. It then adopted a compromise that committee Democrats had approved in caucus to schedule a small rise in the social security tax for the year 2015 and trim back the formula for computing benefits slightly in an eight-year phase-in, starting in the year 2000.

The subcommittee also approved, over Republican objections, a "fail-safe" provision allowing the social security system to borrow from general revenue funds to meet any temporary shortages. Any borrowed money would have to be repaid within two years.

Anti-union employer group loses court appeal of disclosure order

Chicago—A federal appellate court has ruled that an anti-union employers group must disclose its labor relations activities in a report to the Labor Dept.

A 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals panel upheld by a 2-1 margin a lower court ruling ordering the Master Printers Association to report the names of its member-companies and disclose its financial relationship with them as required by the Landrum-Griffin Act.

It rejected MPA's contention that it should only have to report direct, "persuader" activities. The judges agreed with the Labor Dept. that under the law, MPA's direct, "persuader" contact with employees of some of its members triggered requirements to report on all other indirect labor relations activities as well.

The employer association of 800 non-union printers offers advice on "union avoidance," including literature, seminars and related programs, the court said.

The Labor Dept. ordered the full disclosure following incidents in 1976 when an executive of MPA gave anti-union speeches to employees at three member-companies.

Fails to comply

Then-Labor Sec. Ray Marshall ordered MPA to report the names and disbursement records of all other MPA employers who had received labor relations advice, regardless of whether they had received "persuader" services. MPA supplied the information about the three employers but refused to comply with the rest of the order.

The appeals court adopted what it called "the excellent option" of U.S. District Judge Prentice H. Marshall.

That district court opinion stressed that Congress gave the Labor Dept. broad authority to require reporting on management use of anti-union services because it "did not look favorably on the activity of outside consultants and believed they frequently engaged in practices of questionable legality."

Receipts and disbursements for all clients who receive any labor relations advice from a consultant must be reported if the consultant engages in any persuader activity, the court said. It ruled that to be exempt from this provision of the law, "a consulting firm must confine itself solely to non-persuader activity."

The court also rejected MPA's arguments that the full disclosure requirement interfered with free speech and would have a "chilling" effect on the association's activities.

The reporting and disclosure law, the court said, does not inhibit free speech by either employers or consultants but only requires disclosure of the names and financial arrangements of those "who engage in a certain type of activity."

The opinion stressed that even a "chill" placed on MPA's anti-union activities could be justified.

"We deal here with the unique and pervasively regulated area of labor relations law," the court said, in which "Congress has set out one of the most detailed legislative and administrative frameworks in our history to promote the free flow of commerce and replace the economic warfare of the 19th Century with a system designed to encourage industrial peace. The Supreme Court has recognized that even first amendment rights may be required to yield to the special interests of the labor relations field."

Employee rights

Judge Marshall's opinion, adopted by the appellate court, emphasized that employer "free speech" must be made in the context of a labor relations setting, and "an employer's rights cannot outweigh the equal rights of the employees to associate freely."

The record is "replete," it said, with evidence that Congress, when it framed the disclosure law, believed union-busting middlemen were working with employers to keep workers from exercising their rights to organize. Their activities have included "spending large sums of money behind the scenes or through committees to distribute distorted information," setting up company unions, "and other practices that Congress felt were unethical if not illegal."

While all "persuader" activity is not illegal, the court said, the disclosure of it "permits employees in a labor setting, like voters in an election, to understand the sources of the information being distributed."

Congress looked at management persuaders as "inherently suspect, and at their activities as subject to abuse" in an extremely sensitive area, the decision noted, so the publicity of disclosure is a justifiable way of "discouraging potential abuse where there is a demonstrated propensity for such abuse."

Consultants have a demonstrated "track record of illict conduct" and there is only a fine line between persuader and non-persuader activity, and Congress intended for the law to "keep an eye on" anyone engaged in persuasion, the court held.

Not covered by law

The Landrum-Griffin Act doesn't concern persuasion itself, the court pointed out, but only the known tendency of persuaders "to engage in unfair labor practices."

It would be "less than effective" if it let management consultants "be entirely free from public scrutiny where they are able to couch their function as 'advice' rather than persuasion," the district court and the appellate court majority concluded.

Glass union pacts set industry pattern

Media, Pa.—The Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers ratified new three-year contracts with eight glass manufacturers providing substantial wage and fringe benefit improvements and job security for nearly 30,000 workers.

The contracts, which become effective Apr. 1, are expected to set a pattern for the entire glass container industry. Contract talks are in progress with five other glass companies.

Biggest firm

The largest company to settle with the GPPAW is Owens-Illinois, the world's largest glass container manufacturer. The conglomerate employs nearly 12,000 GPPAW members at two dozen plants across the country.

Other companies reaching agreement were Brockway Glass Corp., Midland Glass Co., Thatcher Glass Manufacturing Co., Foster-Forbes Division of National Can Co., Glass Container Corp., Ball Corp., and Kerr Glass Manufacturing Co.

The new contracts raise hourly pay, which had averaged $8.84, by 25 cents immediately, 20 cents in September, and 30 cents in both April 1984 and April 1985. In addition, skilled workers will receive an additional 28 cents an hour in the first year.

The contracts also call for cost-of-living adjustments payable at the start of the second and third years of the agreements. Hourly pay will rise by 1 cent for each five-tenths of a point rise in the government's consumer price index beginning when the CPI climbs above a benchmark set each March. The union said that the formula is the equivalent of a COL increase when the nation's annual inflation rate exceeds 3 percent.

Fringe benefits

Other contract improvements were made in the areas of pensions, insurance coverage, and job protections in the event of layoffs.

GPPAW President James E. Hatfield described the contract as "proof that labor can win a good contract despite a faltering economy." The union, formerly the Glass Bottle Blowers Association, merged with the Pottery Workers last year.

Employment security gains include 90 days' pay if 90 days' notice of a shutdown cannot be given, extension of recall rights from two to five years, continuation of insurance coverage for six months after layoff, and agreement to negotiate severance provisions in the event of plant closings.

Wider coverage

Insurance improvements include a $3,000 increase in life insurance coverage to a range of $16,000 to $18,000, a $30 increase in weekly sickness and accident benefits to a range of $160 to $180, improved dental coverage.

Negotiations now under way are with Anchor Hocking Glass Corp., Diamond Glass Co., Glenshaw Glass Co., Chattanooga Glass Co., and Indian Head, Inc., which together employ another 7,000 to 9,000 GPPAW members.

The Starting Place

MARCH 4TH is the 50th anniversary of an event that launched a transformation of life in the United States.

It was the first inaugural address of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In that dark time with nearly 13 million unemployed, Roosevelt declared:

"Our greatest primary task is to put people to work. This is no unsolvable problem if we face it wisely and courageously. It can be accomplished in part by direct recruiting by the government itself, treating the task as we would treat the emergency of war, but at the same time, through this employment, accomplishing greatly needed projects to stimulate and reorganize the use of our natural resources."

Jobs were the starting place of national recovery from stagnation and despair. Don't let anybody tell you that the New Deal programs were a failure. They were not. We are living today off the social, economic and moral capital created in that period.

No program and no Administration in history ever made so great a contribution to social and economic stability, to family security, and to human hope for progress.

Years later, looking back on that beginning, FDR wrote:

"For many months the people had looked to government for help, and government had looked away. I promised a program of action: first to put people to work; and second, to correct the abuses in many fields of human endeavor which had in great measure contributed to the crisis."

The people are again looking to their government for help, and government is again looking away. In the White House is not a Roosevelt, but a throwback to his predecessors, a disciple of Harding, Coolidge and Hoover, whose policies brought on the Great Depression.

We are looking to the Congress for the vision and the priorities that Roosevelt gave to the nation then.

With Poland's Workers

THE "SUSPENSION" of martial law in Poland is a hollow gesture.

The repression continues with Soviet encouragement. Many of the worst features of martial law have been institutionalized in civil law. Mines and factories have been militarized, workers subjected to military discipline and denied the right to leave their jobs.

The new "Labor Code" outlaws Solidarnosc, establishes a phony trade union structure, and in effect denies the right to strike. The function of these government-decreed "unions" is not to represent the workers but to "cooperate with management to improve national production." The new "unions" are being boycotted by the vast majority of Polish workers, who maintain their allegiance to Solidarnosc, which continues its struggle underground.

Although Lech Walesa and several hundred detainees have been released, between 5,000 and 10,000 other political prisoners remain in jail under one-to-ten year sentences.

The AFL-CIO stands with the workers of Poland and with the only trade union movement they have freely chosen—Solidarnosc. In cooperation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, we will continue to assist Solidarnosc in any way its leaders deem helpful, and to protest the Polish government's blatant violations of the conventions of the International Labor Organization.

Meanwhile, we shall continue to oppose any relaxation of sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union. The AFL-CIO reiterates its demand that the Polish debt be declared in default and that the flow of credits to the Eastern bloc be halted until the workers of Poland have the freedom to create and control their own unions.

'This Is Protectionism?'

Washington Window

Job safety agency caters to business just like EPA

By Press Associates, Inc.

The festering scandal at the Environmental Protection Agency produced an internal memo with clear fingerprints. It called the business community "the primary constituents of this Administration." A similar priority has operated at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, where the so-called burden on business has outranked the health of workers.

"Poisons on the Job," a report by the Urban Environment Conference, Natural Resources Defense Council and Sierra Club, documents how the Reagan Administration's pro-business, anti-regulatory stance has operated in OSHA, severely weakening worker protections. The report cites a September 1981 statement submitted by OSHA to a joint congressional oversight hearing:

"These high priority standards impose large costs on employers. OSHA will review them with the view of reducing unnecessary burdens in accordance with the President's directive. These high priority standards also may impose substantial economic impact on small businesses, and OSHA has decided to review them in order to minimize the impact."

Misdirected efforts

True to its word, OSHA used its limited resources to review the Supreme Court-upheld cotton dust standard, the lead standard and the cancer policy. Meanwhile, no new regulations on hazardous substances such as formaldehyde, ethylene oxide and ethylene dibromide have emerged from OSHA.

Scientific studies have shown all three chemicals have serious health effects at exposure levels lower than current OSHA standards and also that they are potential carcinogens. Unions whose members are exposed to these substances petitioned OSHA to immediately lower legal exposure levels for all three chemicals, but OSHA refused.

OSHA refused to act despite recommendations from the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, OSHA's research arm, for lower exposure levels. And, in the case of formaldehyde, OSHA refused over the recommendations of its own scientists.

Regulatory process

Responding to a Baltimore Sun article critical of OSHA's disregard of scientific evidence showing danger to workers from exposure to such substances, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter admonished the writer for "a lack of understanding of the regulatory process."

Scientific evidence represents "only one factor in a complicated equation" used to arrive at standard setting, Auchter said. Of five other factors in his equation, two involved costs to industry, including Reagan's 1981 Executive Order that all regulations must be cost-effective.

While OSHA devotes its attention to industry cost estimates for standards—estimates which "Poisons on the Job" points out have been repeatedly overstated—an estimated 100,000 workers die each year from job-related diseases.

"That death toll is roughly equivalent to an almost full DC 10 or 747 jumbo jet aircraft crashing every day of the year," the report notes.

In summing up the record of Reagan's OSHA, the report cites the sad legacy to the nation:

"The benefits accrue to the companies, while the costs—in death and disease—are borne by workers. When catch-phrases like 'deregulation,' 'voluntarism,' and 'unshackling free enterprise' are no longer in vogue, it will be too late to repay those costs to America's workers, their families and communities."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Jobs Bills Moving; Urge Congress To Pass a Comprehensive Plan

Jobs are America's number one priority. Millions of jobs are needed to get the nation back on track to economic growth.

This is reflected in the wide variety of job-creating bills that have been introduced in Congress. What the various bills have in common is the recognition that major government jobs programs will be necessary. Various jobs proposals are being considered in broad "Phase I, II and III" groups, at right.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators and Representative to support all jobs bills, including H.R. 1036 and S. 493.

Phase I: Emergency Package

Job-creation, Phase I, is an emergency package of accelerated public works programs and humanitarian aid for the jobless. Even President Reagan, pressured by Congress, has acknowledged that Phase I will achieve passage.

Phase I may include funds for mass transit, highways and flood control construction projects, repair of military housing, prisons and other federal buildings, and community development grants. But the modest $4.3 billion OK'd by the President is only a token that won't do much to spur recovery. A larger jobs program will be needed to "prime the pump" of the economy and get the nation moving.

Phase II: A Broader Approach

The Phase II jobs package includes a more comprehensive approach to stimulating the economy. Phase II could include: health insurance for the jobless, mortgage and rent assistance to help the unemployed avoid eviction from their homes, expansion of food stamps to ease use of the program by the jobless, stimulus of the housing industry to create construction jobs, and retraining programs for displaced workers.

Initially proposed by Democrats in Congress, Phase II programs now are picking up support on both sides of the aisle. The level of Phase II funding is uncertain but it would be in the form of additions to the current year's budget.

Phase III: October 1 Budget

Job-creation, Phase III, will come with passage of the next year's budget. Job-programs begun in 1983 under Phases I and II will need follow-through in fiscal 1984 in order to sustain economic recovery. Congress will begin outlining the 1984 budget this March or April.

Phase III should include expansion of across-the-board job-stimulus programs, including:

- Public works, such as repair of America's roads, bridges, water and sewer systems.
- Community development, such as child care, traffic control, school and public housing security, and health screening.
- Housing programs, including public housing construction.

Unemployment Compensation Update

Following is an up-to-date outline of unemployment compensation programs:

Unemployment Insurance (UI)
Usually 26 weeks. Each state collects UI taxes from employers, which are turned in to that state's account in the federal UI trust fund. Each state sets its own tax level and benefit level. Average weekly benefits range from $55 in Puerto Rico to $130 in Illinois.

Extended Benefits (EB)
An additional 13 weeks paid only in states where the insured unemployment rate (IUR) is above 5 percent. Because the IUR excludes millions of uninsured jobless, the 5 percent "trigger" is too stringent. Only 25 states now pay EB. The cost of this program is shared 50-50 between the states and the federal government.

Federal Supplemental Benefits (FSB)
In 1982 Congress approved federally financed compensation for the long-term jobless: 8, 10, 12, 14, or 16 additional weeks, depending on the state unemployment rate.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: FSB is due to expire on March 31. Rep. Harold Ford (D-TN) is working to renew and expand FSB to a 26-week maximum. Urge your Representative to support the Ford plan for extending FSB.

Major Issues Taking Shape in the 98th Congress

The 98th Congress is only weeks old, but many issues of concern to working families are beginning to take shape. Bills are being introduced, committees and subcommittees are conducting hearings, and Representatives and Senators are taking positions and forming coalitions around the issues. The chart below is a quick rundown of issues that already are moving through the legislative process.

ISSUE	STATUS/AFL-CIO POSITION	ACTION TO TAKE
Social Security	The AFL-CIO supports the compromise package of Social Security amendments with one exception: mandatory inclusion of federal workers. The AFL-CIO could support such a provision on four conditions: no reduction in pension benefits for government workers; no additional financial burden without equivalent improvement in benefits; preservation of government workers' separate retirement plan; and no weakening of the ability of federal workers to improve their pensions.	Urge your Representative and Senators to support the national commission's compromise package, with the exception of mandatory inclusion of federal workers.
Alaska Oil	Current law allows Alaskan North Slope crude oil to be exported only if the export does not cut into America's energy supplies. But this law is due to expire Sept. 30, 1983. The oil industry opposes extending the law so they can export Alaska oil to Japan. This could eliminate thousands of construction, refining and shipping jobs.	Urge your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 1197 to extend oil export restrictions.
Bankruptcy	Last year, the consumer credit industry pushed unfair legislation that would eliminate the fresh start that bankruptcy law provides for those in serious financial difficulty. That legislation was reintroduced this year and should still be opposed. But there also is new legislation that strikes a fair balance between the interests of creditors and debtors. The compromise bill would keep the door open for those who need relief.	Urge your Senators to oppose the unfair S. 445. Instead, they should support S. 333. Ask your Representative to support H.R. 1147.
Health Care for the Jobless	Most Americans receive their health insurance coverage through their jobs. As a result, high unemployment is ceating a national health problem. The hard-hit state of Michigan has reported its first increase in infant mortality since World War II.	Urge your Senators to support S. 307 to provide health protection for the jobless.
Tax Fairness: Interest and Dividend Withholding	Federal taxes are withheld from your paycheck; this helps ensure compliance with the tax law and prevents a big tax bill at the end of the year. Last year Congress extended this idea to income from savings interest payments and stock dividends. Banking interests are urging Congress to repeal the new law. But you pay taxes on your hard-earned income; why shouldn't fat cats pay what's due on their unearned income?	Urge your Representative to oppose H.R. 500, your Senators to oppose S. 222 or any other bill to repeal tax withholding on interest and dividends.

Council spurs measures to aid recession victims

World report

Sec. of State George P. Shultz answers questions from AFL-CIO Executive Council members on a broad range of issues extending from world trouble spots to international trade concerns. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed it "an exceedingly useful exchange."

House funds 'first-phase' jobs package

By David L. Perlman

The House passed an emergency job-funding bill that the AFL-CIO viewed as "a small first step" towards bringing down unemployment.

Despite its inadequacies, it was a somewhat bigger step than the compromise originally put together by the Reagan Administration and the Democratic leadership. The original $4.3 billion was raised to $4.6 billion by the Appropriations Committee. And when the bill reached the House floor, labor-endorsed amendments pushed the total over the $5 billion mark.

The bill's biggest single ingredient is public works construction funding, including $1.25 billion additional money for Community Development Grants to generate an estimated 80,000 jobs.

Much of the money represents accelerated spending for projects already scheduled, including repairs to public buildings, military housing construction and rural water and sewer projects. But there are also substantial funds for job training, day care and other social services, and humanitarian programs including emergency food and shelter for the recession's victims.

$200 million added

On the House floor, $200 million was added for health services, including maternal and child care, and mass transit assistance was raised substantially over the Appropriations Committee figure.

Both amendments were adopted by voice vote. The House then voted 335-83 to require that at least 75 percent of the money be spent in areas where unemployment is at least 90 percent of the national average. It then defeated a Republican attempt to reshape the package and passed the bill by a 324-95 vote.

But even if the bill clears the Senate and is signed by the President, a second-round funding bill will be needed to make more than a small dent in unemployment. The AFL-CIO proposal for jobs and recession relief called for a supplemental appropriation of $22.5 billion for the current fiscal year, which runs through Sept. 30, with added stimulus in the fiscal 1984 budget.

House speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. said Democrats expect to bring a Phase II emergency jobs relief package to the floor in April, and Republicans are preparing a counter-package that would include such warmed-over Administration proposals as "urban enterprise zones" that would reward companies moving to poor city areas.

Revived programs

The House did approve, by a 301-87 vote, a Conservation Corps bill that would revive features of two programs scrapped by the Reagan Administration when it came to office, the Youth Conservation Corps and the Young Adult Conservation Corps. The new measure also is modeled on the successful Civilian Conservation Corps of the early New Deal era, and the week the House acted marked the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the original CCC.

A similar bill passed the House last

Jobless face benefit cuts, income loss

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has urged a series of specific actions by Congress to help jobless workers and needy families overcome the hardships wrought by the Reagan recession.

The federation's Executive Council called for extension of unemployment insurance benefits for at least 65 weeks, assurance of health care for jobless workers and their families, restoration of Medicaid eligibility for the working poor, a relief program to protect the unemployed from mortgage foreclosures or evictions from rental housing, and more funds to train dislocated workers in new and needed skills.

In addition, the council pledged that the AFL-CIO's own networks, operating through the Dept. of Community Services and the Human Resources Development Institute, "will be working in tandem to implement labor's commitment to help ease the disastrous consequences of current national economic policies."

These and other council actions were embodied in statements and reports, detailed elsewhere in this issue of the AFL-CIO News, which adopted as the council closed out its winter meeting here.

International affairs

The council held a lengthy discussion with Sec. of State George Shultz, who responded to their questions on international affairs,

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted at a subsequent news conference that Shultz had met twice before with the council when he was Secretary of Labor. He said federation officers and council members had known Shultz "for a long time and have a high regard for him," both personally and in terms of his performance in various government posts. Kirkland said council members

Bid to tax health benefits fought as backward step

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Reducing insurance coverage is the wrong way to bring down health care costs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

A council statement took sharp issue with President Reagan's proposal to tax workers on the value of health insurance coverage provided by employers if it exceeds an "arbitrary" dollar limit.

Reagan told Congress that "elaborate" health benefits provided by employers are "inflationary." The Administration wants to tax workers on employer-paid health insurance premiums that exceed $70 a month for individuals and $175 for a family plan.

That would hit especially at health plans with large numbers of older workers, those located in high-cost areas and comprehensive health maintenance organizations, the Executive Council said.

Retrogressive

An AFL-CIO background statement on the issue termed the Administration tax proposal "an unprecedented intrusion in collective bargaining" that would "turn back the clock on decades of progress by workers in winning comprehensive health care protection."

As to the Administration claim that such a tax would make workers more "cost-conscious," the AFL-CIO retorted that the real effect would be to discourage plans that emphasize preventive health, dental and eye care.

The Executive Council noted that the Administration's new proposals come in the wake of budget cuts in health programs that have reduced access to medical care "for the elderly, low-income mothers and children, and jobless workers."

It urged restoration of coverage for the working poor who have lost Medicaid eligibility as a result of past budget cuts. And it pressed especially for a program to assure continued health insurance for millions of unemployed workers and their families—who lost health insurance protection along with their jobs.

The council reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for the cost-containment proposal of the Health Security Action Council. That plan, it stressed, "would provide across-the-board health care cost control while protecting wages, benefits and all other contractual rights of health care employees."

It urged AFL-CIO affiliates "to bargain for reductions in health insurance premiums, to help develop and expand prepaid group practice plans and other alternative delivery systems, and to participate in local health care coalitions aimed at reducing cost and improving access and quality."

Big Steel accord paves way for modernization of plants

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers local union presidents voted to accept a new 41-month agreement with seven major steel firms that exchanges temporary wage and benefit cuts for company pledges to put the savings directly into revitalizing their steel operations.

The local presidents in basic steel voted 169 to 63, with three abstentions, for the accord, which took effect Mar. 1 and runs to July 31, 1986. A membership vote is not required under USWA's constitution.

While the accord calls for a $1.25 cut in the hourly wage and a temporary halt in cost-of-living adjustments for this year, several key union bargaining goals were met in the agreement, including a full pay-back of the wage cut during the life of the contract, preservation of the principle of cost-of-living adjustment and the pledge that the companies will use the savings only to modernize steel plants—not for non-steel ventures.

More help for unemployed members was also a top union bargaining priority, and the agreement calls for improvements in supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB), including expanded eligibility and a tripling of company contributions to the funds.

Steelworkers Vice President Joseph Odorcich, the chief USWA negotiator, said the pact is an answer to the union's "detractors" who had "vilified" the Steelworkers as "greedy workers who wouldn't do anything to help" their industry battered by the recession and competition from cheap imports.

Jobless benefits shrink as unemployment rises

Bal Harbour, Fla. — More Americans are out of work than at any time since the Great Depression, but only half of them are receiving unemployment compensation.

"The protections of an effective and sound unemployment insurance system are essential for these unemployed workers and their families to forestall economic disaster," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement and background analysis.

"In most states, benefits are at abysmally low levels," the council observed. "To assure adequate and equitable protection of all unemployed workers, the AFL-CIO repeats its call for minimum federal benefit standards."

In February 1975, during the nation's previous worst postwar recession, three-fourths of the unemployed received benefits, the council noted. While the official total unemployment rate currently is 10.4 percent, the insured unemployment rate is only 5 percent, a gap of over 5 percent. During the 1974-76 recession, this differential averaged 3 percent.

State programs

The insured unemployment rate is the percentage of workers covered by state unemployment insruance programs who are receiving benefits.

For some states, the gap between official unemployment and insured unemployment is even greater than the national average. In Michigan, for example, the differential is 10.5 percent, and in Ohio it is almost 9 percent.

Meanwhile, restrictions demanded by the Reagan Administration and imposed by Congress have gutted the extended benefit program. As a result of these cutbacks, more than 3 million long-term jobless workers will receive reduced unemployment compensation benefits or none at all in the current fiscal year.

Expires in March

Some income protection is provided by the temporary program of Federal Supplemental Compensation for jobless workers who have exhausted either regular or extended benefits, but that program is slated to expire on Mar. 31. The Reagan Administration has proposed extension of the program only until Sept. 30, and even then would attach new, onerous requirements without lengthening benefit duration.

"We urge removal of restrictions which have been imposed on extended benefits," the council said. "The maximum benefit duration should be extended to at least 65 weeks, and the FSC program should be extended for at least one year."

The council also expressed strong opposition to the Administration's plan to permit replacement of some federal supplemental benefits with vouchers that could be used as cash subsidies by employers to hire long-term jobless workers. Employers could simply lay off their current workers, substitute workers holding vouchers, and fire the new workers when the vouchers expire, the council pointed out.

As to the Administration's plan to use state unemployment insurance trust funds for training and relocation, the council called that "a misuse of funds which should be reserved to payments to jobless workers."

The statement also objected to proposals to allow lump sum payments of federal supplemental benefits to jobless workers if they use them for relocation or training and to impose a training requirement as a condition for federal supplemental benefits.

States in debt

On financing problems, the council noted that shrinking unemployment insurance trust funds have caused many states to borrow from the Federal Unemployment Account. Some states are in debt for previous loans, and requirements recently imposed by Congress force them to pay interest on those loans. This bleak situation, the council observed, has caused many states to impose their own restrictions on benefits in addition to the new federal restrictions.

To deal equitably with the financial burdens of the states, and enable them to maintain or improve current benefits, the council urged Congress to enact legislation that would:

Use general revenues

- Reimburse all states from general revenues for their share of extended benefits and the excess cost of regular benefits during recession.
- Require states to repay loans and the interest on them only when state reserve funds reach 125 percent of the previous year's benefit payments, thus deferring loan repayments during periods of high unemployment and recession.
- Help states meet extraordinary costs during high unemployment through a system of re-insurance, as recommended by the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation.
- Require states to increase the taxable wage base to 65 percent of the average annual wage by 1990 and thereafter in steps to the level of the social security wage base.

The council also urged Congress to repeal the "unjustified" increase in the Federal Unemployment Tax to 6.2 percent scheduled to take effect on Jan. 1, 1985.

Wide union role pressed to ease misery of jobless

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Millions of jobless Americans desperately need help during the current recession, the Executive Council declared as it urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to bend every effort to assist those without work.

Massive layoffs, plant closings, and plant relocations have caused widespread suffering for a record number of unemployed, the council said. Trade unions have responded with actions at the local, national and federation level to aid jobless union members and their families.

The AFL-CIO conducts assistance programs for unemployed members through its Dept. of Community Services network of labor liaison staff in 196 cities throughout the United States. Programs currently under way include:

- Developing coalitions of community-based agencies with the resources and expertise to meet urgent health care and other human needs.
- Establishing information, referral, and service centers at union halls, central labor councils or at other convenient locations where a concentration of assistance programs is required.
- Expanding union counselor training programs to meet the needs of the growing unemployed population.
- Creating job fairs, food banks, job placement, and other direct assistance programs.

Other help

The federation is also reaching out to the jobless through its employment and training arm, the Human Resources Development Institute.

Working closely with the Community Services network, affiliated unions, state and local bodies, HRDI is bringing together representatives of multiple resource organizations—public, private, and union—to obtain assistance for unemployed union members and their families, the council's statement said.

Labor's position backed

Rep. William D. Suriname's military regime condemned as 'murderous'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO expressed its condemnation of "the illegal and murderous government" of Suriname, and urged all free trade unions to combat, expose, and publicize the crimes of that country's military regime.

An Executive Council statement charged that the arrest, torture, and murder of at least 15 opponents of the dictatorship of Lt. Col. Desy Bouterse last December constitute "appalling evidence of the totalitarian brutality" toward which Suriname has been moving over the past two years.

Bouterse and a cabal of army sergeants overthrew Suriname's constitutionally elected government in 1980. Suriname is a country in northern South America about the size of Georgia.

Victims of the December slaughter included Cyril Daal, general secretary of Moederbond, Suriname's democratic trade union center, and vice president of the Caribbean Confederation of Labor, and leaders of the nation's legal, professional, and academic communities, who had pressed the military regime for free elections and a return to democratic government.

Moederbond's headquarters were burned to the ground, and opposition radio stations and newspapers were destroyed. Bodies of all 15 of those known to have been arrested in predawn raids showed clear evidence that they had been tortured before they were killed. Other acts of terrorism, including further arrests and murders, have continued to the present.

Immediately following the killings in December, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joined the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in demanding that the Bouterse government live up to international conventions guaranteeing the right to freedom of association, which Suriname has ratified.

Drive for new ERA measure backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO endorsed passage of the Equal Rights Amendment re-introduced in Congress and urged all affiliates to redouble efforts to add it to the U.S. Constitution.

An earlier ERA measure failed last year when only 35 of the required 38 states had voted approval of ERA by the time the ratification deadline expired.

In a statement adopted at its winter meeting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council stressed that the federation remains "committed to the principles embodied in the ERA" and that organized labor will continue efforts "to bring about equity and justice for all through collective bargaining and by changing laws, policies, institutions and attitudes."

Increased funding sought to bolster job training plan

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to increase funding for the Job Training Partnership Act and clearly establish the right of jobless workers to retain unemployment insurance benefits while enrolled in approved education and training programs.

An Executive Council statement specifically asked supplemental funding for JTPA of $1 billion in fiscal 1983 and $2 billion in fiscal 1984 to be used "to help workers hit by plant closings and major layoffs."

More funds needed

JTPA was allocated $240 million by Congress for fiscal 1983, but that amount needs to be vastly increased to provide an effective national job training effort, the council said. The $240 million would provide training for about 100,000 persons of nearly 12 million unemployed.

The council also rejected the Reagan Administration's proposals to "raid depleted unemployment insurance funds for money to provide education or training vouchers for jobless workers."

In urging Congress to establish the right of jobless workers to receive unemployment benefits while engaged in approved training classes, the council noted that some states now allow such enrollment, but said the opportunity should be guaranteed for all workers.

The council statement called for "effective labor participation in JTPA programs with full labor representation on local Private Industry Councils and State Job Training Coordinating Councils.

FDR role contrasted with Reagan policies

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO asked Congress to mark the 50th anniversary of the first inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt by acting to reaffirm "his belief that the federal government has the central responsibility to defend and advance the welfare of all Americans."

A statement adopted by the Executive Council stressed that the Mar. 4 anniversary "finds America and her people once again in desperate economic straits," and charged that the Reagan Administration has produced a social crisis "no less dangerous" than the one combated by Roosevelt "by repeating failed policies that brought on the Great Depression and by striving to dismantle the human policies that overcame it."

Hardships spread

stated their views to Shultz "frankly and directly, and he responded in the same vein."

Another guest was Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, who outlined his views on issues of concern to labor and responded to the questions of council members.

The appearances of Hollings and another candidate, Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), who met with the council earlier in the week, were in keeping with an effort by the council to examine the views of all those seeking the nomination before determining whether the AFL-CIO will endorse a presidential candidate in advance of the 1984 state primaries and party conventions.

Endorsement policy

Meanwhile, Kirkland told reporters that the council had agreed unanimously to urge affiliates to refrain from any public announcement of candidate preference until August or later, and not to make any irrevocable commitment to a candidate before an endorsement decision is made.

Otherwise, Kirkland reported, the consensus of the council was that "a high degree of flexibility would be observed and that the various organizations will give such advice to their local branches as they see fit."

Under a program approved by the council at its meeting last August in New York, the decision on whether the AFL-CIO will make a pre-primary endorsement will be made in December by the General Board, expanded to include officers of state and local central bodies. A resolution calling the meeting of the board and setting a specific date and place will be drafted for the federation's October 1983 convention.

Two-thirds majority

Voting at the General Board meeting will be weighted according to membership per capita payments to the federation, and a two-thirds majority will be required for an endorsement, as is the case with all COPE endorsements.

The council also approved Kirkland's proposal that Solidarity Day III be observed this year with demonstrations in each of the 50 states on Labor Day. (Story, Page 4.)

In other trade union actions, the council endorsed consumer boycotts of four firms accused by affiliates of union-busting efforts and placed two others on the federation's unfair list. (Story, Page 6.)

The council also hailed the new national labor policy of the United Way of America as it approved the report of its ad hoc committee on the subject presented by Vice President Sol C. Chaikin. (Story, this page.)

Other committee reports were presented by Vice Presidents Glenn Watts on public relations, which included a video presentation of work in progress by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs; Gerald McEntee on the constitutional amendment for a balanced budget; Charles Pillard on housing; Frederick O'Neal on civil rights; Douglas Fraser on union retirees; William Wynn on restrictive legislation; Murray Finley on union mergers; J. C. Turner on occupational safety and health, including a detailed review of OSHA activities in 1982.

Kirkland appointed a new committee to undertake a systematic study and evaluation of the performance of the U.S. Dept. of Labor in administering programs for which it has responsibility. Named to the committee were Vice Presidents Pillard, Lloyd McBride, John DeConcini and James Hatfield, and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, along with Robert Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Howard Samuel, president of the Industrial Union Dept.

Per capita report

Donahue's reports as secretary-treasurer covered membership and finances, the George Meany Memorial and Archives, the Housing Investment Trust and the Article XX internal disputes plan. He also gave interim reports for the Committee on the Evolution of Work and the committee on the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health.

Contributions were voted to the International Labor Program at Georgetown University, Americans for Energy Independence, Full Employment Action Council, the New Leader, SOS Coalition, Religion & Labor Conference, Samuel Gompers Papers, James S. Brady Foundation, National Council of Negro Women, National Urban League, National Urban Coalition, Southern Regional Conference, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, International Rescue Committee.

Other recipients

Also, the Committee on National Health Insurance, National Housing Conference, Low-Income Housing Coalition, Fund for a Democratic Society, No Greater Love, Joint Council for Economic Education, Citizens Committee for Immigration Reform, Consumer Energy Council of America, Urban Environment Conference, National Consumers League, National Commission on Working Women, Reading Is Fundamental, Conference on Economic Progress, U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, the USO, Consumer Federation of America, and impact aid funds for the Asian American Free Labor Institute and the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The next Executive Council meeting will be held May 24-25, 1983, at the Maritime Institute of Technology, Linthicum Heights, Md.

CONVENTION

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO's 1983 convention will be held June 7-10 in Philadelphia. In an earlier edition of the AFL-CIO News the convention date was incorrectly listed May 17-20.

New vice presidents

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland welcomes new Executive Council members Marvin J. Boede, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and William H. Bywater, right, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. They were elected at the council's mid-winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., along with Carpenters' President Patrick J. Campbell.

Reagan budget called threat to public education system

Bal Harbour, Fla.—If the Reagan Administration's budget proposals are adopted, they will hurt, not help, the nation's public education system and endanger the right of many Americans to a decent education, the Executive Council warned.

The Administration's education budget amounts to "tax gimmicks, rhetorical fluff and pious platitudes," but doesn't provide any substantive programs to help public schools educate and retrain future and current workers, the council charged.

A council statement called on Congress to reject the budget cuts and related measures which it warned could gut the nation's public education programs.

The AFL-CIO also said Congress should provide money for "realistic" programs of vocational education for those still in school and for adults who need training in new skills. The current recession and high unemployment figures underscore this need, the council pointed out.

The AFL-CIO continues to oppose tuition tax credits, education vouchers and education "savings accounts" which will drain revenues and students from public school programs, the council said.

Student aid

The federation also opposes cuts in student aid programs, including those billed as "self-help grants," which require students regardless of income to have substantial cash in order to qualify for student loans.

The Administration's eagerness to cut college aid programs and to require more payments by individuals even to qualify for loans "would severely restrict access to higher education for most Americans —especially those in low-income groups," the council charged.

It said more money is needed for teaching math and science and for special programs like bilingual and Indian education.

And adequate funding should be supplied to public vocational education to enable schools to train students and adults in modern technological skills on up-to-date equipment, the statement said. It called on Congress to reject Administration proposals to roll vocational education programs in to block grants.

The statement called for expanded labor participation in local vocational education advisory councils and for more cooperation between labor, management, local government and local education institutions to deliver effective training programs to their communities.

Performing arts unions supported in antitrust case

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The antitrust suits against two performers' unions are a throwback to the days of union-busting by injunction and concern all unions, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council said the AFL-CIO supports the legal positions taken by the Television & Radio Artists and the Screen Actors Guild in the suits brought against them by Tuesday Productions, a non-union producer of advertising jingles.

The AFL-CIO will work with the unions "to vindicate their right to represent their members," the council said in a statement at its winter meeting.

Ruling hits AFTRA

A federal district court judge in San Diego ruled last spring that AFTRA violated antitrust laws when it acted to enforce agreements negotiated for its members with companies that are signatory to AFTRA contracts.

The court ordered AFTRA to pay triple damages and costs totaling some $10.6 million and to post a bond for the full amount while the case is being appealed.

To protect their assets, AFTRA and its New York, Los Angeles and San Diego locals were forced to file for bankruptcy.

Tuesday claims AFTRA instituted a secondary boycott by putting the company on its unfair list, which is closely watched by signatory advertising agencies.

The council said the decision is a "throwback" to the days before passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932 when the federal courts "routinely misapplied the antitrust laws in order to restrict union activity" and intimidate workers from organizing.

Tuesday also filed suit against SAG and 27 other AFTRA locals, but none of those cases has been tried.

United Way national labor policy lauded

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The board of governors of the United Way of America was commended by the AFL-CIO Executive Council for adopting a national labor policy upholding the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively and urging the adoption of such a policy by local United Ways and participating agencies.

The council noted that in the nine months since the board acted on the national level last May 20, such labor policies have been adopted by 175 local United Ways in 35 states, including most of the major urban areas outside of the South.

"We applaud this action," the council said in a statement that was part of the report of its ad hoc committee on United Way labor policy. That committee was created to consider a number of resolutions referred by the 1981 convention calling for withdrawal of support for the United Way if that agency failed to adopt and implement a national labor policy for itself and its affiliates.

The council called on the United Way, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, state and local central labor bodies and national and international union affiliates to continue to press for adoption of the new labor policy in communities where no action has been taken. It urged affiliates to put special emphasis on the issue in communities where they have large concentrations of membership.

The council said the Dept. of Community Services will submit progress reports on these efforts and that if enough progress is not achieved, the committee will re-examine the need for further steps "to bring about the improved labor relations climate sought by the AFL-CIO."

The national labor policy resolution adopted by the United Way's board declared that it "supports the right of employees to join organizations of their own choosing if that is their desire, and to make that choice without interference or coercion and recognizes and respects established bargaining relationships and the negotiated terms and conditions provided for in collective bargaining agreements or equivalent understandings."

The board urged local United Ways to have such a policy "and to recommend to their participating agencies the adoption of a similar labor policy."

Politics on the agenda

Election issues, delegate selection rules for party conventions and labor's campaign role were on the agenda of the COPE Administrative Committee, which includes key political action officials of affiliated unions. The session was held during the AFL-CIO Executive Council's mid-winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Guidelines drawn to avoid violations by political funds

Bal Harbour, Fla.—New political contribution guidelines have been adopted by the Executive Council to assure that the AFL-CIO does not find itself in violation of the Federal Election Campaign Act because of actions by state and local central bodies, its departments, or by directly affiliated local unions.

The council directive does not affect the autonomous national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

The new rules bar the AFL-CIO and departmental state and local councils and the directly affiliated locals from operating their own political action committees to pass on voluntary contributions from union members to labor-endorsed candidates for federal office.

Voluntary funds raised through subordinate AFL-CIO bodies will be dispersed to candidates through national COPE's Political Contributions Committee, the council said.

Under federal election law, contributions made by political action committees of AFL-CIO bodies are counted toward COPE's legal limit of a $5,000 contribution to any candidate in a primary or general election.

National fund

To avoid inadvertent violations, and the extra cost of registering separate political committees and filing required financial reports, the council voted to make all AFL-CIO political donations for federal elections at the national level. Existing political action committees governed by this policy were directed to terminate their registration with the FEC and transfer voluntary funds to COPE's Political Contributions Committee or to the political committee of their department.

The council stressed the importance of state and local bodies and directly affiliated locals in raising funds to support candidates who share labor's goals. It termed continuation of such efforts "essential."

National COPE will prepare detailed guidelines to help in the transition and to assure "an active and visible role" for the state and local organizations and the directly affiliated locals in "contributions and expenditures on behalf of federal candidates."

Federal law does not restrict contributions to state and local elections. The council noted, however, that in some states a union must maintain a political committee in order to make contributions to the election campaigns of state and local candidates.

In those states, the council urged, directly affiliated locals and central bodies "should continue to play an active role in state and local elections by taking the steps necessary to comply with those laws."

Solidarity Day III

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Solidarity Day III will be observed by members of AFL-CIO unions next Labor Day with rallies and demonstrations in each of the 50 states, the Executive Council agreed.

The council approved the proposal of Federation President Lane Kirkland to continue the observance of Solidarity Day annually, marking it on Election Day in the even-numbered years and with appropriate events in the odd-numbered years. Plans for 1983 include at least one event in each state on Labor Day.

The first Solidarity Day, in 1981, brought a throng of more than 400,000 workers and their supporters to Washington for the largest political protest ever held in the nation's capital.

New bid to export Alaska oil called threat to U.S. security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Current restrictions on the export of Alaska oil should be extended when the Export Administration Act expires in September, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The law's restrictions assure that no export of Alaska oil will take place unless it is in the national interest.

An Administration proposal to send Alaska oil to Japan while the United States is importing oil from foreign countries "poses a threat to the nation's economic and defense security," the council charged in a statement.

"This would reverse a decade of progress toward domestic energy self-reliance and would increase U.S. dependence on unstable foreign supplies of oil. U.S. consumers would not benefit since foreign oil would probably cost more than Alaska oil."

Shipping domestic oil overseas, the council said, would give consumers "a false indication" that the nation no longer places a priority on conservation and alternative forms of energy.

The exportation of Alaska oil would harm the nation's trade balance since it would in effect swap domestic oil for foreign oil, the AFL-CIO pointed out.

Also, while an oil export to Japan would improve that country's trade balance with the United States, it would provide no relief to those domestic manufacturing industries that have been so severely harmed by Japanese trade practices, the council observed.

"It would exchange oil, which is not labor-intensive, for manufactured products, which are," the council statement noted.

Emergency needs

The council also warned that export of Alaska oil poses the grave danger that the United States will not have adequate oil supplies in time of national emergency. In addition, loss of carriage of Alaska oil would idle more than half the tanker tonnage flying the U.S. flag, and this would precipitate numerous bankruptcies and corporate failures.

Until recently, Alaska oil was being used to fill the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. That reserve, now being filled far more slowly than Congress intended, is a more appropriate way to use Alaska oil than to export it, the council said.

Alaska oil is currently being used on the West, East, and Gulf coasts, the council noted. Its use in domestic markets would be made more efficient with construction of west-to-east pipelines.

"But such pipelines will never attract the needed capital so long as investors believe that an export of Alaska oil is a distinct possibility," the council warned.

Holocaust Memorial fund supported

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the efforts of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council to raise $75 million for the establishment of a "national museum and living memorial to the victims of the Nazi Holocaust."

A council statement urging affiliates to contribute "generously" to the project, noted that when Congress created the memorial council in 1980, it manddated that construction funds must come exclusively from private sources.

The statement pointed out that "in this 50th anniversary of Hitler's rise to power, it is especially appropriate for the trade union movement to join with all Americans in remembering the victims of the Holocaust and in rededicating ourselves to the cause of freedom."

The memorial council, which hopes to raise the funds by mid-1985, would set up a museum to "serve to remind all people everywhere of the lessons of the Holocaust and to express the eternal hope that, by learning these lessons, all humankind may be protected from totalitarian despotism," the statement said.

Reagan move for lower pay floor blasted

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Congress should raise the minimum wage for all of America's low-paid workers instead of reducing it for those under the age of 22, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It warned that President Reagan's proposal for a $2.50-an-hour subminimum youth wage from May through September would encourage employers to replace older workers but would not expand total employment to any measurable degree.

At a news conference following the Executive Council action, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the Administration proposal is based on a long-discarded theory that reducing wages will increase employment.

Inflationary effects

If that were the case, the economy should be prospering, Kirkland said, because in "real terms" the value of the $3.35 an hour pay floor has been eroded by the loss in buying power from inflation. It would require a $4.14 an hour rate to mantain the original value, Kirkland noted.

"So we have a subminimum wage in real terms," Kirkland said. Yet at the same time, "we have the most massive unemployment we've experienced since the 1930s," he stressed.

"That's a pretty good laboratory test," he suggested. "If it proves anything, it proves that cutting wages increases unemployment. That was also the case during the '30s," he said, "when wage cutting was rampant, there was no minimum wage, and you had the highest unemployment in the history of the United States."

Recessionary factor

The Executive Council statement said the loss of purchasing power by America's lowest-paid workers has been a factor in prolonging the recession, as well as adding to its hardships.

It noted that a youth subminimum scheme has been repeatedly rejected, most recently in the 1981 report of the Minimum Wage Commission.

There is no evidence that such a scheme would increase job opportunities, the council said.

The council urged Congress "to reject the President's proposal for a subminimum wage for youth and, instead, to take the minimum wage in the direction it should go—toward the restoration of the purchasing power lost by America's lowest-paid workers."

Campaign urged to expose role of hate groups

Bal Harbour, Fla. — AFL-CIO affiliates have been urged to combat propaganda of the Ku Klux Klan and other extremist groups through the establishment of educational programs aimed at alerting union members to the "dangers these hate groups pose to the labor movement and to the nation."

The Executive Council noted that the current "fear and anxiety stemming from economic insecurity and unbearably high unemployment are creating dangerous social strains among the American people" providing the opportunity for extremist groups like the KKK to "sow dissension, bigotry and racial conflict from coast to coast."

It recommended setting up union civil rights committees at both the national and local levels.

"There is no place in America, now or ever, for apostles of racial or religious bigotry," the council statement declared. "In its long fight for human brotherhood, racial justice and social solidarity, the American trade union movement has battled such enemies of freedom whenever and wherever they appear."

Policy reforms sought

Congressional action urged on immigration

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council reaffirmed its support for compassionate immigration legislation that would also protect American jobs and labor standards.

The council, in a statement adopted at its meeting here, urged Congress to enact a law that will prevent future illegal entries, establish a "generous" program to legalize the status of undocumented aliens who are already long-time residents, and substantially tighten programs that let temporary foreign workers into the United States.

Most illegal aliens cross U.S. borders looking for jobs, the council noted. They are vulnerable to exploitation by employers because they are afraid of deportation. And because they can't call in the government to enforce labor standards laws, they undermine the job opportunities and working conditions of other workers.

Employer penalties

The best deterrent to illegal immigration would be stiff penalties on employers who hire illegal aliens, the council statement said. These sanctions, it stressed, must be backed by an efficient, tough enforcement system and by the right to "private legal action" where government fails to act.

Sanctions can only be enforced, the council said, if a forgery-proof identification is created for all legal workers, with protections built-in so that employers cannot use the threat of the penalties as an excuse not to hire legal residents who may have foreign-sounding names or who "look foreign."

The council pointed out that the AFL-CIO supports a compassionate program for legalization of undocumented workers and their families who are already established and contributing members of their communities here.

But it cautioned that a legalization program must be matched by the prevention of further illegal entries and by the strengthening of border control and interior enforcement of immigration laws, with adequate funds to improve staffing, training and working conditions for border patrol and immigration service employees.

Strong objection

In its statement, the council said the AFL-CIO strongly objects to any new "guest worker" or "bracero" program that would permit temporary foreign workers into the United States to undercut U.S. wages and working conditions. Certification of the need for any temporary foreign workers—to take jobs for which U.S. workers are not available—should remain in the Labor Dept., the council said.

In 1982, the AFL-CIO endorsed an immigration bill Congress was considering, but only on the condition that parts of the measure that would have allowed more foreign workers into the United States be sharply curtailed. Congress recessed before acting on the bill.

The council also opposed plans that would give other agencies broader powers to grant permission for temporary workers to enter the country.

Pressure from growers

One such proposal would give the Agriculture Dept. authority to allow more temporary farm laborers into the country in response to pressure from growers.

Other existing special visa programs have already been used "improperly" by agencies that administer them to admit non-immigrant alien workers even though all necessary requirements haven't been met, the council charged.

These programs include H-1 visas, intended for people of "distinguished merit and ability" coming to perform work requiring their special skills, H-2 visas for people coming to perform temporary work for which qualified American workers are not available and B-1 visas for business visitors.

The council repeated the AFL-CIO endorsement of the findings of the Select Committee on Immigration & Refuge Policy, including the recommendation that "government, employers and unions should cooperate to end dependence of any industry on a constant supply of temporary foreign workers."

Unions asked to aid local scouting efforts

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council reconfirmed its support for the Boy Scouts of America and urged affiliates to support the joint efforts of the National Advisory Committee.

In a statement, the council said the support is needed to "energize and guide the partnership and to assist in developing a survey to help assess and focus labor's support of scouting in the 1980s."

Working through the Dept. of Community Services, the AFL-CIO joined with the BSA to help extend the benefits of scouting to more American youths. Their program is aimed at encouraging local union sponsorship of scout units.

Build U.S. ships

Reagan Administration policies encouraging the construction of U.S.-flag merchant vessels in foreign shipyards while the American shipbuilding industry faces extinction were assailed by the Metal Trades Dept. executive council in Bal Harbour, Fla. The MTD called for restoration of funds for the Construction Differential Subsidy program to generate domestic shipbuilding, which the Administration eliminated in 1981.

Federal role pressed to end housing industry depression

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Lower mortgage interest rates and a new federally assisted housing construction program are needed to lift the housing industry from the deep depression it has been in for three years, the AFL-CIO declared.

A victim of the high-interest, tight-money policy of the Reagan Administration and the Federal Reserve Board, the construction industry's unemployment rate stood at an "intolerable" 20-percent level in January, the council observed. That figure represents more than a million workers, or one in 10 of all unemployed.

Meanwhile, tight housing markets in many communities have brought rent increases that have far outpaced the rise in the consumer price index, laying the groundwork for a return of home-price inflation, the council warned. And racial discrimination in housing has been increasing ominously while enforcement of fair housing laws lag, it noted.

Foreclosures rise

In a statement and a background paper on the housing situation, the council drew attention to the wave of mortgage foreclosures and evictions from rental housing that has resulted from the recession-spawned joblessness of the past 18 months. It recommended the following program:

- Appropriate action by the Federal Reserve Board to reduce interest rates further.
- Authorization by Congress of a program to provide 170,000 new assisted housing units.
- Enactment of a mortgage and rent-payment relief program to protect unemployed workers from the loss of their homes through mortgage foreclosures and evictions from rental housing.
- Action by the Justice Dept. to provide adequate staff and full enforcement of the equal-opportunity-in-housing provisions of Title VIII of the 1968 Civil Rights Act.

Interest rates still high

While the seasonally adjusted annual rate of housing starts rose to 1.7 million in January, it was still far below national needs, the council observed. A sustained increase in housing construction will require further interest rate reductions, it said.

For the past three years, the average annual number of new housing units started has been fewer than 1.2 million, about 1 million less than the annual average that will be required for the rest of the decade to meet housing needs.

A reduction of mortgage-interest rates from about the 15 to 17 percent range early last year to a 12-14 percent range late in 1982 released some of the accumulated pent-up demand for housing. Reflecting the short supply, however, prices of homes began to rise rapidly as soon as sales began to pick up in late 1982.

"A sustained period of increased housing production will not be achieved unless interest rates are brought down further by the Federal Reserve Board," the council said.

A program of providing 170,000 new assisted housing units this year and next would make a start toward closing the gap between the number of units needed and the actual number produced through the unaided housing market, the council said.

Conditions set on IMF expansion

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO voiced conditional support of U.S. participation in an expansion of the International Monetary Fund.

The council said the current international debt dilemma requires far-reaching and comprehensive arrangements based on close cooperation of all the countries concerned. But it insisted that safeguards be imposed to stop banks from such actions as aiding oppressive regimes or passing the cost of foreign defaults to the U.S. consumers.

"Piecemeal measures which aim primarily at alleviating the current crisis will not prevent further proliferation of potential defaults," the Executive Council said.

Congress has been asked to approve U.S. participation in a 40 to 50 percent expansion of the IMF, of which the U.S. share would be about $8 billion. The sum would be in addition to an expansion of the IMF's general agreements to borrow special fund (GAB), which requires about $2 billion from the United States.

Such an expansion of IMF lending authority is being proposed to help heavily indebted nations such as Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina with further credit extensions so that they do not have to default on large outstanding debts. The creditors are not just sovereign countries, but also private U.S. and foreign banks. Although the banks and the IMF might have to extend more immediate credit to the debtor countries, they would in the long run avoid losses of large sums now owed them, the council pointed out.

Jobs take precedence

"The AFL-CIO recognizes the serious consequences of potential large debtor nation defaults to the world economy and the need for IMF action to help debtor nations out of their precarious positions," the council observed. "It also recognizes, however, the cost in dollars to the U.S. taxpayers and in jobs to U.S. workers."

In light of this, the council said it supports expanding IMF capital funds provided Congress enacts legislation to accomplish the following:

- The IMF should require private banks that have extended loans to foreign borrowers to share in the costs and burdens of any "rescue" efforts.
- IMF resources should not be used to reschedule and recycle the debts of totalitarian regimes and those that abuse human rights.
- The Federal Reserve Board should be required to increase reporting and surveillance of foreign lending by U.S. banks and to restrict such lending, with due consideration of the impact of credit availability and cost to the U.S. economy, as well as the capability for repayment.
- The Federal Reserve Board should be directed to require special U.S. bank reserves against foreign lending, and such reserves should be available to provide a part of future U.S. contributions to IMF fund expansion.

Credit reports

- The Federal Reserve Board should be required to report regularly to Congress on the volume and terms of foreign credit extension by U.S. banks, on the quality of such credit, and on the effects of such credit extension upon the U.S. economy with respect to international trade positions and the availability and cost of credit in the United States.
- The Secretary of the Treasury should be directed to seek changes in IMF policies to reduce emphasis on the development of excesses of exports over imports and to place more emphasis on balanced economic growth through development of broader domestic markets and improved income distribution.

Labor to participate in flight bicentennial

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The bicentennial of the first manned flight will be marked on Nov. 21, 1982, and the AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged its affiliates to assist the Air & Space Bicentennial committee in observing the occasion.

In a statement, the council said this would be "a fitting way to honor the workers in America and around the world who have made possible the development of aviation and related materials."

The statement continued, "The AFL-CIO joins in expressing the nation's pride and appreciation in the achievement of travel into space and the aerospace industry's contribution to a better life."

The first manned flight was a balloon flight in LaMuette, France in 1783.

Focus on safety

Issues from grain elevator safety to child labor were explored by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. executive board in Bal Harbour, Fla. It called for effective OSHA regulations on grain dust and for the reinstatement of a requirement for employers to maintain records of on-the-job injuries in all industrial classifications.

Federal compensation urged for victims of job diseases

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal programs to compensate victims of occupational diseases and to identify and notify workers who are at high risk as a result of an occupational health hazard should be established now, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Citing the deaths of 100,000 workers each year from the accumulated effects of exposure to carcinogens and other chemical hazards, the council noted that survivors of these workers rarely receive any workers' compensation benefits.

Of the million workers disabled each year from the same causes, few receive adequate compensation.

The council called for a federal program to compensate workers and their families for death or disability from occupational diseases. It said the legislation should provide:

- Generous time limits for filing claims, taking into account the long latency periods for occupational diseases.
- Eligibility requirements that give workers a fair opportunity to prove that their disabling disease is caused by exposure to a toxic substance.
- Coverage of known occupational health hazards, with provisions for coverage through administrative action of additional hazards as they become known.

A background paper accompanying the council statement said that while the workers' compensation laws of all states cover occupational disease, this coverage "most often is in name only," and arbitrary restrictions on eligibility result in denial of benefits to most victims of occupational disease.

But even a comprehensive federal compensation program is not enough, the council stressed. It called for a program to "identify, notify and diagnose workers who are at high risk as a result of an occupational health hazard."

The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health should be authorized to carry out medical research to isolate occupational diseases and to assist workers at risk, the council declared.

It expressed strong objections to the use of the federal bankruptcy laws to deny workers compensation for job-related injury and disease and called for legislation "to correct this injustice."

"Working men and women need and deserve a nationwide effort by the federal government to prevent occupational disease and to assist those who are paying the price in pain, in suffering and in the lost ability to provide for themselves and their families for years of inaction by employers and by the states," the council declared.

Rollback bill supported

Continued price curb asked on natural gas

The AFL-CIO declared "enthusiastic and active support" for legislation to roll back excessive natural gas prices that are "stifling economic recovery" and devastating household budgets.

The federation's declaration of support for the Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act proposed by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), and a bipartisan group of cosponsors came in the wake of President Reagan's proposal for total deregulation of natural gas.

An estimated 48 million households use natural gas, and an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement a few days before Reagan sent his decontrol proposal to Congress charged that the partial decontrol now in effect has pushed up consumer gas bills 150 percent since 1978 with this winter's increases expected to average another 25 percent.

Some areas of the country face rate hikes of 60 to 70 percent over last year's levels, the council said, adding that rapid natural gas price increases have made it difficult—if not impossible—for low- and moderate-income families to heat their homes and meet the expenses of other basic necessities.

More than 300,000 families face part of this winter without heat because they cannot afford to pay their fuel bills. The impact of higher gas prices is also severe on the economy as a whole, costing jobs and threatening economic recovery, the council warned.

"Businesses are cutting back their operations or threatening plant closings because of their fuel costs," it said. "The more money industry pays to gas producers, the less is available to make improvements necessary to meet competition and expand the workforce. At the same time, consumers paying higher fuel bills have less money left for other purchases."

Price explosion

The current explosion in natural gas prices constitutes one of the most pressing energy issues facing the 98th Congress, the AFL-CIO said. Today's unaffordable and totally unjustified gas prices are stifling economic recovery and devastating households. The only beneficiaries of deregulation are the gas producers, the council charged.

Not only is the gas industry reaping enormous profits from deregulation, but it also has imposed "take-or-pay" contract provisions which force pipeline companies to buy the higher-cost gas even when lower-priced gas is available.

Meanwhile, the Reagan Administration is working to raise prices even more sharply through administrative actions by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and through legislative proposals to accelerate the rate of deregulation, the council noted.

In January, FERC allowed producers to add $3 billion in costs on top of current prices even though prices were already high enough to cover producers' costs and give them tremendous profits, the council charged. Accelerated deregulation would add tens of billions of dollars more to the nation's fuel bill, the AFL-CIO warned.

The council urged Congress to roll back prices and extend price controls, reject any accelerated phase-out, prohibit unjust "take-or-pay" contract provisions, and prevent the FERC from taking unjustified administrative steps to increase gas prices.

To help achieve energy independence, the council said it also supports the construction of a natural gas pipeline to bring North Slope natural gas to U.S. markets and opposes any plans to export Alaska natural gas.

'March on Washington' observance endorsed

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The Executive Council expressed its support for the 20th Anniversary Mobilization for Jobs, Peace and Freedom scheduled for next Aug. 27-28 to commemorate the historic March on Washington at which the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. delivered his "I have a dream" speech.

The council noted that trade union leaders like A. Philip Randolph, Walter P. Reuther and Bayard Rustin joined Dr. King and other human rights leaders in organizing the 1963 march, which "contributed significantly to the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

The anniversary mobilization is being organized by Dr. King's widow, Mrs. Coretta Scott King, and others "to reaffirm the spirit" of the 1963 march.

The Executive Council said the AFL-CIO remains committed to working with civil rights, women's rights, religious and other movements to "advance and defend the great goals of the 1963 march in the pursuit of social justice."

New boycotts endorsed to combat union-busting

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Four consumer boycotts have been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, and two companies were added to the federation's unfair list to publicize their union-busting activities.

In action taken at its meeting here, the council voted to add to the federation's nationally circulated "do not buy" list four boycotts already being conducted by affiliated unions. The council also asked the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to urge consumers not to patronize the boycotted goods and services.

New to the boycott list are the Equitable Life Assurance Society, Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co., Magic Chef, Inc., and Sterling Radiators made by Reed National Corp.

Added to the unfair list were Capital Cities Communications, Inc., owner of the Kansas City Star, and Sinclair Oil Co. of Wyoming.

Refusal to bargain

In the Equitable Life case, the council pointed out that Service Employees District 925, the union's office workers division, won an election to represent 93 claims processors at Equitable's Syracuse, N.Y., facility in 1981. But the company has refused to bargain with the workers, mostly women who operate video-display terminals, even after losing three appeals of the election before the National Labor Relations Board.

Equitable, the nation's third largest insurance company, has continued "to use the money obtained from countless union members through insurance policies and pension funds to enhance its profits while refusing to recognize the rights of its employees," the council charged.

16-month strike

In the Brown & Sharpe dispute Machinists at two company plants in Rhode Island have been on strike for 16 months in an effort to win a new contract. The company, which makes cutting, measuring and machine tools and pumps, has insisted on unacceptable "takeaway" demands, the council said.

The strike has been marred by incidents of violence against picketers such as tear gas fired by police and shooting in which a striker narrowly missed being seriously hurt when a bullet fired into the picket line hit his belt buckle.

At the Magic Chef plant in Cleveland, Tenn., management union-busting demands forced 900 members of the Molders to walk off the job. The council said the company, which makes kitchen ranges, has demanded elimination of dues checkoff and other cutbacks that would "discriminate" against the Tennessee workers in comparison with union contracts at the company's other plants in California, Illinois and Ohio.

The union reported that 94 percent of the workers voted for a strike which began Jan. 23. Picketers have been harassed and provoked on the line by police and strikebreakers, the council reported.

At Reed National's Sterling Radiator plant in Westfield, Mass., 70 members of the Auto Workers have been on strike since the spring of 1981. The plant produces home baseboard heaters.

The council said the UAW members were forced to strike to protect their rights after the company came into negotiations for a new contract with an 18-page long list of takeaway demands.

The company hired strikebreakers soon after the walkout began, and the UAW has been pressing a boycott of Sterling Radiators since August 1981. Most are sold to contractors, but some are available in hardware stores.

Unfair list

The council added the Kansas City Star's parent company, Capital Cities Communications, to the AFL-CIO "unfair list" at the request of the Typographical Union to make public the company's attempt to renege on guaranteed job security clauses it agreed to in 1974 in return for changes in union work rules.

Capital Cities, in what the council called part of a "corporate wide pattern" of union-busting, has stalled negotiations on the issue for four years, and the 140 ITU members at the Star haven't had a pay raise during the period.

The ITU wants support from Capital Cities' stockholders, including union pension funds, to force the company to reverse its anti-union policies.

Ruined relationship

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers members at Sinclair Oil of Wyoming have a bargaining history with the company that goes back to 1934. But the council said the company suddenly destroyed the relationship in 1980 with the launching of a "blatant, union-busting campaign."

The company, which also has hotel and resort holdings, abolished the union's role in arbitration of disciplinary disputes, cancelled dues check-off, refused to guarantee wage increases, transferred workers out of the bargaining unit and made unilateral changes in work assignments.

The council condemned the company's actions and urged union members to support the efforts of the 167 OCAW members to hold their union together.

The council removed from the unfair list, at the request of the Woodworkers, charcoal briquettes sold under the brand names CharKetts, Grill Time, Star Grill, along with Sparky lighter fluid.

Applied Reaganomics

DEREGULATION OF natural gas prices, President Reagan insists, will somehow result in lower prices for American consumers.

That's certainly good news to millions of families dependent on natural gas for heating. The utility bills they got after this winter's cold spells were staggering.

Of course, one reason for the big price jump has been the willingness of President Reagan's appointees to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to allow producers to pile price rise on top of price rise.

Just this past January, as the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted, the commission "allowed producers to add $3 billion in costs on top of current prices, even though prices were already high enough to cover producers' costs and give them tremendous profits."

And as the council also noted, the accelerated deregulation being sought by the Administration "would add tens of billions of dollars more to the nation's fuel bills."

Yet the President and his apologists continue to insist that once the inhibiting hand of government price regulation is lifted, prices will come tumbling down. The Administration even proposes to restrain the generosity of its own regulatory agency during an interim period and limit the price increases that can be passed on to consumers.

THE ADMINISTRATION conjures up a vision of gas producers just waiting for the heavy hand of government regulation to be lifted in order to lower their prices.

But why wait?

Unlike some other forms of regulation, there is a ceiling on natural gas prices, but not a floor. Nothing in the law prevents charging less than the upper limit set by a friendly regulatory agency.

Are we really supposed to believe that these producers are just waiting for the magic of deregulation to lower their prices?

This Administration stretches the limits of credulity. Surely if Congress wants to bring down costs to consumers, it would be better advised to pass legislation that would roll back price ceilings and extend meaningful price controls so as to assure both a fair return for producers and pipelines and fairer prices for America's consumers.

Fortunately, Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and a bipartisan group of his colleagues have proposed just that.

Excessive natural gas prices are stifling economic recovery as well as imposing new burdens on recession victims.

The proposed Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act is the answer, not a reckless deregulation.

Congress has a choice. But families that must heat and cook with natural gas don't.

Just an Old Softy

NEVER LET IT be said that our utility companies and the Reagan Administration are indifferent to the hardships of the unemployed and the needy when confronted with sharply higher gas bills.

The President, of course, has stressed the importance of reliance on private charity rather than government action to help the needy. And the Columbia Gas Co. in West Virginia is doing its share too.

Rep. Robert E. Wise, Jr. (D-W.Va.) enlightened his colleagues in the House as to how the utility is dealing with the problem of customers who can't afford to pay their bills.

In mailing out its bills, it has included a separate form inviting customers to make a donation to a fund called, Help the Needy Keep the Heat On. As Congressman Wise noted, the utility isn't matching the donation or offering any concession. It merely wants its customers who aren't destitute to pay the bills of those who are.

How kindly.

Whoever said utility companies don't have a heart?

Hard-pressed households can't meet steep gas bills

By Press Associates, Inc.

Although unusually mild in most regions of the nation, this winter has meant extreme hardship for millions of American households.

Climbing natural gas prices have been a special problem. Used by well over half the nation's low-income households, gas has risen in cost by an average 25 percent this winter, and by 40 percent and 60 percent in some areas. Areas of high unemployment have been among the hardest hit.

As many as 300,000 families have faced gas shut-offs for part or all of the winter because of their inability to pay gas bills, according to the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition.

In addition to an "alarming" increase in shut-offs, "utility bill arrearages are now snow-balling, raising a serious question of whether many households will ever be able to catch up with their utility costs," the National Consumer Law Center reported.

Although natural gas prices have climbed by about 150 percent since the beginning of price decontrol in 1978, the Low-Income Energy Assistance (LIEA) program has remained at the same inadequate funding level.

Some of the victims

The plight of those caught between rising fuel bills and fixed incomes was profiled recently by the Consumer Law Center. These people include:

- Eileen Choiniere, 39, of Pittsfield, Mass., is disabled and receives $407-a-month in SSI (Supplementary Security Income) benefits. Her gas bills are averaging 40-50 percent of her SSI check. Rent takes another 45 percent of her income, leaving only 5 to 15 percent for food, clothing and medical needs.
- Matthew and Mary Bostick of St. Louis live with their daughter and three grandchildren in a four-room house. Their total family monthly income is $739. Their gas was cut off last April due to an unpaid bill of $870. Their only heat comes from donated space heaters. The couple suffers from arthritis. In December they received $184 in energy assistance, but the gas company won't reconnect them until they are totally paid up.

Actually, only about a third of 20 million low-income households eligible receive help in paying their heating bills from the LIEA program, according to government figures. The average assistance was only $182.

Administration cuts

Since it began in 1980, the program has been funded at less than $2 billion annually. Congress resisted Reagan Administration attempts to cut LIEA, already shrunk by inflation. For the coming fiscal year, the Administration wants to cut funding by over a third.

A recent study by the Consumer Law Center called "Out In The Cold" looked at the predicament of the jobless. "After the average unemployed worker has paid his home energy bill, there will not be enough left for other necessary expenses," it found.

In 19 states, jobless workers fortunate enough to be receiving unemployment benefits have less than $100 per week left for basic necessities, the study said. In 14 states, less than $75 remains, and in five states, less than $50-a-week.

"The situation is even worse for the millions of senior citizens and disabled persons who depend on SSI," the report said.

The LIEA program originally was supposed to be funded at a fixed percentage of the windfall profits revenue from oil and gas decontrol. Congress should fulfill that promise and double the program's funding.

Congress also should enact proposed legislation to boost funding for weatherization as part of a jobs package. To do less will put increasing numbers of Americans "out in the cold."

Presidential hopefuls

year but died in the Republican Senate. However, 70 House Republicans joined all but five Democrats in supporting the bill despite the Administration's opposition.

It would authorize $60 million for the balance of this year and $300 million a year thereafter for two programs employing young people on conservation, improvement and rehabilitation projects on public lands, Indian reservations and in urban areas.

Youth programs

One program would be aimed at summer work by youths 15-21. An older group, 16 to 26, would be employed for year-round programs.

With deadlines nearing for decisions of the Fiscal 1984 budget, Speaker O'Neill announced plans for a series of Democratic caucuses through mid-March to develop what he termed a "coherent" party program for "maximum economic growth and maximum fairness." One of the issues will be whether to press for tax changes, including a cap on the income tax reduction scheduled for next July, that would fund needed job creation programs.

Along with the emergency job funds, the House approved a non-controversial $5 billion appropriation sought by the Administration for advances to recession-depleted state unemployment insurance trust funds.

Scheduled for early action, as part of the social security measure being readied for the House floor, is a committee-approved extension of the federal supplemental unemployment insurance program. It would allow up to 10 additional weeks of benefits for persons who have already used up their entitlement under the present program, but at a reduced rate of two-thirds of regular benefits.

The social security bill approved by the House Ways & Means Committee includes with only minor changes the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform—supported by the AFL-CIO with the exception of the inclusion of new federal employees in the system.

Stand-off

A subcommittee that first acted on the measure included a "compromise" to deal with long-term financing that drew sharp criticism both from liberals opposed to a future change in the benefit formula and from conservatives who want to raise the retirement age rather than raise taxes or allow borrowing from general Treasury funds.

The committee is expected to seek a rule that will allow the House to vote on various options on the long-term funding issue.

Federal workers' charity drive bans advocacy groups

The once-a-year charity drive among federal and postal workers will be limited to the traditional health and welfare agencies and groups providing direct assistance to individuals and families.

The effect of a new presidential Executive Order, Office of Personnel Management Director Donald J. Devine said, will be to disqualify "advocacy groups, both left and right, that have been admitted to the Combined Federal Campaign."

The exact bounds of the 1983 campaign will be determined by OPM rules to implement the executive order, and decisions made on the qualifying organizations. But Devine made clear that the eligible organizations won't include the anti-union National Right to Work Committee.

Last year, a storm of protests from government workers and their unions followed the decision of an Administration-dominated advisory board to allow the Right to Work Committee's Legal Defense Fund and a flock of other far-right organizations to take part in the on-the-job solicitation.

Other groups

The Administration's defense at the time was that other "advocacy" groups, mostly with civil rights orientation, had previously been allowed into the campaign.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council promptly charged that inclusion of the union-hating group "totally perverts the concept of charity." With the assurance that groups such as the Right to Work fund would not be included in the United Way umbrella, the council stopped short of urging a boycott and instead called on employees to designate their contributions to make sure that these groups wouldn't get funds intended for a legitimate charity.

Community Services Director Walter G. Davis said the AFL-CIO will carefully scrutinize the draft regulations that OPM is preparing and make proposals for any needed changes.

Don't call us

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Meeting with the AFL-CIO Executive Council is not an "automatic privilege" of a Secretary of Labor, Federation President Lane Kirkland stressed to reporters.

Responding to suggestions from the press that the council had slighted Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan by not inviting him to its winter meeting here, Kirkland pointed out that in recent years, only two secretaries had met with the council more than once—George Shultz and Ray Marshall.

Besides Donovan, James Hodgson, Peter Brennan and W. J. Usery each appeared once, while John Dunlop did not meet with the council at all while he was Secretary of Labor.

Big Steel accord paves way for modernization of plants

The union and the companies "did their thing," and now it's up to the government" to do its part, Odorcich said.

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, recuperating from a heart ailment, said he was pleased that an agreement was reached, and that the integrity of 40 years of collective bargaining in the industry was preserved.

Highlights of the settlement include:

- An immediate reduction in base hourly wages by $1.25, that will be restored in steps of 40 cents Feb. 1, 1984; 40 cents Feb. 1, 1985, and 45 cents Feb. 1, 1986.
- The cost of living adjustment formula remains unchanged, but adjustments will be foregone from now until July 31, 1984. Between Aug. 1, 1984, and July 31, 1985, if the Consumer Price Index rises 4 percent above its March 1984 level, COLA will resume under the existing formula of 1 cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the CPI. Adjustments will be fully restored by the end of the pact.
- Companies will increase their contributions to SUB funds from 17.5 cents an hour worked to 67.5 cents until Feb. 1, 1986, and 42.5 cents thereafter. Eligibility for guaranteed partial SUB payments, if the funds are exhausted, are expanded to cover more workers.
- Premium pay for Sundays will be reduced from time-and-a-half to time-and-a-quarter, but the higher rate goes back into effect May 1, 1986.
- Employees eligible for at least two weeks vacation in 1983 will forego one week this year only.
- Extended vacations (13 weeks for senior workers every five years) will be phased out permanently as will vacation bonuses paid to workers who choose to take off in non-peak months.
- As of October 1983, one paid holiday, United Nations Day, will be discontinued.
- The companies agreed to "apply the savings received from the moderations contained in this agreement exclusively to the needs of existing facilities covered by this agreement." The companies will provide annual reports to the union on how much they have saved as a result of the contract concessions and how the money was spent.

Early retirement

In other contract provisions, the union also gained an improved early retirement incentive. Workers aged 60 with at least 30 years of service, who retire before May 1, will be eligible for a $400 monthly supplement to regular pensions until they reach 62, or for at least 12 months, whichever is later, to a maximum of 21 months.

The union said some 10,000 members could be eligible, and if "significant numbers" take advantage of the new benefit, many younger workers now on layoff could be called back.

Over 140,000 Steelworkers are jobless and an estimated 21,000 more are working short hours.

Pension and health benefits were not reduced, and language was added to change the way pension benefits are calculated so that no one will be penalized by the temporary wage cut.

Job security improved

Improvements were also made in the rights of laid-off workers to retain seniority and to transfer to other plants. Provisions were added to reduce the contracting-out of work, like maintenance and new construction, during times of heavy layoffs.

The contracts cover some 266,000 Steelworkers employed by U.S. Steel Corp., Bethlehem Steel Corp., Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., National Steel Corp., Republic Steel Corp., Inland Steel Co. and Armco, Inc.

The agreement sets the pattern for about 200 smaller steel companies.

It applies "in full force" to all non-steel producing, non-raw materials units at the companies, but provisions are included for an early review of any special problems in those units. USWA said other local bargaining matters were also nearly wrapped up.

Although the previous contract had until Aug. 1 to run, both parties agreed to reopen bargaining early, partly to make sure they had a settlement before large U.S. customers began placing their 1983 orders. Some companies had hinted they would shop for steel overseas.

The union and the major companies had come to the bargaining table twice in 1982, but both times the union turned down company demands for cuts much deeper than concessions agreed to in the new pact.

Home foreclosure turns 'dream' into nightmare

By David L. Perlman

John Warnic's dream turned into a nightmare, but the testimony he gave to a House Banking subcommittee helped dislodge a labor-supported bill that could save tens of thousands of other recession victims from losing their homes.

When Warnic returned from Vietnam to a job as a tractor operator at the Jones & Laughlin steel plant in Aliquippa, Pa., he knew what he wanted most.

His "dream," he testified, was "to start a family, own a home." And it came about, but for all too short a time.

Warnic and his wife skimped and saved until they had enough money to put down a payment and move into their $37,000 dream home.

"We owned it for four years," he said wistfully. Then came the layoff, despite 19 years of seniority, and the nightmare began.

Stretched out

There was just no way to stretch unemployment insurance benefits to cover mortgage payments and all of their other expenses.

"With help from friends, relatives, I hung in there for a while," Warnic testified. Then, it became "impossible." The utility company wanted $100 "or they were going to shut my gas off. The same with the water, the same with the electricity. I had to give the home up."

Even now, he testified, the mortgage company is suing him. "They want court costs. They want attorney fees."

Since his return from Vietnam, Warnic told the subcommittee, "I never had anything more than a parking ticket. I did my share."

Another laid-off Steelworker, George Dowell, came from Baltimore to add his first-hand testimony to the plight of jobless Americans who can't keep up mortgage payments.

Dowell hasn't lost his home yet. But after a year and a half of unemployment, his benefits have run out and only emergency help from his union, USWA Local 2609, staved off foreclosure.

Last hope

"Where do you go with five children? You can't sleep in the car," he said. "So you are my last hope," he told the members of Congress.

Long unemployment also means loss of health insurance, and Dowell explained what that means: "My boy had to be taken to the hospital for stitches. I went there

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Minnesota jobs train

Packed with 200 unemployed workers, the Minnesota AFL-CIO's "Union Train for Jobs" drives home labor's call for more state and federal job programs. The train made the trip from St. Paul to Duluth for a Mar. 5 statewide jobs rally that drew nearly 5,000 persons and got a promise from state legislators that a jobs measure would be passed in the current session of the legislature.

House votes to lift retirement age for full social security

The House adopted the bipartisan recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform to assure the solvency of the nation's primary pension system. But on a key 228-202 vote it added to the package a labor-opposed amendment that will compel most workers now in the labor force to postpone retirement or take a cut in benefits.

Before the vote, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned House members that the proposal to raise the retirement age to 67, in a phase-in that would start in the year 2003, would "break faith" with workers who should be able to "count on the benefits which they have been promised and for which they are paying."

It would also compel immediate reshaping of many private pension plans, Kirkland said, and would penalize the large number of workers who are forced into early retirement by poor health or unemployment.

Kirkland was a member of the Social Security Reform Commission and concurred in all its recommendations except for the inclusion of newly hired federal and postal workers under social security, starting next January.

Accelerated increases

Supporters of the federal worker position sought to delay action on that recommendation until a satisfactory pension supplement through the Civil Service Retirement System could be legislated.

But the bill was considered by the House under a restrictive rule that barred all amendments except for the retirement age proposal and a labor-supported alternative that would have substituted a future rise in the payroll tax.

Also included in the package that the Senate will now take up are an extension of the federal supplemental unemployment compensation program, which is due to expire Mar. 31, and a new method of paying hospitals for care of Medicare patients.

Added benefits

The unemployment insurance provision, although short of labor's standards of adequacy, will enable persons who have exhausted all available benefits to draw up to 10 weeks additional payments. And persons who have not yet received federal supplemental payments will be able during the balance of this fiscal year to draw from eight to 14 weeks of federal payments, depending on the severity of unemployment in their states.

Many of labor's objections to the Administration's original proposal to pay hospitals flat fees based on anticipated costs of treating patients for various categories of illness were resolved in the version adopted by the Ways & Means Committee and included in the social security legislative package. AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman viewed the final version as "much improved."

In the battle over the retirement age, a key issue was whether a drastic change that would amount to a significant cut in benefits should be adopted in order to deal with a long-term projection of the funding problems the social security system will encounter in the 21st Century.

Jobless rate holds at 10.4% as recession signs persist

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment remained unchanged at 10.4 percent in February, reflecting the continuing recession and the need for quick government action to spur direct job creation.

"The new unemployment figures show clearly that the chance at a job has not improved for American workers," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared.

Organized labor is seeking a massive infusion of federal funds to put unemployed Americans back to work. Kirkland said that congressional action to create jobs must surpass the "beginning step" $4.9 billion emergency job-funding bill passed by the House.

"The road to recovery has to be paved with results, not minor tinkering and wishful thinking," he said. "Employment is the 'indicator' that really counts."

The February unemployment data released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics revealed further signs of deterioration in the jobs market:

- The participation rate showing what proportion of the civilian population is employed dropped off by one-tenth of 1 percent, to 57.1 percent, indicating a slight withdrawal of people from the labor force.
- Civilian employment fell by 40,000 to

ILO scores Poland's union-busting

Geneva—The International Labor Organization charged that Poland's workers remain strapped in a totalitarian strait jacket despite the suspension of martial law and set an Apr. 15 deadline for Poland to provide "full and satisfactory" information on the fate of Solidarity members.

This was the thrust of the vote by which the ILO's Governing Body of worker, employer and government delegates adopted a report of its Committee on Freedom of Association.

While noting that the Polish government had suspended martial law since the Governing Body last met, the committee said that the "trade union activities which can be carried out in Poland today are still of a very limited nature."

Soviet bloc opposition

This new condemnation of the flouting by Poland's military regime of the ILO conventions on the right of workers to organize independent trade unions and to bargain collectively was opposed only by the Governing Body's four Soviet bloc representatives.

They cast dissenting votes as the Governing Body endorsed the committee's report and its accompanying ultimatum by a 46 to 4 count, with four abstentions.

Under the ultimatum, Poland has until Apr. 15 to receive a special envoy of ILO Sec.-Gen. Francis Blanchard to make an on-the-spot study of the fate of trade unionists and to determine the amendments needed to bring the labor code imposed by Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski into conformity with the 150-nation ILO's conventions.

The Governing Body seconded the warning of its committee that Poland's failure to meet the deadline will oblige the ILO to resort to its ultimate weapon against recalcitrant member states: the naming of an independent committee of Labor's strong opposition to a proposal that would bring all new postal and federal employees hired after Jan. 1, 1984, under the social security system is spelled out by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at a Postal Workers legislative conference in Washington. "This is just another example of us having to waste our substance, not to gain new benefits, but just to hold on to what we have," Donahue told the thousands of APWU members. APWU President Moe Biller warned that the civil service retirement system will lose one of its main funding sources if Congress decides to put the proposal into effect as part of the social security reform package.

Postal workers rally

a seasonally adjusted 99.1 million, about the level that has prevailed since last October. By another measure, the number of people holding down jobs last month fell by 180,000.

- The number of unemployed civilian workers, meanwhile, increased four-tenths of 1 percent, or by 44,000, to an adjusted 11,490,000 after falling 4.9 percent in January, or 590,000, to 11,446,000.
- While there was little over-the-month change in unemployment among the major labor force groups last month, the exception was a three-tenths of 1 percent increase in the jobless rate for adult men. The rate for these traditional breadwinners was 9.9 percent in February.
- The length of the average workweek declined sharply to 34.4 hours from 35.1 hours in January. The drop followed a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent from December to January. Shorter workweeks last month were recorded in manufacturing, wholesale-retail trade and services.

BLS does not include part-time workers and so-called "discouraged" workers in its calculation of unemployment. If it did, the count of joblessness would be much higher.

Reported by the government on a quarterly basis, the number of discouraged workers—those who have given up looking for jobs because they think none is to be found—was 1,849,000 at the end of December. The number of workers employed part time in February because they could not find full-time work was 6,481,000.

16.7 million jobless

AFL-CIO economists calculate that if one-half the number of part-time workers plus all the discouraged workers were added to the official BLS count, the jobless rate last month was 14.8 percent with 16.7 million people unemployed.

Since the start of the Reagan Recession in July 1981, factory payroll jobs have declined by 2.2 million. About 550,000 of the jobs lost were in the steel, auto, textiles, and apparel industries.

Of the 11.5 million people officially out of work last month, half were adult men, 34 percent adult women, and 16 percent teenagers. Although the median duration of unemployment declined in February to 9.6 weeks, the number of persons unemployed for six months or longer remained at 6.7 million.

There was some improvement for black workers last month. Their jobless rate dropped from 20.8 to 19.7 percent, with the gain shared equally by men and women. Black teenage unemployment, however, was 45.4 percent.

Among whites, the jobless rate rose slightly from 9.1 to 9.2 percent; for Hispanics, the unemployment rate continued to inch upward, rising from 15.5 to 15.8 percent over the month.

National policy urged to govern cable television

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The rapid spread of cable television systems calls for the development of a national policy to assure that such systems first "serve the general public interest rather than any particular interest," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

In a resolution referred to it by the 1981 convention, the council pledged that the AFL-CIO will work for legislation and regulations to govern cable television. The council said these should assure, among other things, that public access channels are made available on a non-discriminatory basis and that where cable systems have enough channel capacity, a share is reserved for organized labor to distribute programming from local and national sources.

Another referred resolution, approved by the council with an amendment, reaffirms support of improved educational opportunities for workers and endorses the concept of "education advisers" to help workers continue their education, such as the Labor Education Advisory Services of the Dept. for Professional Employees.

In other action on resolutions referred by the convention, the council voted nonconcurrence with a measure dealing with "highly technical matters relating to radiation protection standards" and held in abeyance resolutions relating to the Typographical Union's dispute with the Paterson, N.J., News and to congressional and state legislative redistricting. The council found that developments and policy positions adopted since the convention have eliminated the need for action on resolutions dealing with AT&T, airline deregulation and tax policies affecting U.S.-flag shipping.

Sanctions lifted from Retail-Wholesale Union

Sanctions required under the AFL-CIO International Disputes Plan have been removed from the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, President Lane Kirkland has informed federation affiliates.

Kirkland said the union "has fulfilled in all respects" the requirements of Section 16 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution dealing with removal of sanctions imposed for non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire. The sanctions had been imposed on May 13, 1982.

The RWDSU is now "in full compliance with Article XX and entitled to full protection under the Internal Disputes Plan as well as all other rights enjoyed by AFL-CIO affiliates in good standing," Kirkland said.

Mediation proves successful in settling internal disputes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A marked increase in the successful resolution of internal disputes through mediation occurred in 1982, the first year in which disputes were handled by a permanent mediator.

In his annual report to the Executive Council on the operation of the Internal Disputes Plan under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue noted that since the plan was instituted in 1962, mediation has proved successful in settling 1,248 cases, or 56.3 percent of the total.

Since February 1982 when John N. Gentry became permanent mediator under the plan, the mediation process has brought resolution of 32 cases, or 71 percent of the total.

The report showed that 60 new cases were filed during 1982 and 29 remained pending at the end of the year. Umpires' determinations found violations in five cases and no violations in eight, with two cases pending at that level.

Appeals pending

Fourteen appeals were pending at the start of the period and eight new appeals were filed. At the subcommittee level, the determinations of impartial umpires were sustained in 13 cases, appeals were withdrawn in two cases and seven remained pending.

There were 24 non-compliance complaints pending at the start of the period and two filed during the year. Subcommittee action achieved compliance in three cases and found non-compliance in one. Two complaints were withdrawn, and eight cases remained actively pending, while 12 others were listed as non-active.

Four affiliates were listed as in non-compliance and subject to Article XX sanctions: the International Typographical Union, the Graphic Arts International Union, the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians, and the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Sanctions have since been removed from the RWDSU. (Story, this page.)

Extensions granted

In other actions, the Executive Council approved recommendations of its Article XX Review Committee to grant a number of extensions of Article XX jurisdictional protection in situations where active organizing campaigns are under way but election petitions cannot be filed because of contract restrictions or other rules.

The affiliates involved in these extensions are the State, County & Municipal Employees—Massachusetts State Service Unit 5 to August 1984; City of Lawrence, Mass., to September 1985; Warm Springs, Mont., State Hospital to August 1983; Massachusetts State Service Unit 9 to August 1984; Maine State Employees Operators & Maintenance Unit to August 1983; and Gibralter, Mich., School District to August 1983.

Also, Firemen & Oilers—Prince Georges County, Md., School Employees to August 1983, and Utility Workers—Jim Bridger Coal Mine, Rock Springs, Wyo., to August 1984.

1982 action

At its August 1982 meeting, the council approved three-year extensions of Article XX protection to unions engaged in active campaigns to recapture bargaining rights. These include AFSCME—Governor's State University in Illinois; Peoria, Ill., Sanitary District; Aurora, Ill., police; Northern Illinois University clericals; Jackson County, Mo., jail and juvenile court employees; Massachusetts State Service Unit 3; Eastern Illinois University clericals; and Rhode Island correction officers.

Also, Air Line Pilots—Continental Airlines flight attendants and Wien Air Alaska flight attendants; Auto Workers—Royal Typewriter plants in Connecticut; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—St. Joseph's Hospital, Tacoma, Wash., technicians' unit; and Machinists—Giddings & Lewis, Fond du Lac, Wis.

'Yes, We're Planning House Calls!'

Federation endorses illegal alien barriers coupled with amnesty

By Susan Dunlop

With some modifications, a new immigration bill being considered by Senate and House committees should become law, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged.

The AFL-CIO has been a long-time supporter of better immigration laws that are "consistent with the needs and goals of American workers" and that deal compassionately with the problems of illegal aliens and refugees, Kirkland told a Senate Subcommittee on Immigration.

He said the bill, introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), similar to a measure the Senate passed in the last Congress, contains a number of provisions that the AFL-CIO believes are essential.

These include a prohibition against hiring illegal aliens, backed by penalties for any employer who does, and by a forgery-proof identification system for all legal workers.

House measure

A companion bill has been introduced by the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli (D-Ky.), and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presented the federation's position before that panel.

The AFL-CIO also supports a "generous" legalization program for undocumented workers already long-settled here, protections against discrimination in hiring for all legal alien workers, tightening up of existing temporary work visa programs, and better funding and staffing for the Immigration & Naturalization Service, Kirkland testified.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO strongly opposes any kind of "guest worker" or "bracero" schemes calculated to undercut U.S. wages and working conditions.

The AFL-CIO testimony also called for humane and "color blind" enforcement of immigration and refugee laws, pointing to the "widespread perception" that Haitian refugees have been mistreated in the United States.

Legal recourse

The bill should be modified to make it possible for private parties to sue employers who knowingly and repeatedly hire illegal workers or who discriminate against legal alien workers, and the Attorney General should be given authority to obtain injunctions against such employers, Kirkland said.

He also called for stronger language to assure that worker verification documents cannot be held back, or revoked, from anyone—except on the grounds that the worker is proven after due process of law to be in the country illegally. Donahue made the same points in his testimony.

The AFL-CIO testimony urged that the bill's "two tier" legalization program be scrapped in favor of a more generous plan. The measure would now grant permanent resident status to illegal aliens who came to this country before Jan. 1, 1977, but only temporary residence to those who entered between that date and Jan. 1, 1980.

Kirkland cautioned that such a system "offering citizenship in different degrees" would create "a host of human and administrative problems" and continue the victimization of an "underclass made up of those whose fear of deportation makes them vulnerable to exploitation by unscrupulous employers."

Jobs magnet

The Select Committee on Immigration & Refugee Policy, which completed a two-year study of the problem in 1980, concluded that the lure of jobs is the biggest magnet that has drawn the estimated three to six million illegal aliens to the United States.

The most important deterrent to illegal immigration is employer sanctions, Kirkland said, but he told the committee that "any bill worth passing" must deal with the fears that enactment of sanctions will lead to discrimination in hiring.

A counterfeit-proof identification system for all legal workers would give employers an easy way to verify who is eligible to be hired, but it must be backed by protections so that employers can't use the fear of the penalties as an excuse not to hire legal aliens or other citizens who "look foreign."

Universal coverage needed

Although the current bill offers some safeguards, it falls short, Kirkland said, when it provides an exemption from the requirement for checking documents to companies that employ three or fewer workers. The "universality" of that requirement is an "indispensable" protection, he stressed.

Kirkland underscored the AFL-CIO's continuing strong objection to any form of "guest worker" program, and he called for stricter limitations on existing temporary work visa regulations.

Kirkland brushed aside claims made by agricultural employers that they are so dependent on a steady supply of both undocumented and "H-2" workers that they will suffer if their supplies are cut off.

"We cannot comprehend such an argument at a time of unprecedented unemployment and want. We know first hand, we read in the daily press, and we see on television great numbers of persons pleading for a job, any job," Kirkland said.

He warned that enforcement must remain a federal function and urged increased funding for border patrols and other Immigration & Naturalization Service protection. That "long under-funded and under-staffed agency" needs better pay, improved working conditions and the resolution of long-standing labor-management disputes, Kirkland said.

For immigration reform

AFL-CIO Pres. Lane Kirkland testifies on immigration bills at Senate hearings. With him are Legislative Director Ray Denison, right, and Special Counsel Laurence Gold. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presented similar testimony at House hearings.

House social security vote would raise retirement age

Labor supported the approach taken by Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), which was backed also by the broad-based Save Our Security coalition. It would have scheduled a rise of 0.53 percentage points in the employer-employee payroll tax, starting in the year 2010. This approach would have enabled Congress to eliminate the tax rise if conditions should allow.

This could occur if long-term projections turn out faulty, as they have in the past or a future Congress decides instead to inject a share of direct government payment into the social security trust funds—a step long urged by the AFL-CIO.

The proposal to raise the retirement age was initiated by Rep. Jake Pickle (D-Tex.), chairman of the Ways & Means subcommittee dealing with social security. But it was essentially a Republican proposal, endorsed by the GOP leadership and strongly opposed by House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. On the rollcall, 152 Republicans and 76 Democrats supported the rise in the retirement age. It was opposed by 188 Democrats and 14 Republicans.

The Pepper amendment was then beaten, 296-132. If both proposals had been rejected, the House would have been left with a compromise version included in the Ways & Means Committee bill that would have combined a small future tax rise with a subsequent reduction in the formula for computing benefit payments.

As passed by the House, the higher retirement age would affect persons reaching the age of 65 by the year 2003.

Starting in that year, the age at which social security benefits can be paid to retirees without an actuarial reduction would be raised by two months a year, reaching age 66 in the year 2009. It would remain at that level until 2027, when a new phase-in would raise the age to 67 by the year 2027. Persons retiring at age 62 would have benefits reduced on an earlier schedule, starting in the year 2000.

Workers could still draw benefits if they retire at age 62. But their checks would amount to 70 percent of full benefits instead of the present 80 percent.

The Senate will be considering the social security package without any restrictions on amendments. But the Republican leadership is expected to resist any major deviation from the House version.

Revenue raisers

While the spotlight in the House debate was on the controversial retirement age issue, the bulk of the bill dealt with revenue-raising measures recommended by the bipartisan commission. By themselves, they would meet the system's needs for the near future and two-thirds of the projected long-term deficit.

These are the principal ingredients:

- The cost-of-living adjustment that is due this July would be delayed until January. Future adjustments would then be paid each January.
- Higher-income beneficiaries will be taxed on one-half of their social security benefits, which are now fully tax-free. This would affect only those whose taxable income (including one-half of social security benefits) exceeds $25,000 for an individual or $32,000 for a couple.
- Employees of all non-profit organizations would be brought under the social security system. State and local government agencies that have chosen to come under social security coverage would not be allowed to withdraw from the system, as they now can. Starting next January, newly hired federal and postal employees would be covered by social security.
- There would be a slight acceleration of payroll tax increases already scheduled. Next year, employers would pay at 7 percent instead of 6.7 percent but the government would contribute to the social security fund an amount equal to the added tax on employees. The only other change would come in 1988 and 1989, when the now scheduled 7.15 percent rate would be raised to 7.51 percent.
- Self-employed persons would have to pay the combined employer-employee payroll tax, instead of three-fourths of that amount. But they could deduct the half of the tax normally paid by the employer as a business expense.
- The benefit formula would be changed to eliminate "windfall" benefits to persons whose retirement income comes from pension systems for non-covered employment such as civil service retirement.
- The government would make a one-time payment to compensate the social security funds for the costs of benefits based on military service and for the value of uncashed social security checks.

OSHA noise rule called ineffective

The Reagan Administration's revised noise exposure regulation was branded a "watered-down ear-plug standard" that would provide workers no effective protection from hearing loss.

AFL-CIO industrial hygienist Margaret Seminario charged that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's amended provisions which take effect Apr. 7 "are a sad commentary" on a 1975 proposal to reduce workplace noise.

OSHA said employers will save $81.4 million per year over the costs assessed to the noise standard issued in the waning days of the Carter Administration. That standard was among a number of regulations "frozen" by President Reagan's Executive Order in 1981.

"OSHA's claim that the revised regulation offers the same protection at less cost just isn't true," Seminario said.

The new standard provides less comprehensive employee training and record-keeping and more leeway for industry in conducting the hearing conservation programs of noise monitoring and hearing testing.

OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter said the largest savings would come from changes in the noise monitoring and the audiometric testing requirements. Companies will be allowed to provide area monitoring with a fixed location device, rather than attaching monitors to each worker. Individual monitoring would only be required where area monitoring is deemed "inappropriate."

OSHA contended that the new rules will reduce work-related hearing loss from about 1 million cases to just one-sixth that amount.

"What's really needed to protect workers—and what the labor movement has been seeking for more than 10 years—is a noise standard that actually reduces workplace noise exposure levels through engineering methods," Seminario said. "Unfortunately, under this Administration, such real protection is highly unlikely, and hundreds of thousands of workers will unnecessarily suffer hearing loss."

The 1974 standard on noise, which was largely unenforced, had a 90-decibel, time-weighted limit on a worker's exposure for an eight-hour day. That limit is now set at 85 decibels, but the method of reducing noise exposure has been to shield the worker's ears from the noise, rather than to reduce the noise-level that emanates from the workplace machinery, Seminario said.

OSHA estimated that implementation of the standard will cost industry less than $40 a year per worker. The rule will cover only 5.1 million workers.

Pension safeguards

Railroad retirement changes are supported by the Railway Labor Executives' Association at House hearings. From left, RLEA Chairman Fred A. Hardin, Counsel William G. Mahoney and Ole M. Berge, chairman of RLEA's retirement committee, stressed the effect unemployment has had on the pension fund.

Investment trust approved to fund union-built housing

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Housing Investment Trust has been authorized by the Securities & Exchange Commission to begin operations, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue reported to the Executive Council at its winter meeting.

Donahue also released a prospectus for the trust, spelling out its purpose as a vehicle for the investment of union labor pension funds in long-term housing mortgage loans insured or guaranteed by the government.

The loans will finance union-built single-family home, rental housing projects and nursing homes. By increasing the amount of financing available for such projects, the trust will create job opportunities for union workers in the construction trades and supplier industries while stimulating the production of needed housing.

The Housing Investment Trust is an entity separate and distinct from the AFL-CIO's existing Mortgage Investment Trust, which is engaged in financing federally insured construction loans, generally short-term loans to contractors. The new Housing Trust will concentrate on long-term first mortgages with interest rates within the prevailing market range.

The Declaration of Trust filed with the SEC specifies that lending operations will not begin until $10 million worth of shares have been purchased by investors.

The Housing Investment Trust has been more than two years in development. Besides Donahue, its joint board of trustees includes AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Vice Presidents Lloyd McBride, J. C. Turner, John Sweeney and Patrick Campbell, and Robert Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., with provision for seven management trustees.

Neutral member

The neutral chairman is Floyd Hyde, former Under Secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and a former mayor of Fresno, Calif., who is now a consultant to a number of city governments.

At a recent meeting, the trustees appointed John Evans to serve as chief executive officer and financial manager of the Housing Investment Trust. Evans is a former secretary of the Arizona AFL-CIO and for several years was manager of the federation's Mortgage Investment Trust before entering government service. He has been assistant to the Secretary of HUD for labor relations and head of the Federal Housing Administration office in Phoenix.

Union-management plan

House panel supports rail pension changes

A union-management plan to avert a sharp cutback in railroad retirement benefits has won the support of the House Energy & Commerce Committee despite Administration objections to some of its provisions.

Recession-linked unemployment, coming on top of the long-term decline in railroad jobs, has created a funding crisis that will compel a sharp reduction in benefits next October unless additional revenues are found.

The plan negotiated by railroad unions and management includes higher payroll tax on both workers and employers. It trims back retirement benefits and raises the minimum age for retirement with full pension after 30 years of service from 60 to 62.

Other provisions include government payment of an overdue obligation to the retirement fund and authorization for Treasury borrowing to meet unemployment insurance obligations.

Unemployment factor

In the railroad industry, unemployment insurance is funded through the retirement fund, not by the states, and the big jump in unemployment has both severely drained the fund and sharply reduced its revenues.

In testimony before the committee, the Railway Labor Executives' Association, stressed the impact of a 25 percent reduction in railroad employment between July 1981 and January 1983.

Ole M. Berge, president of the Maintenance of Way Employees and chairman of the RLEA's retirement committee, said railroad employment during that period had dropped from 514,000 to 338,000 while the number of retired workers drawing pensions has reached the one million mark.

40-percent cut

As required by law, the Railroad Retirement Board has served notice that under existing funding, "Tier II" benefits would have to be cut 40 percent this October and another 40 percent a year later.

The retirement system's Tier I benefits are comparable to social security and Tier II represents the equivalent of a private pension plan. While the entire system is financed by the industry and its employees, it is administered by the government's Railroad Retirement Board and its tax structure and entitlements are written into federal law.

Railroad union and management officials stress that part of the system's funding problems has stemmed from a congressional decision to allow dual payments to persons with working time under both social security and railroad retirement coverage and guaranteed the payments.

Past obligations

The dual payments were large eliminated in 1981 but past obligations are still owed by the government, the parties contend.

The House committee agreed and included in the bill a $2 billion federal payment to make up for this.

Railroad workers are not covered by state unemployment insurance program. Their unemployment and sickness benefits of $25 a day for most workers are paid through an unemployment insurance fund financed by an employer-paid payroll tax, currently amounting to 8 percent of the first $400-a-month of wages.

Funds from Treasury

Because of the sharp rise in unemployment, this fund has had to borrow from the separate retirement fund in order to meet obligations. A feature of the pending legislation, which the Administration opposes, would allow direct borrowing from the Treasury to meet unemployment insurance obligations.

For Tier I benefits—essentially social security coverage—both employees and employers pay 6.7 percent of earnings.

The Tier II additional pension benefits are now funded by an employer tax of 11.75 percent and an employee tax of 2 percent, both on a wage base slightly under the social security maximum.

Under the agreed-on legislative proposal, the Tier II payroll tax would be raised 1 percent for employers and three-fourths of 1 percent for workers on July 1, 1984, increased by that rate again the following year, with a third-year increase in July 1986 if necessary for the fiscal health of the fund.

Deferred adjustment

Other money-saving adjustments would include a six-month deferral of cost-of-living adjustments to retirees paralleling the one-time COLA delay provided in the social security bill that was passed by the House.

A joint statement by Berge and RLEA Chairman Fred Hardin said the legislation is urgently needed to prevent a substantial reduction in payments to the one million beneficiaries and to assure future benefits for active employees.

The program's financial crisis, they stressed, was brought about by the severity of the recession, which reduced revenue to the retirement and unemployment funds by 25 percent over just 18 months.

While the legislation has cleared the House committee with primary jurisdiction, its tax features must still be acted on by members of the Ways & Means Committee.

Dock union upheld on containers

The National Labor Relations Board reversed itself on the long-disputed cargo containerization rules negotiated by the Longshoremen and management shipping associations, saying they have the lawful objective of preserving work traditionally performed by ILA members and do not violate the Taft-Hartley Act.

A three-member NLRB panel, including former Chairman John C. Miller, unanimously enclosed the October 1981 decision of its administrative law judge, Joel Harmatz, who had upheld the legality of the "Rules on Containers" as a valid "work preservation" device intended to cushion the impact of containerization on waterfront employment.

Harmatz had also upheld the ILA and the shippers on a second major point—the right of shipping lines to control the containers they own or lease, and negotiate contracts denying the use of those containers to off-pier consolidators using non-ILA labor.

50-mile rule

In his recommended decision, which the board has now affirmed, Harmatz upheld the rule which provided that containers with freight of more than one shipper moving to or from a point within 50 miles of a port must be "stripped and stuffed"—the waterfront term for unpacking and loading the containers—by ILA members at the piers.

At the same time, the NLRB agreed with Harmatz's finding that the rules were applied unlawfully to certain motor carrier and warehouse practices in the ports of Baltimore, Miami, and Hampton Roads, Va.

Rules misapplied

The board said that the container rules as applied to "short-stopping"—the packing or unpacking of full shipper loads by trucking companies at their own freight stations to meet the needs of highway routing—and as they applied to certain traditional warehouse practices have an illegal work acquisition objective.

All the parties involved are appealing different aspects of the ruling that they consider contrary to their interests in the case. Two of the shipping groups joined the ILA in petitioning the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., to review that part of the decision that limits application of the rules to some trucking company and warehouse functions. The American Trucking Association, which had strongly opposed the rules, has asked the 4th U.S. Circuit Appeals Court in Richmond, Va., to review the NLRB opinion also.

The container rules, adopted through collective bargaining in 1973, apply to ports from Maine to Texas. They have been contested in several courts and, except for a six-week period in 1981, have not been implemented because they have been under court injunction.

The controversy over the rules developed in the late 1950s, when shippers began to use large, reuseable metal containers which could be loaded or unloaded with cargo away from a pier. Shipping lines generally owned or leased the containers but released them for loading or unloading away from the pier to owners of the cargo, consolidators, and warehousers.

The new container technology permitted shippers to bypass longshoremen in the consolidation and handling of cargo, and the ILA negotiated the "Rules on Containers," first with the New York Shipping Association, to protect its members.

The issue before the NLRB was whether the rules were a legitimate form of work preservation and not an illegal secondary boycott as some opponents charged.

1973 challenge

The rules were first challenged in 1973, and the NLRB originally held that they violated the Taft-Hartley Act, maintaining their purpose was not to preserve the jobs of ILA members but to acquire work performed by employees of the consolidation firms. A federal appeals court reversed the NLRB finding, however, saying the board failed to consider the longshoremen's traditional work patterns.

The case went to the U.S. Supreme Court which, in 5 to 4 decision, upheld the appellate court and directed the NLRB to examine the relationship between the work as it existed before the new technology and the agreement proposing to preserve it.

Yetta Riesel of TNG dies, helped organize CLUW

New York — Yetta Riesel, former research and information associate for the Newspaper Guild, died here after an illness of several weeks. She was 66 and had retired in the fall of 1981 after 33 years on the Guild's staff, where she served chiefly in research positions.

She was a member of the committee that planned the formation of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and was the Guild's delegate to the founding convention of CLUW in 1974. She is survived by her brother Victor.

Recession's victims face loss of homes with no insurance, no nothing. And while he was sitting there bleeding, I have to go talk to somebody about how I am going to pay that bill."

Rep. Fernand J. St Germain (D-R.I.), who is chairman of both the full Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee and its Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, thanked Dowell for his testimony. It couldn't have been easy for Dowell to tell his story in such a public forum, he suggested.

"It's like death," Dowell replied.

Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.), who heads the Subcommittee on Housing, saw the hearings as the momentum needed to bring out a bill that he and St Germain had introduced. It would authorize $760 million for federal loans to prevent foreclosures when inability to pay results from job loss or other unanticipated loss of income, such as illness.

Clears committee

His subcommittee approved the measure on Mar. 8 and the full committee cleared it just two days later.

It would require mortgage holders to inform persons in risk of foreclosure of the availability of the government loan program. The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development would then have 45 days to decide whether to grant a loan at an interest rate not higher than 10 percent. Loans would be limited to persons with a reasonable prospect of picking up their mortgage payments and repaying the government when conditions improve.

The Administration opposes the legislation, contending that the recession is ending and it's not needed.

At the House hearings, Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan pressed for quick action.

How can Congress consider legislation "to bail out the international banking community" for loans to countries that can't pay their debts while allowing foreclosure of the homes of unemployed workers who can't pay their mortgages? Sheehan asked.

John Warnic and Susan Ostek tell a House panel how their American dream of owning a home was transformed into a nightmare by foreclosure.

Thomas Snover, community services director for the Auto Workers, termed the sharp rise in foreclosures and forced sales of homes "a national tragedy."

He said federal loans "to aid people in areas of high unemployment would be far less costly to financial institutions, home owners, local communities and society than allowing thousands to lose their possessions that some have worked a lifetime to acquire."

Brisk sales

The sheriff of Lorain County, Ohio, said the impact of the recession on Cleveland suburbs has made him the county's "realtor of the year."

Sheriff James A. Mertz sold 226 homes in foreclosure proceedings in 1980, he said, and the number has been rising sharply with every notch in the unemployment rate. Unless Congress acts, he predicted, next year's foreclosure actions will probably reach 1,100.

Some saved

From Pittsburgh, Allegheny County Sheriff Eugene L. Coon said that with the concurrence of an understanding judge, he has been able to remove a number of homes from the foreclosure sale list. But some 2,000 of the 240,000 mortgages in the metropolitan area are currently in foreclosure, he testified. Another 15,000 are delinquent and 45,000 are near-delinquent.

"If people cannot turn to their government in a time of crisis, where can they turn?" he asked.

That's the question that others in the panels of witnesses who spoke from personal experience were also asking.

John Sullivan, a truck driver from Brookpark, Ohio, has gone as far as Corpus Christi, Tex., seeking work.

He tried to put aside money from his unemployment compensation for mortgage payments. But "some medical bills came up and the doctors wanted their money."

When he tried to make a half-payment after he had fallen three months in arrears, the bank wouldn't take it, he testified. "They wanted the full payment, plus the three back payments plus the late charge."

Now, Sullivan testified, he is seven months behind and faces imminent foreclosure.

Stress on family

Susan Ostek, the mother of four children, came from Teaneck, N.J., to testify to her family's struggle after her husband first was cut back to part time and then lost his job when the shop where he worked as a mechanic "closed up entirely."

Finally, their debts mounted so they had to file for bankruptcy in an effort to save their home.

There were farmers and professionals with comparable first-hand stories. And there were faces to match the statistics that show increased social problems matching the rise in unemployment.

After Katherine Garrison and her husband were both laid off from their jobs with Bethlehem Steel Corp. in Baltimore, she testified, "the pressure got to be too much for us. We started fighting constantly and we split up."

Committee Chairman St Germain explained why recession victims as well as banking and housing experts had been asked to testify:

"These are hard-working American families that have saved to buy and maintain their homes. It is wrong to allow economic conditions, far beyond their control, to destroy these people. These foreclosures, unless checked in some manner, threaten the very fabric of neighborhoods and communities."

NLRB policies seen aiding double-breasted companies

Construction workers are being denied their right to union representation by double-breasted contractors whose operations flout the intent of federal labor law, union leaders charged at House hearings.

Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine and Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner testified to the havoc wrought by the National Labor Relations Board's interpretation of the law.

They cited NLRB decisions dating back to the early 1970s that opened the way for construction firms to switch at will from union to non-union operation. These double-breasted firms set up non-union subsidiaries that the NLRB has held are not bound by the parent company's pre-hire agreements with unions.

"A system which permits an employer to evade his written agreement by merely setting up a new company to perform the same work on a non-union basis is just plain wrong," Georgine insisted.

Turner told the House Labor-Management subcommittee that pre-hire agreements were specifically authorized by Congress for the construction industry because the short-term nature of most construction projects makes NLRB elections and contract negotiations impractical.

Contradictions

Experience in trying to use the election procedure to combat a non-union operation bears out the "inherent incompatability between the realities of the construction industry and the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act," he told the panel.

Turner cited the experience of his union and other cooperating construction unions in trying to use the NLRB election process to get union representation for workers employed on two interstate highway projects in Atlanta under a contract held by a Minneapolis firm's non-union subsidiary.

Because the duration of the project was longer than usual for the construction industry, Turner said, the unions began a cooperative organizing drive seeking an early representation election.

"The company responded with what has become an increasingly normal employer reaction," Turner testified, "unfair labor practices aimed at intimidating and coercing the workers into rejecting the union."

The union obtained redress for workers adversely affected by unfair labor practices and the company then switched to challenging the composition of bargaining units and requesting NLRB reviews of unit determinations. Meanwhile, some of the smaller projects have been completed, thus further reshaping bargaining units. And the latest twist, Turner testified, is a corporate restructure that poses the likelihood of still further delays.

Pre-hire agreements

Congress showed its awareness of the special problems of the construction industry when it authorized pre-hire agreements under which an employer is able to obtain qualified workers from a union hiring hall and workers are assured of previously negotiated wages and benefits.

But with the aquiescence of the NLRB, Turner and Georgine protested, employers can walk away from their agreement by going double-breasted or simply by repudiating it and declaring their firms non-union.

A third witness, Prof. Jan Stiglitz of the California Western School of Law, testified that the labor board's misreading of the intent of Congress has in turn misled the federal courts that rely heavily on the NLRB's expertise on labor-management relations.

He found "most disturbing" the NLRB's approach to the double-breasted issue since it is not compelled by the law.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.), is not considering legislation on the issue. But the union witnesses expressed hope that the spotlight on the problem would point up the contradictions between the NLRB's positions and the intent of Congress.

Floor plan for exhibitors in the 1983 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show, is studied by St. Louis AFL-CIO President Robert J. Kelley, Show Manager Jack Lutz and Sec.-Treas. Robert O. Kortkamp of the St. Louis labor council.

Union-Industries Show turns beacon on U.S. goods, skills

St. Louis—The 38th annual AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show will open here Mar. 25 at the Cervantes Convention Center, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. announced.

Department Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara said the theme of this year's exposition of union skills and services is "American Is Beautiful."

"This is a massive exhibition about American workers . . . American-made products and services, the alternative to imports that wreak havoc on American industry," Mara declared.

200,000 expected

He said more than 200,000 visitors from the greater St. Louis area are expected to attend the six-day, free exhibition produced and managed by the department.

Show manager Jack Lutz said that the hundreds of exhibits will include live craft and skills demonstrations. There will be displays from a wide range of AFL-CIO unions as well as from employers, government agencies and labor-supported community organizations.

Lutz said the show is the largest exposition of its kind in the United States.

The AFL-CIO's own exhibit will feature a theater showing the pilot program of a new 30-minute television series about organized labor produced and managed by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs.

Many of the union exhibits feature skill demonstrations, including sewing, cake decorating, glass blowing, printing, carpentry, bricklaying, meat cutting, painting, sheet metal work, hair styling, welding and soldering, cable splicing, culinary arts and more.

Some of the demonstrations will let show visitors try their own hands at various skills, and others will offer some examples of the services workers provide to consumers, such as on the spot basic health screening by professionals who are members of health care unions, postal services, or fire safety and first aid techniques from the fire and rescue squads.

More aid pressed as vital for long-term jobless

There aren't any jobs over the horizon for millions of recession victims and continuation of federal supplemental unemployment benefits is an urgent priority, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified at Senate hearings.

Seidman expressed concern that the limited extension of federal jobless benefits that the House included in its social security package will fall short of the need.

The severity of the recession is adding to the number of workers still jobless after having exhausted their 26 weeks of state benefits and the added 13 weeks of extended benefits that are available only in the states with the highest unemployment rates, he noted.

There should be a permanent supplemental benefits program of at least 26 weeks, Seidman said, funded by general revenues and available without regard to state unemployment triggers.

In terms of pending legislation, he urged that as a minimum the Senate improve the House version of the supplemental benefits extension to the level that had been proposed by a Ways & Means subcommittee before it was trimmed back to be less objectionable to the Administration.

Additional payments

As passed by the House, the present 16 weeks of supplemental benefits now allowed in states in the highest unemployment category would be trimmed to 14 weeks. The House did, however, include a provision for persons who exhaust their supplemental benefits by Apr. 1 to receive an additional six to 10 weeks of payments, depending on the insured unemployment rate in their states.

Seidman reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to the Administration's job voucher scheme, which would give employers tax credits equal to the value of unused unemployment insurance entitlements when they hire a long-term unemployed worker.

It would be an incentive only to hire workers for low-paying temporary jobs, Seidman suggested. "Displacing workers who already have jobs in order to provide temporary employment for long-term jobless workers does not lessen unemployment," he stressed.

Another labor witness, UAW Research Director Sheldon Friedman, voiced similar concern. The voucher proposal, he said, "would result primarily in recycling the unemployed, without reducing their total number, and would do so at considerable cost to an already depleted Treasury."

Likewise, Friedman suggested, the "subminimum" youth wage sought by the Administration "would have a similar and even more pernicious effect of giving employers license to replace minimum-wage adult breadwinners with subminimum youth."

The labor witnesses also strongly opposed the Administration proposal to deny supplemental benefits to persons who had left their last job for any reason other than layoff because of lack of work or physical disability. And they opposed diversion of state unemployment insurance funds for training instead of benefits.

Strong opposition

"Organized labor has consistently advocated and supported legislative efforts to establish jobs and put people back to work," Seidman testified. But until full employment is achieved, he urged, the federal supplemental compensation program should be strengthened, not weakened.

No police state

Helena, Mont. — Testimony by Montana Atty. Gen. Mike Greely opposing a bill to allow the involvement of the state highway patrol in labor-management disputes drew the praise of Montana's unions.

Appearing before a legislative committee considering the proposal, the COPE-endorsed Greely observed that all too often trade unionists confront an alliance of institutions whose interests conflict with the wants and needs of working people.

"Too often that alliance includes government," said Greely. "As an official in state government, I will not be part of labor's problem. I want to be part of the solution."

Executive Sec. James W. Murry of the Montana AFL-CIO, expressing thanks to Greely for his statement of personal philosophy on the role of the labor movement, called his remarks "right on target."

Montana state law prohibits the highway patrol, which is principally a traffic enforcement agency, from taking any action whatsoever with respect to strikes, boycotts, and labor disputes. The patrol is a division of the Montana Dept. of Justice under Greely.

Senate nears vote on funds for emergency jobs measure

The Senate moved towards passage of an emergency appropriations bill carrying funds for job programs and emergency relief. But the trend of voting on amendments indicated that the Republican majority would be able to hold the total below the $4.9 billion measure voted by the House.

That would leave the final version to be shaped by a House-Senate conference committee, presumably closer to the $4.3 billion "compromise" that the White House had said would be acceptable.

The higher amount voted by the House had been termed by the AFL-CIO "a small first step" toward bringing down unemployment.

The Senate Appropriations Committee matched the Democratic House in rhetoric if not in substance when it reported its version of the funding bill to the Senate floor.

Its report cited the "dismal" employment outlook for both this year and next year, noting that both government and private economists foresee "a very weak recovery by historical standards."

It noted "depression-level unemployment" among some groups and said the recession has caused "greater hardships than previous economic slumps."

And it then proposed to hold the added spending down to $3.9 billion.

As did the House version, the Senate bill would stress accelerated spending for programs already authorized such as repairs to public buildings, military housing construction and community development grants. It also provided additional funds for humanitarian relief to recession victims, but not as much as the House added.

A multitude of amendments seeking to alter the ingredients and targeting of the package were still awaiting action by the Senate when the AFL-CIO News went to press.

In a gesture that involved no money but was intended as a "message" to President Reagan, the Senate voted 82-10 to add to the bill a "sense of the Senate" declaration opposing any further cuts in education spending.

Broun award entries on display Mar. 14-25

Some two dozen of the Newspaper Guild's 1982 Heywood Broun Award entries will be on display in the lobby of the AFL-CIO headquarters building Mar. 14-25.

Among the entries is the 1982 award winner by Stephen P. Morin, whose articles documenting how abused children are likely to become criminals appeared in the Providence Journal & Bulletin.

City project residence rule affirmed by Supreme Court

Cities may impose residence requirements for workers on municipally funded construction projects, the Supreme Court ruled.

Its 7-2 decision upheld a 1979 executive order by Boston Mayor Kevin H. White that had been challenged in part by Massachusetts construction unions and employers —and by the AFL-CIO in a brief to the Supreme Court.

The challengers had questioned the constitutionality of a requirement that, on projects funded in whole or in part by the city, at least half the workers in each craft must be Boston residents.

Free trade barrier

The state's highest court agreed with the challenge, ruling that the residence requirement was a barrier to the free flow of trade and thus violated the Commerce Clause of the Constitution.

The city appealed, and when the case reached the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO filed a brief supporting the constitutional challenge to the residence rule. Its brief cited both the Commerce Clause and the Privileges & Immunities Clause, which specifies that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

The Supreme Court majority held, however, that the Commerce Clause is not applicable since the City of Boston was "participating" in the marketplace because of its funding of the construction projects and was not seeking to "regulate" the market for private-sector commerce. The court, however, left open for future consideration challenges to residence rules that might be based on the Privileges and Immunities Clause.

On another issue, the Supreme Court divided 5-4 in holding that the federal government can enforce the ban on age discrimination in employment in the case of state or local government workers.

The Age Discrimination in Employment Act prohibits employers from requiring workers to retire before age 70 unless a lower age requirement is a "bona fide occupational qualification" for a particular job.

In the case that reached the Supreme Court, a Wyoming game warden challenged forced retirement at age 55. The court majority said the state could compel the requirement of persons who no longer met physical requirements for the job but would have to do it "in a more individualized and careful way" than setting an arbitrary age limit.

ILO leader re-elected

Francis Blanchard, director-general of the International Labor Organization, center, receives congratulations on his re-election to a third five-year term from worker delegates Irving Brown, right, and Nangbog Barnabo at the Geneva meeting of the ILO's Governing Body. inquiry with judicial-like authorities to pass judgment on the accused government's conduct.

U.S. worker delegate Irving Brown, the AFL-CIO's international affairs director, praised the Freedom of Association Committee for advancing "perhaps not quickly enough, but slowly and surely the objectives of the free trade union movement and the interests of workers everywhere."

Concurring with the committee's denunciation of Poland's new labor code, Brown told the Governing Body that the government's aim was to replace the Solidarity free trade union movement with "phony government unions to serve the interests" of the communist party and of the military regime.

Even if the Polish government receives an ILO mission "we must press ahead," Brown urged. "The issue of the Polish workers and their fight for freedom must be kept alive by the organization that speaks with the voice of tripartism for the protection of free trade union rights everywhere," Brown said.

The Governing Body re-elected Blanchard without opposition for a third five-year term as ILO director-general. The 66-year-old Frenchman has been with the ILO since 1951.

The Governing Body prepared the way for Peking's announced intention of taking over the long-vacant Chinese seat in the ILO by recognizing China as one of the 10 countries of chief industrial importance.

This means that on its return to the ILO at the June assembly China automatically takes over the government seat that Canada has been holding in the Governing Body among the 10 allotted to the highest ranking industrial nations.

The Work Is There

TO BE A STABLE, humane, democratic society, America needs a great many jobs. To hold her place as a creative, productive economic power, America needs a great deal of work.

Bringing those who badly need jobs together with the work that urgently needs to be done is a task that only government can do on the scale required. By recognizing and acting on that fact, President Roosevelt both prevented social catastrophe and laid the groundwork for sustained economic growth.

Ideologists who deny that government has such a role and who dismiss government jobs programs as wasteful "make-work" exercises make a tragic and foolish mistake.

Those clever professors of economics who now denounce jobs programs as coming too late to help end the recession are the same minds which said there was no recession approaching two years ago. If jobs programs had been put in place two years ago, as the AFL-CIO urged, America would have been spared much of the terrible pain it has suffered in the last 18 months.

But then, as George Meany said, economics is the only field in which you can be a great and famous authority without ever once being right.

A 16-year study by M. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University shows that the effects are cumulative. For the first three years after each peak of joblessness, Brenner found that for each 1 percent of unemployment there is a 4 percent rise in imprisonments, 5.7 percent in murders, 4.1 percent in suicides, 3.3 percent in mental hospital admissions.

But aside from preventing present suffering and future social and political dislocations, America desperately needs to invest in her public capital stock—the "infrastructure" of physical facilities of all kinds.

SCARCELY AN issue of any newspaper is without a horror story about collapsing streets, falling bridges, dilapidated transit systems, leaky roofs and crumbling foundations of schools and other public facilities.

Sewage systems are so overburdened that many cities cannot permit business to build new plants or enlarge existing ones. Cities like Newark are on starvation sewer-replacement cycles that will take up to 500 years to complete.

In Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago, leaky water mains waste more than 15 percent of the water they carry.

Half of the nation's 3,500 jails are more than 30 years old. Up to 3,000 must be rebuilt or largely rehabilitated during the 1980s, and many new ones must be built.

For 50 years, America has lived on the public capital invested during the New Deal years. It's time to replenish the supply. But we don't have to look back to the CCC and WPA to see the social and economic value of public works programs during recessions.

The 1976 Public Works Act helped speed up the recovery from the 1974-75 recession. The $6 billion spent as part of the Local Public Works Program generated 110,000 direct on-site jobs and 66,000 more building supply jobs. The stimulus of that added purchasing power brought an additional 249,000 jobs throughout the economy. The return—in jobs, in economic growth and in public capital improvement—was many times greater than the cost.

We renew our call for such a program, which we have spelled out in great detail, as the best way to return to a healthy, vibrant economy.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's guest column in USA Today, Mar. 4, 1983.

Falsifying a Promise

THE PERSONS who would be most penalized if the Senate follows the example of the House and pushed the social security retirement age to 67 are those who most need the program's protections.

These are the millions of workers who "retire" earlier than they would wish because of unemployment or because of poor health.

Congress may have the legal right to cut their promised benefits. But it does not have the moral right to do so.

Old enemies still battling social security's concept

By Press Associates, Inc.

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law in 1935, he called it "a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete."

Besides the old-age and survivors program, the law also established the federal-state system of unemployment insurance. National health insurance was envisioned as part of the program, but the American Medical Association applied euthanasia to that idea.

Social security was perhaps FDR's greatest achievement. Little could he imagine that nearly half a century later, the enemies of social security would still be chipping away at the cornerstone.

When conservative ideologues who wanted to make it "voluntary" or to "privatize" it came into political power with the election of a business-dominated Administration, the program became directly threatened.

At the same time, the weak economy and double-digit inflation of the 1970s pushed social security into trouble and the media had a field day with "brink of bankruptcy" stories.

Republican 'reform'

This proved too great a temptation for David Stockman, President Reagan's budget chief. Looking for $40 billion or so to help balance his budget on paper, Stockman devised a "reform" plan for social security which would have drastically cut benefits.

The Stockman package went to Congress in Reagan's name in May 1981 and set off a firestorm. The Senate expressed its opposition 96-0.

Reagan disowned the Stockman plan on TV and named a national commission to recommend changes—after the 1982 elections—to put social security on a sounder footing.

Given the diversity of the 15-member commission, from liberals to ultra-conservatives, little was expected. Yet the panel finally agreed on a package of difficult compromises and trade-offs which satisfied no one completely.

Basic agreement

Probably the most important achievement in such a politically charged group was the unanimous support of the fundamental structure and principles of social security. The commission said it considered, but rejected, proposals to make the program voluntary or have it depend solely on contributions or make it a means-tested program.

The commission then divided, 12-3, on consensus recommendations to meet an estimated $169 billion shortfall from now until 1989, representing two-thirds of the financing problem. These recommendations are now before the Congress. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a commission member, had dissented on the proposal to include new federal workers under social security.

To help meet the long-term problem, some in Congress would raise the retirement age in line with increasing longevity. This would be bad for working people.

A social security study showed that most males retiring at 62 cite health problems. Poor health and the difficulty of older workers finding jobs in a recession are the main reasons behind early retirement.

The group which would be hurt most by a higher retirement age would be women. Many women do not have the work experience to compete in the job market at that age.

There also is a weakness in the argument for raising the retirement age when its major proponents are conservatives who also oppose government efforts to create enough jobs for those who need them.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Progress Report on Fast-Moving Issues in the 98th Congress

JOBS

Congressional action on the "Phase I" job-creation bill neared completion as the Senate considered a $4.9 billion jobs package already approved by the House. But Phase I is only a small start toward the economic recovery program recommended by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, so it is important that Congress take up a "Phase II" jobs bill immediately.

Some may use the recent up-tick in the economy as an excuse to delay action on Phase II jobs. But economic recovery remains to be seen, and even the Reagan Administration predicts nearly 10-percent unemployment through 1984. Thus Phase II should include programs to rescue the unemployed until jobs become available: health care, expanded food stamps, and mortgage abatement. It would be a tragedy to lose your home now and then find a job a few months too late.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your legislators to support the "Phase II" jobs and rescue programs outlined above.

NEW BUDGET

As House and Senate committees begin to study the proposed Reagan budget for the year beginning next October 1, it is clear that the so-called budget "freeze" is just a new name for more Reagan budget cuts. Of $18 billion in cuts, unemployment compensation would absorb an $8 billion cut. Other programs slated for cuts include education and job training.

Instead of more cuts, the economy needs programs that stimulate recovery while providing needed services. The AFL-CIO Executive Council recently called for community development and youth programs, housing construction, accelerated public works, and other job-creating programs.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to oppose budget-slashing. Congress should focus on recovery programs outlined in recent issues of the Alert!

Here's a Bill to Bring Natural Gas Prices Down

Since gas was decontrolled in 1977, residential gas bills have more than doubled. In the past year prices have jumped more than 25%.

Lack of competition in the gas industry is preventing prices from coming down. Major oil companies produce most of the gas consumed in the United States; they sell it to pipelines companies which often are themselves gas producers. Gas utilities are locked into the prices charged by the one or two pipelines that suply a given area, and consumers, of course, have only one gas utility company.

The AFL-CIO is backing legislation to tighten and extend gas price controls; the Reagan Administration and energy companies are pushing faster decontrol (comparison, right).

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to cosponsor the Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act.

AFL-CIO-Endorsed Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act	vs.	Reagan Administration's Gas Price Decontrol Proposal
For "old" gas drilled before 1977, industry investments have already been recovered. Consumer Relief Act maintains existing price controls.	OLD GAS	Reagan plan decontrols old gas, at a cost of $40 billion over five years. $40 billion more from consumers to the oil and gas giants.
Extends controls on new gas (drilled after 1977) from 1985 (current law) to Jan. 1, 1987.	NEW GAS	New gas decontrolled by 1985, or even sooner in cases of new or renegotiated contracts between producers, users.
Rolls back ceiling prices to levels in effect before this winter's increases	CEILING PRICES	Allows prices to rise to current-law ceilings, despite market conditions.
Many pipelines have signed "take or pay" contracts with producers, requiring them to pay for high percentages of high-priced gas, even if they don't need it. Consumer Relief Act limits take-or-pay to 50% for 3 years.	"TAKE OR PAY"	Does not limit take-or-pays, only gives pipelines discretion to reduce them to 70%.
Consumer protection, lower prices	OTHER	67% hikes in residential bills by 1986.

We Get the Message: Imports Are Taking Your Jobs

In the Feb. 12 Legislative Alert, we asked you to complete a survey regarding loss of jobs in the United States because of unrestrained imports. Your response has made it clear that the United States' adherence to "free trade" principles while other countries promote their industries is causing harm to our economy in many areas of the country and in many industries.

Below is a partial listing of responses from union members where imports have cuased layoffs.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to adopt a realistic fair trade policy. This includes adoption of H.R. 1234, the domestic content bill for the auto industry and its many supplier industries. "Reciprocity" laws currently on the books should be enforced to ensure U.S. access to foreign markets. Only non-Communist, needy countries should receive tariff abatement under the Generalized System of Preferences. And trade adjustment assistance should be restored for those who lose their jobs because of imports.

Note: If you have not yet completed the survey in the Feb. 12 Alert, please do so and mail to the AFL-CIO Legislative Department.

World's unions condemn Chile

More than 5,100 persons, many waiting overnight, applied for 200 jobs at Whirlpool Corp. plant in Clyde, Ohio.

Kirkland cites brutal attacks on workers

By James M. Shevis

Free trade unions have joined in a worldwide outcry against the systematic repression of human rights in Chile by the Pinochet military dictatorship.

Matters have gotten "steadily worse" since Gen. Augusto Pinochet violently seized power in Chile nearly 10 years ago, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told a press conference winding up a four-day, two-continent meeting to protest the Chilean government's repeated violations of human and trade union rights.

"The Chilean armed forces are being used as a wartime occupation army in their own land. Political and trade union leaders have been arrested, killed or exiled in large numbers," Kirkland charged. "The population has been impoverished. Public services have been liquidated."

Sponsored by the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the conference opened in Madrid Mar. 11 and concluded in Washington Mar. 15.

The Madrid portion examined the Pinochet regime's concerted effort to destroy the Chilean labor movement, including the widespread torture and murder of trade unionists. The Washington end of the meeting focused on bringing the brutal repression to the attention of members of Congress and the Reagan Administration.

Supporting human rights

ICFTU Gen.-Sec. John Vanderveken said the conference demonstrated the kind of action that "the international free trade union movement can take in support of human rights around the world."

Earlier, addressing union leaders from Europe, North America, and Latin America, Vanderveken called on the international labor movement to "persevere more than ever in its determination to help the Chilean worker regain freedom and democracy after these many years of suffering."

The struggle in Chile concerns all men of goodwill, Vanderveken declared.

"It is up to us to make international public opinion aware of the calamity constituted by a symbolic regime like Pino-

Instead of tax credits

Public jobs pressed to cut unemployment

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO called for "direct job creation" to put America back to work and urged legislation sharply at odds with President Reagan's latest employment proposals.

Reagan is seeking additional tax credits for employers as the heart of a program of "incentives" for companies to hire the long-term unemployed. His Mar. 11 message to Congress also urged "relief" from government regulations for firms locating in designated urban enterprise zones and the Administration's plan for a subminimum youth wage.

All of these proposals had been aired earlier, but the White House packaged them into a proposed Employment Act of 1983. Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan described it as "the most comprehensive legislation to combat structural unemployment in the postwar period."

Different approach

But AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue pressed Congress to take a different tack when he testified Mar. 17 before the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities.

"America needs governmental action to spur direct job creation," Donahue insisted.

He expressed labor's strong support for the community renewal employment bill that has been introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.). Hawkins was the co-author of the 1978 law which set a full employment goal that the Administration and Congress have largely ignored.

The new Hawkins bill would authorize an immediate $5 billion investment in public sector jobs for long-term unemployed persons in high unemployment areas. For the 1984 fiscal year that starts Oct. 1, the funding would be doubled with the goal of putting one million people to work. Funding for future years would be keyed to providing useful jobs for 20 percent of the nation's unemployed.

Donahue outlined the other measures that make up the comprehensive jobs and recession relief program adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its midwinter meeting.

It includes community development jobs along the lines of the Hawkins bill, he noted, accelerated public works, housing stimulus, youth training, retraining and special assistance for victims of plant closings and mass layoffs, among others.

Job creation "must be in a bigger and faster dose" than the "beginning step" taken in the bill that the House had passed and the Senate was debating at the time of Donahue's testimony. "The road to recovery has to be paved with results, not minor tinkering," he urged.

The closest likeness to any part of the Reagan program is in the area of assis-

Congress balks at Reagan limit on funding bill

Congress and the Reagan Administration moved on an apparent collision course over the scope of an emergency jobs-funding bill and the White House hinted at the possibility of a presidential veto in an attempt to get Congress to back off.

The Administration had counted on the Senate to cut back the $4.9 billion appropriation voted by the House for an assortment of programs ranging from a stepped-up schedule of repairs to public buildings to day care services and emergency assistance to the hungry and homeless.

According to the Administration script, the Republican-controlled Senate was supposed to pass the $3.9 billion measure put together by its Appropriations Committee. A House-Senate conference would then agree on a measure close to the $4.3 billion package President Reagan had agreed to accept.

The Senate did defeat a Democratic add-on bill. But then it approved an extra $1.2 billion in revenue-sharing grants for local governments, added extra health services funds that had been part of the rejected Democratic amendment, and ended up with a $5.1 billion package before becoming snarled in a battle over an unrelated amendment to repeal the withholding tax on interest and dividend income.

Under decontrol plan

Families face gas bill 'explosion'

By Susan Dunlop

Consumers need relief from skyrocketing natural gas prices, the AFL-CIO said in urging Congress to reject Reagan Administration proposals for faster deregulation that would mean an "explosion" in gas bills by 1985.

Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe told the Senate Energy & Natural Resources Committee that current natural gas prices should be rolled back immediately and that consumers should be protected from future price hikes through an extension of existing controls.

He urged sharp limits on "take-or-pay" contracts that force pipeline companies to buy more expensive gas from producers even when cheaper sources are available.

Marlowe called for limitations on the authority of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) to stop the agency from practicing "backdoor decontrol" by using administrative action to let companies raise prices higher than current ceilings.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposes the Administration's plans calling for complete decontrol of all natural gas by 1985, Marlowe stressed.

Existing protections

The current law, passed in 1978, phases out control of prices of newly produced gas by 1985, but continues indefinitely controls on "old gas," produced before 1977.

The Administration's proposals, he pointed out, would be even more harmful than those under the 1978 law, since it would give the companies the power to set "unnecessarily high" average prices through the negotiation of new contracts and the renegotiation of existing contracts. Controls on old gas would be linked to this "average price" until 1986 but would then be lifted entirely. And, Marlowe pointed out, the Administration's plan would also let producers hold back old gas until controls expire.

There is no justification for the decontrol of old gas, Marlowe said, estimating that the Administration's proposals could cause the price of old gas to rise more than 250 percent.

Prices would be decided on, he said, by negotiations among producers, pipeline companies and other industries who buy gas—not by the largest bloc of users, people who heat their homes with gas.

Without price controls "American consumers are at the mercy of the monopoly

Cool reception

Union pickets line a hillside outside Klamath Falls, Ore., to let President Reagan—in the limousine—know what they think of Administration economic policies that have decimated the Northwest lumber industry and sent unemployment into double digits. Reagan was en route to meet with industry officials at a lumber mill and later went to a Republican Party reception. Oregon AFL-CIO leaders called the visit "a Hollywood road show" to gloss over the state's 13.6 percent jobless rate. The rate in neighboring Washington State is 13.3 percent.

Jobless rates rise sharply in 19 states

Unemployment equaled or exceeded the January national unadjusted rate of 11.4 percent of the civilian workforce in 19 states, with West Virginia's 20.4 percent the highest, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Thirty states had jobless rates of 10 percent or more, compared with 18 a year earlier and only six in January 1981, when President Reagan was inaugurated.

In a preliminary report on changes in jobless rates from January 1982 to last January, BLS said that unemployment rates rose 2 percent or more in 19 states. Two states—West Virginia and Wyoming—reported over-the-year increases of 4 percentage points or more.

2-percent jump

The national unemployment rate for all civilian workers over the year increased 2 percentage points. None of the data is adjusted for seasonal variation.

Only one state, Delaware, reported a decline of more than 2 percent. Its jobless rate went from 11.9 percent in January 1982 to 8.4 percent last January.

Unemployment matched or topped the national rate in 80 of the 210 metropolitan areas reporting jobless data for last January, BLS said. Johnstown, Pa., had the highest rate, 24.8 percent.

Six other metropolitan areas with rates of 20 percent or more in January were Sharon, Pa., 23.9 percent; Modesto, Calif., 22 percent; Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, 21.3 percent; Kankakee, Ill., 20.8 percent; Rockford, Ill., 20.7 percent, and Dubuque, Iowa, 20.5 percent.

Four urban areas reported rates under 5 percent: Austin, Tex., and Raleigh-Durham, N.C., 4.7 percent, and Honolulu, and Stamford, Conn., 4.9 percent.

Up 8% in year

Unemployment rates rose 2 percentage points or more in 72 areas. The largest increases occurred in Rockford and Peoria, Ill., where they were 8 percent or more. In Rockford, the rate went from 11.3 to 20.7 percent over the year; in Peoria, the rate climbed from 9.6 to 18.4 percent.

The jobless rate fell 2 percentage points or more over the year in only two metropolitan areas—Wilmington, Del., and Janesville-Beloit, Wis.

West Virginia's rise to 20.1 percent in January was an increase over the year of 6.9 percentage points, while Wyoming's rise to 9.9 percent by January was a jump of 4.8 percentage points during the year.

Job losses in manufacturing industries contributed to high rates in Alabama and Michigan while a reduction in mining employment was the main factor in West Virginia, BLS said.

Five states reported over-the-year employment losses in excess of 100,000. They were Pennsylvania, 183,900; Illinois, 182,500; California, 157,200; Ohio, 125,300, and Texas, 103,000.

Airline contract proposals submitted for ratification

A series of airline contract settlements and commuter railroad strikes in Philadelphia and the New York metropolitan area involve some 35,000 union members.

At Eastern Airlines, 13,500 members of the Machinists were voting on what the company termed its "absolue last offer." The previous contract expired more than a year ago, on Dec. 31, 1981, and officers of IAM District 100 had urged rejection of the new proposal because of the lack of full retroactivity.

Meanwhile, there were these other transport settlements:

- The Flight Attendants division of the Air Line Pilots approved a new 17-month agreement with USAir that will take effect Apr. 1. The carrier's 1,800 attendants will receive wage increases totaling 9.2 percent over the life of the contract, plus improvements in per diem pay. Premium pay for senior flight attendants also was improved.
- The Flight Engineers at Pan American World Airways voted 424 to 38 to extend cost-saving concessions to the financially ailing carrier through Dec. 31, 1984. AFA is the last of five Pan Am domestic unions to accept the extension of a 10 percent wage cut and freeze, first agreed to in October 1981. Pan Am employees own 13 percent of the airline's stock.

Three-year pact

- The Transport Workers ratified a new three-year agreement with American Airlines, heading off a strike that had been called by some 10,400 mechanics and other ground-related employees. The pact exchanges moderate wage increases and a job security provision for work rule and other concessions.

The agreement with American raises the former hourly pay of $13.53 by 7 percent retroactive to Sept. 1, 1982, another 6 percent on Sept. 10, 1983, and another 7 percent on Sept. 8, 1984. A cost-of-living provision was discontinued.

- In Philadelphia, Transport Workers Local 234 reached agreement with the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transit Authority (SEPTA) on a contract covering about 5,200 operators of metropolitan buses, trolleys, and subways.

But 12 commuter-rail unions struck SEPTA Mar. 4 in disputes over pay and work rules. The 1,500 rail workers represented by the unions have been working without a contract since Jan. 1, when SEPTA assumed operation of the trains from the government-owned Consolidated Rail Corp.

- In the New York City metropolitan area, conductors and trainmen represented by the United Transportation Union continued their strike against the city's Metro-North commuter line and the New Jersey Transit Rail Operators over contract disputes.

The main sticking points in the Metro-North strike are crew size and wages. Management contends that it alone should determine the crew sizes. Both sides also disagree on the pay for crewmen for hours they are at work but not on trains.

UTU conductors struck the New Jersey commuter line over the transit authority's proposal to slash their annual salaries by $6,000.

Move to waive 'Buy American' provision scored

Reagan Administration proposals to waive "Buy American" provisions in the 1982 highway and mass transit law should be dropped immediately, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

In a letter to Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Dole, Kirkland called the Federal Highway Administration's announcement of the waivers a violation of the intent of the law that will also take away American jobs.

The measure, passed last December, raises the federal gasoline tax a nickel a gallon and authorizes $71 billion in federal funds to build and repair roads and mass transit.

Kirkland said the agency plans to waive temporarily the domestic purchasing requirements written into the bill for all manufactured products except steel and cement. And on projects costing less than $450,000, purchases of those goods will be exempt, even though Congress set no such minimum contract limits in the law, Kirkland pointed out.

Kirkland charged that the exemptions in smaller projects would extend to fabricated steel items like guard rails, culverts, fasteners, tanks and bridge decking that are "the very types of products the law was designed to cover."

Steel union votes to extend pacts in can industry

Phoenix—The Steelworkers negotiated a two-year extension of existing contracts with four major can manufacturers.

Local union presidents who make up the union's container industry conference voted 65 to 31 to extend their current agreements through Feb. 16, 1986, following an early round of bargaining on pacts that would have expired February 1984.

Wage rates will remain unchanged over the life of the new agreements at levels set in the last year of the previous contracts, the USWA reported. Until next February, cost-of-living adjustments will be made quarterly using a formula of 1 cent per hour for each 0.3 point rise in the government's consumer price index. After that, the adjustments will be rolled into base wages annually.

The new agreements cover some 17,000 USWA members at Continental Can Co., American Can Co., National Can Co. and Crown Cork & Seal Co.

USWA District 38 Director Robert Petris said the union agreed to the contract extensions "to help these can companies stay competitive, but we didn't give up anything.

The companies had sought concessions, but the union pointed out that while they face competition from non-union producers, they have not been hit as badly by the recession or by imports as some other industries, including basic steel.

Hard times for executives

Pittsburgh—A record bad year in 1982 forced U.S. Steel Corp.'s two top executives to forgo generous bonuses and take pay cuts of about $240,000 apiece.

But don't look for them in line at the Steelworkers' food banks. Chairman David Roderick cleared $587,000, down from $821,322 in 1981, and U.S. Steel President William Roesch took home $479,932, compared with $675,630 a year earlier, according to the company's proxy statement.

Executive compensation at the company consists of salary plus securities, insurance benefits and other fees and earnings. But when U.S. Steel lost a record $361 million last year, it scrapped an executive bonus plan that had brought Roderick $290,000 and Roesch $240,000 in 1981.

Harold Hoopman, president of Marathon Oil Co., which U.S. Steel bought in 1982, was paid $710,272 last year. That included a $300,000 bonus from Marathon.

U.S. Steel's proxy statement, which announces the annual meeting and provides shareholders with detailed information on the company, said the firm paid its 57 top officers and directors $8.2 million last year.

Court orders speed up on hazardous gas rule

By Arlee C. Green

A federal appeals court ordered the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to propose a tighter ethylene oxide exposure rule by mid-April and to develop a permanent standard within a year.

The decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia denounced OSHA's "unaccounted-for delay" on revising the exposure standard. The three-judge panel also agreed with a lower court evaluation that "OSHA has embarked upon the least responsive course short of inaction."

Ethylene oxide, a cancer-causing chemical gas, is used widely in the health care industry as a sterilizing agent.

The State, County & Municipal Employees and the Public Citizen Health Research Group sued OSHA after it rejected their petition in August 1981 to issue an emergency standard lowering the exposure limit to one part ethylene oxide per 1 million parts air (1 ppm) from the current standard of 50 ppm.

They were joined in the suit by the Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

A federal district court in January ordered OSHA to issue an emergency temporary standard. OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter appealed the ruling, saying the agency would issue a notice of "proposed rulemaking" in June with a permanent rule due "sometime in the fall of 1984."

The appellate court, while not requiring the agency to issue an emergency standard, did note it expects a permanent regulation within a year.

The court said OSHA's three-year timetable for a final regulation is "simply too long given the significant risk of grave danger ethylene oxide poses to the lives of current workers and the lives and well-being of their off-spring. Delays that might be altogether reasonable in the sphere of economic regulation are less tolerable when human lives are at stake."

Too long

About 100,000 hospital workers are exposed to ethylene oxide on their jobs. The chemical is mutagenic and a carcinogenic. Studies have shown "significant chromosomal aberrations in workers exposed to 36 ppm" and a "statistically significant increase in cancer in animals exposed at 33 ppm." The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health determined that "exposures as low as 10 ppm increased the proportion of female rats with . . . leukemia."

OSHA argued before the court that hospitals, the primary area of concern, have voluntarily reduced their exposure levels to less than 10 ppm. The unions noted however, that a 1981 study of 65 hospitals revealed that 24 did not even monitor ethylene oxide levels.

OSHA assailed for slowdown on asbestos curbs

The AFL-CIO accused the Occupational Safety & Health Administration of foot-dragging on the critical need to reduce asbestos exposure limits for 2 million workers who face a high risk of cancer.

Director George H. R. Taylor of the federation's safety and health department called on OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter to make revision of the standard a "top priority." In a letter to Auchter, he questioned the safety agency's long delay in releasing a 1981 asbestos risk assessment report and asked why no action has been taken on the new evidence since the Reagan Administration came to office.

The assessment, made public as part of the agency's defense in a court case on ethylene oxide (story, this page), pointed out that up to 260 of every 1,000 workers exposed over a working lifetime to levels at the current standard may die from asbestos-related cancers.

During the ethylene oxide case, OSHA lawyers conceded rulemaking on asbestos "admittedly hasn't gotten off the ground," Taylor pointed out.

"With the attention of Congress and the public presently focused on the enormity of the asbestos problem . . . the AFL-CIO finds this admission, plus OSHA's withholding of important information assessing the excessive risks of workers to asbestos-induced cancers, both incredible and irresponsible," Taylor stressed.

All-out campaign

He accused the agency of using its limited resources in "an all-out campaign to weaken existing health standards in order to make them more acceptable to the business community."

"Something is dreadfully wrong with OSHA" when its program has no new initiatives on health standards, rejects petitions requesting accelerated rule-making on unregulated toxic substances and allows "weeds to grow up and obscure the asbestos problem," Taylor charged.

The current standard allows 2 fibers per cubic centimeter of air, down from the original standard of 5 fibers. The asbestos risk assessment said that at even reduced levels of exposure of 0.5 fibers and 0.1 fibers, there is a significant level of risk for deaths from cancers.

Under the current standard, according to AFL-CIO industrial hygienist Margaret Seminario, a worker could breathe in 10 to 20 million fibers during an 8-hour workday, depending on the rate of respiration and activity.

Taylor's letter cited a 1982 Labor Dept. study estimating there are presently 8,200 annual excess cancer deaths from asbestos exposure and that number of deaths will peak at about 9,700 a year during the 1990s.

Rights violations

Charges of repression of Chilean workers are explored by international trade union representatives. From left, AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. chet's," he stressed. "It is up to us to bring pressure to bear on the international community so that it finds the means to impose sanctions on a regime that is devoid of any sense of human dignity like the regime in power in Chile."

A statement adopted at the conference urged all ICFTU affiliates and international trade secretariats to inform and mobilize public opinion and press their respective governments to take action to "isolate politically and economically" the dictatorship of Gen. Pinochet.

It also urged suspension of all military aid to Chile and said free world governments should condition their political and economic relations with the Chilean regime on the restoration of human and trade union rights.

"The AFL-CIO intends to carry out its share of this undertaking in every way and through every avenue open to us," Kirkland said. "The ties that bind the free trade union movement cannot be limited by national boundaries. If we turn our backs on our brothers and sisters struggling in other lands, how long before we turn our backs on one another?

"It is in this spirit that we respond to the appeals of Chile's embattled trade unions—as we have responded to their counterparts in Poland and South Africa."

No progress

Kirkland said Abrams indicated that the U.S. government is continuing to press the Pinochet dictatorship — "through channels of 'quiet diplomacy' " — to ease up on its repressive measures. Abrams also said the Administration has not certified any progress on human rights in Chile and, in fact, sees none.

With the members of Congress, Kirkland reported, conference participants urged that any U.S.-Chile transactions be conditions on progress in the restoration of human rights and the return to democratic principles in Chile.

Kirkland noted that Chile was one of the oldest parliamentary democracies in the world until Pinochet overthrew the government of President Salvador Allende Gossens in 1973. For all but 10 of the 170 years since it gained its independence from Spain, Chile has been under democratic rule, he observed.

Withhold support

Military dictatorship "is an alien force imposed upon the people of Chile by point of a gun, pure and simple," Kirkland declared. "We shall continue to press our government to make clear to the Pinochet regime that it can never have the support of the American people until it makes peace with its own people."

Participants in the Washington meeting, besides Kirkland and Vanderveken, included Sec.-Gen. Tulio Cuevas of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), President Eduardo Rios and Sec.-Gen. Hernol Flores of Chile's Union of Democratic Workers, Sec.-Gen. Manuel Bustos of the Chilean Textile Workers, Miguel Vega of the National Organization of Chilean Trade Unions and Eugenio Lopez of the Chilean Mine Workers.

AFL-CIO delegates to the Madrid conference were Exec. Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and James Baker of the federation's Paris office.

Metal Trades ask reversal of 'build-foreign' ship policy

The survival of the American shipbuilding industry depends on swift congressional action to reverse Reagan Administration policies, the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. told the House Merchant Marine subcommittee.

MTD President Paul J. Burnsky stressed the need for passage of legislation to restore construction differential subsidy funds.

Burnsky said the Administration's "build-foreign" program had cost American shipyards almost $1.5 billion in contracts for new ships and refurbishing work, along with the jobs of 87,500 workers in shipbuilding and support industries.

The labor-backed measure, designated the Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act, would create 146,150 man-years of employment in American shipyards, another 6,162 seagoing jobs and the assurance that "more than 200,000 existing jobs in ship construction" and related industries would be saved, Burnsky told the panel.

The Administration eliminated funding for the construction differential subsidies in 1981 and encouraged U.S. ship companies to build their vessels overseas while retaining their rights to operating differential subsidies provided by taxpayers, Burnsky noted. The result of this, besides the loss of jobs, is that it has "undermined our ability to maintain sufficient American shipbuilding skills that are essential to the successful completion of our naval fleet expansion program."

Job creation

Congress has authorized a five-year expansion and modernization program for the Navy fleet, but this will provide work for only nine of the 26 major American shipyards, Burnsky said.

He said construction differential subsidies to build merchant vessels must be restored in the fiscal 1984 budget and the statutory ceiling on the Title XI ship construction loan guarantees should be raised from $12 billion to $15 billion. To do otherwise, he warned, would dry-up American shipbuilding capability and "our nation will be left to the not-so-tender mer-

Memphis regional meeting canceled

The AFL-CIO regional conference that was to have been held Mar. 21-23 in Memphis, Tenn., has been canceled because of the failure of the Hyatt Hotel there to reach a contract agreement with its employees who are represented by the Teamsters.

The conference for the states of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee and Mississippi will be rescheduled at a time and place to be announced. The schedule for other AFL-CIO regional conferences is unchanged.

tance to displaced workers, where the Administration budget proposals call for a $240 million appropriation for fiscal 1984. But the AFL-CIO program advocates nearly five times that amount, and Donahue said "much more money is needed to make the program work as it should."

The AFL-CIO has urged a permanent program of federally funded supplemental unemployment compensation for workers who have exhausted regular and extended benefits.

Six-month extension

And the House as part of the social security bill it passed Mar. 9 included a six-month extension of the federal supplemental program that is scheduled to expire Mar. 31. The House bill would also allow up to 10 weeks of additional payments for jobless workers who have already received federal payments.

In its place, the Administration has proposed an extension coupled with eligibility changes that would disqualify an estimated 400,000 long-term unemployed from the program.

Those who still qualify for the program could offer prospective employers a tax credit voucher equal to the value of unused federal supplemental benefits. Thus, by hiring an applicant with a voucher instead of a job-seeker who hadn't been out of work as long, the employer could pocket the federal payment.

Under the Administration proposal, cash unemployment benefits would be available to jobless workers through the end of the fiscal year on Sept. 30. The program would be continued for an additional six months solely as a voucher plan, with no option of cash benefits for the unemployed worker.

No new jobs

Both the voucher system and the subminimum youth wage would shift unemployment without creating new jobs, the AFL-CIO warned when the proposals were first introduced. And despite promised safeguards, the federation noted, both offer strong incentives for replacement of present employees.

President Reagan blamed youth unemployment on the minimum wage, and his message to Congress actually portrayed an era of child labor and exploitation as a golden age for America. There was "no significant youth unemployment problem," he insisted, until "just after the turn of the century, state legislatures began enacting minimum wage laws."

Doubtful impact

Reagan said he is "unconvinced" by arguments that a subminimum youth wage would result in displacement of adults by younger workers. But because of such concerns, his proposed cut of 85 cents an hour in the minimum wage for workers under 22 would apply only from May to the end of September.

"An employer will not wish to disrupt his or her workforce by attempting to use youth during the summer and adults the rest of the year,' the President theorized.

But Reagan made clear that he would "vigorously oppose" raising the adult minimum wage instead of lowering the pay floor for youth to $2.50 an hour.

Shifting blame

As he has in the past, Reagan blamed the severity of the recession on economic problems he "inherited" from his predecessors and claimed that "we are now on the road to economic recovery."

The program he is advocating, Reagan claimed, will deal with the problem of "structural unemployment" that will remain "even after the economy has fully recovered" because of changed job needs and lack of marketable skills by job seekers.

The President labeled his subminimum wage proposal as a "youth employment opportunity wage" that will give young people "the opportunity to offer their services at $2.50" if employers don't want to pay them a higher wage.

Skyrocketing gas bills feared under Reagan decontrol plan power of natural gas producers and pipelines," and that power "makes it impossible to rely on private negotiations to set natural gas prices," Marlowe told the committee.

It is the responsibility of the federal government to protect the welfare of the public by recognizing the natural gas industry as a public utility, including assuring that prices are "just and reasonable" based on the cost of production and that delivery of an adequate supply of natural gas is guaranteed to consumers, Marlowe said.

He called for an alternative program starting with a rollback of current prices to early 1982 levels, coupled with fair ceilings on the prices of some type of higher priced gas.

Current law has already allowed gas prices to escalate more than is justified, and more than Congress had in mind when it passed the bill, the testimony noted.

Congress should also extend all controls on new gas beyond Jan. 1, 1985, and place strict limits on the use of "take-or-pay" contracts, he urged.

He also called for rejection of proposals that would link the price of natural gas to other fuels or commodities.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission should have authority to review and approve contracts between producers and pipelines and to review pipeline rate filings and "pass throughs" of pipeline costs, but the agency should be given "a clear policy directive" prohibiting it from administratively approving price hikes, Marlowe said

The AFL-CIO Executive Council pointed out last month that the 48 million households now using natural gas had seen their bills go up 150 percent since the 1978 law was enacted. And in many areas of the country, consumers are being socked with additional 60 to 70 percent increases this winter, largely because FERC allowed producers to boost prices, which already were adequate to cover costs and profits, the council charged.

Trade law change sought to end import devastation

The nation's trade laws are ineffective safeguards for American industry and workers, the AFL-CIO charged at House hearings.

"It is time for a change," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald urged at hearings by the House Ways & Means trade subcommittee.

"The devastation now suffered by millions of Americans from floods of imports, from the export of technology and jobs, and from the trade impact of an overvalued dollar has compounded the serious economic problems of the U.S. economy," he testified.

Oswald cited an Executive Council statement adopted last month urging the need to consider the adverse impact as well as the benefits of trade policies.

Labels such as "free trade" and "protectionism" no longer serve any useful purpose, the council noted, adding that tariff and nontariff restrictions are all but universal in other countries while American producers and marketers remain defenseless.

No easy remedy

Oswald stressed that there is no single answer to the trade problem. Rather, a number of actions must be taken to offset and alleviate the harmful effects of trade on American industries and workers and to enhance the United States position in a competitive world, he said.

Priority should be given to a revamping of the so-called escape clause—Section 201—of the Trade Act of 1974 to allow for quick relief from trade injury, Oswald said. Unfair trade provisions as well as other avenues for relief from injury should also be reviewed, he said.

The escape clause mechanism promised to help industries seriously injured by imports, but has never been effective, Oswald charged. Not only does the law require expensive and extensive documentation of trade injury, it also involves vague criteria for the International Trade Commission (ITC) to use in making determinations of injury, he said. As a result, findings of injury are few and far between, and even then the President frequently decides not to implement an ITC ruling, he noted.

Since 1975, when the 1974 Trade Act became law, only 47 cases have been filed under its provisions because of legal barriers, Oswald observed. The ITC recommended relief in 27 cases, and only 11 have resulted in any presidential action to give relief, he said.

"The relief has never been enough to allow the injured industry to recover from the import assault," Oswald said. "Cases are not even filed because U.S. industries and U.S. workers see no results."

Escape clause

He said that Section 201 should be overhauled to make the escape clause fair and predictable in its application, reasonably accessible to all parties suffering import injury, effective in strengthening the import competitiveness of American industries, and timely to provide swift relief.

For unfair trade practices, many of the same problems exist, Oswald charged. Relief is too little, too late, or not at all. He called for an overhaul of unfair trade practices procedures, with special attention given to the automobile, shipping and shipbuilding, and apparel industries.

In dealing with nonmarket economies, the AFL-CIO opposes the approach of trying to construct a value based upon the costs to produce an item in the lowest-cost free market economy, Oswald said. Instead, he added, "we believe that the average U.S. price would be a fairer and more accurate measure."

Oswald also called for revitalization policies for basic industries chronically affected by the import invasion saying that relief is essential for these injured industries. He also urged clarifying and strengthening the 1974 Trade Act to identify and eliminate unjustifiable or unreasonable foreign trade policies or acts.

Inspection step-up set for grain elevators

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration announced an interim safety enforcement program for grain elevators, conceding it had erred in not classifying the facilities as "high-hazard" workplaces.

OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter said the inspection measure will remain in effect until a federal safety standard is promulgated—possibly later this year.

AFL-CIO unions representing workers in the grain processing industry have been pressing for a strong safety standard for several years.

A sixfold increase in grain elevator deaths since 1979 justifies the expanded regulation efforts, OSHA admitted.

Under the new program, Auchter said the safety agency will only inspect about 100 of the 15,000 grain elevators across the country.

Inspections slashed

OSHA inspected 466 grain elevators in 1979 when there were only two fatalities. Under the Reagan Administration, the number of inspections was slashed to just 45 in 1982, and the known death toll increased to 12.

The agency's recordkeeping efforts were dropped on the number of grain elevator explosions, deaths and injuries, in 1981. The 12 deaths in 1982 were determined primarily from newspaper accounts.

Only grain storage facilities will be covered by the interim measure.

For the interim period, OSHA will issue citations under the "general industry standards" clause of the federal safety law, which requires employers to provide clean and safe workplaces.

Since 1981, OSHA inspected grain elevators only when there were worker complaints, serious accidents or "imminent danger" conditions.

The proposed safety standard, still in the drafting stage, must first be approved by the Office of Management & Budget before advancing to the public comment period. Publication of the rules is expected in the fall.

The AFL-CIO American

Federationist

VOL. 90, NO. 2 MARCH 19, 1983

AFL-CIO ECONOMIC PROGRAM FOR JOBS AND FAIRNESS

This issue of the Federationist contains the AFL-CIO Economic Program for Jobs and Fairness, along with background papers, adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., Feb. 21-28, 1983.

The AFL-CIO proposes an economic program to provide jobs for the unemployed and increased fairness in the tax and budget policies of the federal government. Our program would provide 900,000 jobs in 1983, 1.8 million jobs in 1984, a stimulus that would put us on the road to full employment.

Needed public services would be expanded, planned public works would be built, low- and moderate-cost housing constructed and rehabilitated, more youth trained and placed in jobs, and displaced workers assisted. Extended unemployment insurance would provide longer support for the jobless. There would be mortgage and rent payment relief as well as health care established for the unemployed.

The AFL-CIO program calls upon the Congress to reject some $19.4 billion in Administration proposed budget cuts for non-defense programs. The proposed cuts from such programs as job training, education, housing, Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps, and child nutrition should not be made in the face of the severe recession and its resulting hardships.

Federal employees should not be made the sacrificial offering for Reagan's budget slashing efforts. Fairness demands that federal employees receive pay commensurate with the private sector while the promise of decent retirement is kept.

Decimation of state and local government funds should be reversed to offset the many budget cuts, the transfer of federal responsibilities, and the harmful effects of loss of state revenue sharing and the freezing of local revenue sharing.

To pay for these programs, the AFL-CIO proposes that Congress close a number of tax loopholes that benefit particularly wealthy individuals and corporations. Important tax changes would include a $700 cap on the fiscal 1983 individual tax cut and the repeal of future indexing of tax rates. Needed corporate tax changes include the changing of the foreign tax credit to a deduction and the reforming of the investment tax credit.

The AFL-CIO is convinced that the nation can meet its national security needs without the 9 to 10 percent real increase in the defense budget requested by the Reagan Administration. We propose limiting the increase to real growth rates of 5 to 7 percent. (A number of members of the Executive Council have expressed the strong opinion that the increase should be held to the lower end of this range or below.) This approach would cut the defense outlays and authorizations by some $3 to $5 billion in outlays and up to $14 billion in authorizations in 1984 and would amount to $23 billion to $47 billion in outlays and up to $78 billion in authorizations for the years 1984 through 1986, according to the Congressional Budget Office. We propose that this 5 to 7 percent increase in real defense spending should be paid through a progressive surtax levied on the corporate and individual income tax plus an additional tax on income currently sheltered.

We reject the President's proposal to attain defense savings by putting a freeze on civilian and military pay and curtailment of retirement benefits. Curtailments and stretch-outs, particularly in the procurement of new weapons—the area with the biggest increases—rather than in defense readiness should be the means to attain defense savings.

The AFL-CIO program would increase the federal deficit slightly in the near term, but would reduce the federal deficit directly by some $148 to $151 billion in 1986, not counting the substantial indirect effects resulting from putting people back to work, as $30 billion is regained for the Treasury by each one percent drop in unemployment.

But in addition to tax and budget policies, the federal government also must pursue a more expansionary monetary policy as well as a trade policy that attempts to achieve fair trade.

For long-term revitalization, the government must pursue a reindustrialization program that involves business and labor. A national industrial policy supported by a new Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be set up to rebuild the nation's industrial base with loans, grants, guarantees, and targeted tax policies to strengthen investment in basic industries and new, high-growth industries. Special consideration should be given to areas of high unemployment.

The token jobs program proposed by the Reagan Administration in response to Congressional pressure is a recognititon of the serious problem of unemployment. It is, however, only a small first step. We support a quick relief package to be followed by more comprehensive jobs legislation.

Today, 11.4 million American workers are officially jobless (10.4 percent) and 1.8 million have become discouraged in their search for work and have dropped out of the labor force. Unemployment has increased by 3.6 million since July 1981. Moreover, some 1.5 million workers will be entering the labor force each year over the next five years.

Despite some recent signs of an economic upturn, there are few predictions of an early end to high unemployment. There is even a danger that continued high interest rates will curtail the recovery.

Even after five years of projected improvement, unemployment will be higher than it was in 1979, according to the Reagan Administration's own forecast or that of the Congressional Budget Office. (Table below.)

When the private sector cannot provide enough jobs, the federal government must step in. This is the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946, re-affirmed in 1978 by the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balanced Economic Growth Act.

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988

It is clearly in the economic and social interest of the nation to put Americans who are able and willing to work into productive jobs which generate taxes, produce useful community services and community facilities, and stimulate the economy in communities with high unemployment.

A large-scale, adequately funded, anti-recession job creation program, had it been put into effect last year, would have very significantly reduced unemployment, eased the severity of the recession and also significantly cut the long-term federal budget deficit. Last year the President projected a federal budget deficit of $91 billion for fiscal 1983 and told the nation that a jobs program would be too costly. Now the Reagan Administration tells us the 1983 deficit will be $208 billion. If unemployment were cut in half, the federal deficit would be cut by more than two-thirds.

To meet the nation's pressing needs, the program the AFL-CIO is proposing would provide a large number of jobs for the unemployed, re-establish fairness in the tax system, bring some balance to defense needs and maintain essential domestic programs. We urge the AFL-CIO program as the best way to return to a healthy, vibrant economy.

AFL-CIO JOBS AND STIMULUS PROGRAM

The AFL-CIO program for job creation includes community development supplemental jobs, accelerated public works, and a recovery for the housing industry. In addition, special action is needed for dislocated, minority and young workers, and all workers in all categories who require added protections during this time of disaster for the job market in America. Millions of jobless workers need extended unemployment compensation and emergency action to protect lost health care protection for themselves and their families.

Community Development Supplemental Jobs—We propose a large-scale community development jobs program with 100 percent federal funding for jobs directly on the regular, local government payrolls. Unlike previous public sector jobs programs, specifically the CETA program, these jobs would not be in a separate category. Measures would be included to prevent substitution for regularly employed workers.

In every community, there is work to be done that is vital to that community's economic health and public well-being but which has been neglected. Because of declining tax revenues, federal budget cuts and local government fiscal crises, many of these communities need help to repair, maintain, and rehabilitate essential public facilities and public services.

For this purpose, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $5 billion for fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $10 billion for fiscal year 1984.

Accelerated Public Works—Investment in accelerated public works can provide jobs and essential infrastructure underpinning for private sector investment and economic growth. The Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 is only a start in the right direction. For years this nation has lived off its public capital instead of replenishing it. We have shortchanged investments in needed public facilities related to health, education, energy, safety, solid waste removal, water supply, parks, highways, bridges, ports, railroads and urban mass transit. The result is a huge backlog of unmet public capital needs and a major impediment to growth and a return to the nation's full productive potential. The crucial role of public capital formation is too often ignored. Such public investment plays a key role in raising the nation's productivity and output. Experience in the 1960s and 1970s—particularly in the 1975 recession—demonstrates that accelerated public works can provide jobs quickly and economically while restoring economic growth.

For such a program, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $5 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $10 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Housing Construction and Rehabilitation—In past recessions, housing was revitalized through such programs as below-market interest rate subsidies and rental assistance for low-income households. But the depth and length of this recession has seriously worsened the underlying problems of housing inadequacy and affordability. A program which provided support for the construction of 170,000 new housing units a year—about the level of assisted housing starts in the 1970s—could make a significant contribution to closing the housing gap. In addition, Congress should enact legislation to provide home mortgage relief and rental assistance for jobless workers in danger of losing their home or being evicted.

For these purposes, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $5 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $10 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Youth Programs—Two million American teenagers are unemployed—including half of all black teenagers in the workforce, and one of every four teenagers overall. Youth employment and training needs are too often slighted in programs aimed at older workers. Expansion of the successful Job Corps, establishment of a new youth conservation corps, and other employment and training projects are needed to alleviate the special problems of jobless youth.

The AFL-CIO remains adamantly opposed to subminimum wages for workers of any race, sex or age. A long history of studies and pilot programs have reached the same conclusion as then Secretary of Labor George Shultz did in 1970: there is no evidence of any appreciable increase in jobs because of a subminimum wage.

For the youth program, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $3 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Dislocated Workers—Supplemental funds should be allocated to the new Job Training Partnership Act's program to help workers hit by plant closings and major layoffs. These workers need a variety of pre-layoff assistance and services, as well as training, to help them move back into regular jobs.

For this purpose, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $1 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $2 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Unemployment Insurance—To replace the present supplemental benefits program expiring March 31, 1983, Congress should enact a permanent program of supplemental unemployment insurance, funded by general revenues, with a maximum duration of not less than 65 weeks. The 6.27 million jobless workers now on unemployment compensation are the most in the history of a system dating to 1935. Still, only half of the 12 million officially unemployed are getting any unemployment benefits.

Since July 1981, more than five million workers have exhausted their regular UI benefits and another one million long-term jobless workers have lost their extended benefits. Of the 900,000 unemployed workers getting federal supplemental benefits, 135,000 have already exhausted or will soon exhaust these benefits. The remaining 765,000 will run out of benefits in the coming weeks. The drastic cutbacks in the extended UI benefit program means that these extended UI benefits are available only in about half of the states despite catastrophic unemployment levels.

To meet the urgent need of long-term jobless workers, we urge a supplemental appropriation of $2 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $6 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Health Care for the Unemployed—Since health insurance coverage is usually tied to the workplace, Labor Department statistics indicate 50 percent of laid-off workers lose health care protection immediately or one month after layoff. Only 20 percent get coverage for three months or more. Since the average duration of unemployment is a little over four months, most jobless workers can expect to be completely without health insurance protection. At the same time, most unemployed workers are denied Medicaid coverage because they have not been poor long enough to meet the state eligibility criteria.

We urge the necessary authorizing legislation and a supplemental appropriation of $3 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $5 billion in fiscal year 1984 to assure health insurance coverage and health services for unemployed workers and their families.

In summary, we are calling for supplemental appropriations of $22.5 billion in fiscal year 1983 and an appropriation of $46 billion in fiscal year 1984 to create jobs, to stim-

BILLIONS OF DOLLARS

This table details the deficit reductions possible through the AFL-CIO program. The combination of tax measures and defense savings over the 1984-1986 period add up to over $300 billion and most of these savings would continue in later years. The cost of programs to create jobs, help the unemployed and restore fairness add up to essentially a one-time increase in expenditure of $87.8 billion. Deficits would also be reduced as employment gains create additional incomes and tax revenues.

BUDGET CUTS

In 1983, as in 1981 and 1982, the Reagan Administration is proposing drastic cuts in federal programs that help workers, elderly people and children, the poor and the needy.

The AFL-CIO calls on Congress to reject the President's $19 billion cut in non-defense programs from current service levels and to appropriate sufficient funds for protection of the unemployed, and the needy, and for education and training to get the nation back on track to full employment.

Reagan Administration budget cuts for fiscal 1984 strike at a range of key social and economic programs. For example:

- Job training and employment funds are to be cut.
- Unemployment compensation funds are reduced.
- Trade Adjustment Assistance is to be killed.
- Education, student loans, compensatory education for disadvantaged, vocational and adult education are cut.
- Housing programs for low- and moderate-income families suffer deferrals, stretch-outs, and cutbacks.
- Federal employee pay and retirement benefits sacrificed.
- Aid for the poor is cut $12 billion in Medicaid, food stamps, child nutrition, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and low-income energy assistance.
- Medicare and other health services take cuts.
- Revenue sharing with state and local governments is further tampered with.
- Railroad retirement increases postponed.
- Mass transit and other transportation programs are reduced again.
- Legal services for the poor are killed.
- Mine safety and health inspectors are cut.
- Environmental protection funds are drastically reduced.

Federal budget cuts in programs administered at state and local government levels have left those governments with inadequate resources to provide essential services. These federal budget cuts not only hurt people who suffered reduction of program services, they also placed additional burdens on already strained state and local government resources. There were transfers of program responsibilities to states in the form of consolidated block grants for a whole area, such as education and health, while cutting back on total funds to perform the functions, or increasing the amount by less than needed to match inflationary cost increases. Such actions were further aggravated by eliminating revenue sharing funds going to the states and freezing the amount of revenue sharing going to the cities, so that the effectiveness of such funds was decreased by inflation. The federal government has a responsibility to provide relief.

TAXES

The 1981 Reagan tax cut was irresponsible and unfair. It is damaging the economy and undermining fairness and equity in the nation's tax structure. In 1982, Congress, shocked and embarrassed by the bizarre examples of tax avoidance and huge revenue drain, pushed through a complex array of tax changes and increases that restored some revenue and curbed some of the more blatant giveaways of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA).

The 1982 Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (TEFRA) phased out the previous year's safe harbor leasing gimmick whereby business bought and sold tax write-offs; it extended the principle of payroll withholding to interest and dividends, and it strengthened the minimum tax provision so that those with large amounts of tax sheltered income shoulder a little more of the nation's tax burden.

These 1982 measures restored only a small part of the revenue and equity lost in the 1981 "supply side" giveaway to the rich and the corporations.

Thus, $92 billion, or half (49 percent), of the $189 billion 1984 deficit can still be traced to the Reagan tax cut even after accounting for 1982's corrective action. For the three-year 1984-1986 period the Administration's proposed cumulative deficit is $531 billion and its tax program, even after the changes made in 1982, will still drain $358 billion, or two-thirds of this projected deficit, from the Treasury.

These deficits, past and prospective, are obviously not the result of government overspending, or consciously stepping in to strengthen the economy. They are the direct result of trying to boost the economy through senseless and unfair tax cuts while sapping its lifeblood through sky-high interest rates.

The fairest and most sensible way to deal with revenue needs and equity issues is to complete the job of patching up the damage from the 1981 tax giveaway and to embark on a long-overdue program to close loopholes and put federal revenue-raising back on an equitable basis.

$700 Cap: If Congress does not act, on July 1, 1983, the third installment of the Reagan Administration's 5-10-10 percent tax cut will go into effect. Its cost will be about $30 billion. Ten billion dollars will flow into the pockets of the wealthiest and most privileged members of our society.

That $10 billion is just about equal to the amount of money the President would squeeze out of food stamps, Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), Supplemental Security Income (SSI), and child nutrition programs over the next five years.

a year would receive $2,400 per year in tax reductions—on top of $4,500 per year from the first two installments. In sharp contrast, a $30,000 working family would receive a cut of $340, and a family earning $20,000 would only get $175 from the July cut.

A tax cut of such size and distribution is unconscionable and the third installment must be limited. With an appropriate cap, no taxpayer would get more than $700. Capping the total tax reduction in such a fashion will have little or no effect on income under $45,000, so it does not risk reducing consumer demand or otherwise weakening the economy. The revenue gain would be $6 billion in fiscal year 1984, and total $21 billion for the three years 1984 through 1986. At the same time, the income tax would become somewhat more equitable as the giveaway to those at the top is reduced.

H.R. 1183, a bill to limit the individual tax cut of 1983 to $700, was introduced February 2, 1983, by Representative Guarini of New Jersey with co-sponsors including Representatives Wright of Texas, Foley of Washington, and Gephardt of Missouri.

Repeal Indexation: Another way to raise revenues while strengthening the economy is to repeal the indexation provisions of the ERTA that will take effect in 1985. An indexed tax code means a sharp limitation on the ability of the federal government to manage the economy. It amounts to a permanent and continuing erosion of the tax base regardless of economic need or circumstance. Repealing the indexation provision would save $8.9 billion in fiscal year 1985 and $23.4 billion in fiscal 1986.

"Savings Incentives": The 1981 Act contained a number of provisions which would supposedly reward savers. These devices—interest and dividend exclusions, individual and self-employed retirement accounts and the like—erode the equity of the tax structure by benefitting primarily those who can afford to save. Moreover, individuals and families in higher tax brackets receive greater benefits. Any small tax reduction that flows to moderate and middle income Americans is overshadowed by the competition for funds and the ratcheting up of interest rates that these devices cause.

Beginning in 1985, 15 percent of interest income that exceeds non-mortgage interest expense will be tax exempt up to $6,000 ($3,000 single). Repeal of this exclusion would save $.6 billion in fiscal year 1984, $1.7 billion in 1985 and $3.7 billion in 1986.

Individual Retirement Account provisions should be made more equitable and less costly by changing the off-the-top exclusion to a credit providing the same dollar amount to all "savers" regardless of their tax bracket.

Capital Gains: The 60 percent exclusion of profits from the sale of stocks, bonds, real estate or other capital assets and the total tax exemption of such gains when passed on to heirs fundamentally violate the concept of tax equity.

The 60 percent capital gains exclusion is an $18 billion a year revenue loser, and the top 5 percent of the nation's taxpayers get 60 percent of the benefit. Cutting the exclusion back to the pre-1979 50 percent level would raise $2.5 billion in 1984, and beginning on a 5-year phasedown of the exclusion in 1985, with adequate protection for homeowners, could raise over $16 billion in the 1984-86 period.

Estate and Gift Taxes: The 1981 Revenue Act essentially repealed the Estate and Gift Tax. Sharp cuts in rates and increased exemptions and credits cut the revenue from this tax so drastically that by 1986 this tax on the transfer of wealth will account for only one-half of one percent of federal revenue. The 1981 cuts should be repealed and the estate and gift tax should be restored to its former structure, which allowed $250,000 or one-half of the estate (whichever is greater) to be passed on to the surviving spouse tax free and provided generous credits for other heirs.

Scaling back estate and gift tax exclusions could generate $3.2 billion in FY 1984, $4.2 billion in 1985 and $5.6 billion in FY 1986.

Corporate Taxes: The corporate income tax should be reinstated as a source of revenue, equity and economic balance. Corporate income tax receipts for the 1983 and 1984 budgets are estimated at $35.3 and $51.8 billion respectively. At this level, the tax amounts to only 5.9 percent of total 1983 budget receipts and 7.8 percent of anticipated 1984 revenue. In 1980 the ratio was 12.5 percent, and in 1970 it was 17 percent. In 1960—before the enactment of depreciation speed-ups, the investment tax credits, and rate reductions—the corporate income tax financed nearly 25 percent of the total federal budget. If the corporate income tax were to bear the same share of the federal tax burden in 1984 as it did in 1980, receipts would be $30 billion higher.

Tax subsidies encourage the overseas operations of U.S.-based multinational corporations. These preferences have eroded the tax structure, destroyed American jobs, and spurred the outflow of U.S. capital, technology, and know-how.

■ Foreign Tax Credit: The present practice of allowing dollar-for-dollar credits against a multinational company's U.S. income tax liability is a loophole which encourage U.S. corporations to produce abroad. Foreign taxes should be deducted just like other costs of doing business.

■ Deferral: The deferral privilege allows multinational corporations to defer U.S. income tax payments on the earnings of their foreign subsidiaries until such profits are brought home—which may never occur.

■ DISC: Elimination of the Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC) which allows corporations to spin off income and profits into export subsidiaries in order to defer, perhaps indefinitely, taxes on export profits.

Ending these three foreign tax subsidies would raise $14.5 billion in revenue in FY 1984 and $48.7 billion in the 1984-1986 period.

The Investment Tax Credit: In 1982 Congress went halfway toward eliminating the practice of deducting, as depreciation allowances, costs that were already deducted as investment credits. If the job were completed and business were required to reduce the depreciation base by the full ITC rather than only one-half, $1.3 billion would be recaptured in FY 1984 and $7.8 billion over the three-year 1984-1986 period. Cutting the credit back from 10 percent to its previous 7 percent level would raise $5.6 billion in FY 1984 and $20.9 billion in the 1984-1986 period.

The "Small Business" Rate: Under present law, the first $100,000 of corporate net profit is taxed at a maximum of 26.75 percent. This low rate, justified as a device to cut taxes on small business, also applies to large corporations. Moreover, the largest corporations receive the lion's share of the tax break. Limiting this lower rate to smaller corporations (phased out between $100 and $200,000) would raise $1.9 billion in FY 1984 and $5.9 billion in the three-year 1984-1986 period. It should also help the competitive position of smaller businesses.

Oil and Gas: High on the list of unfinished business is the elimination of the special tax loopholes for the oil and gas industry. Eliminating percentage depletion and the immediate expensing of drilling costs would increase revenue in 1984 by $7.2 billion and generate a cumulative revenue increase of over $24 billion during the 1984-1986 period.

Various tax proposals spelled out in the Reagan Administration's FY 1984 Budget would further erode the fairness, simplicity, and the productivity of the tax code.

Tuition tax credits are trotted out again and a new "Individual Education Account" gimmick is floated despite the deficits and the need to improve funding for educational opportunities accessible to all citizens, including the disadvantaged.

An estimated $135 billion in corporate tax reductions will accumulate during the 1982-1986 period due to the 1981 changes in depreciation allowances. This massive revenue giveaway did not generate the expected boom in investment, output or employment. Instead, the economy sank into the worst recession in the post-war period. Accordingly, there is no reason to provide further so-called "incentives" to the corporate sector.

The problem of urban economic decay will not be solved by or through the so-called enterprise zones which have been proposed by the Administration. These zones would do nothing to stimulate overall economic development. Instead, they would merely encourage business tax cuts, plant piracy and a reshuffling of workers and jobs.

The Administration proposes tax workers' health insurance premiums above $175 a month for a family and $70 for an individual. This will particularly hurt older workers, handicapped workers, workers with large families, workers exposed to harmful chemicals and other industrial hazards—in fact, anyone with large health care costs.

The so-called "contingency tax," proposed by the Reagan Administration to assuage the fears of the financial community about monstrous deficits in the future, would probably have the opposite effect. Uncertainty about the future would be aggravated, not dampened, by such a "tax." It would not touch the billions of dollars that escape the tax base through inappropriate exclusions, tax shelters, write-offs of phantom costs, and overseas tax havens.

The federal government's fiscal problems —in large part the result of tax injustice— have ironically touched off an array of proposals for "simplification" and reform which in fact would shift even more of the tax burden to low- and middle-income Americans.

Such proposals include a national sales tax, a flat tax or measures to further diminish or eliminate the corporate income tax. In short, we reaffirm our support for a tax structure firmly grounded on the principle of ability to pay.

Jobs bill, budget

Congress challenges Reagan funding limits

A misleading scare campaign generated by the banks has flooded Congress with letters from constituents urging repeal of the 10 percent withholding provision that is scheduled to take effect in July. Sen. Robert W. Kasten, Jr. (R-Wis.) sought to tie a repeal provision to the job funding measure and Senate leaders maneuvered to keep it from being adopted.

The stalemate was broken when Kasten was promised a vote on his repeal bill next month. The Senate then passed the funding bill, 82-16, sending it to conference.

On the withholding tax issue, the White House and labor were in accord that the repeal attempt should be rejected. An estimated $19 billion in tax revenues is lost each year from the under-reporting of interest and dividend income.

Brewing in the wings of both the House and Senate was a battle over the shape of the budget for the fiscal year that starts next Oct. 1.

Many of the details of the budget resolution Congress will act on this spring will be filled in later in the year. But the budget resolution adopted by Congress will dictate much of the subsequent action and will set the range of the economic recovery program.

Democratic proposal

House Democrats, seeking a consensus on the basis of a questionnaire from party leaders soliciting their views, came up with a proposal that the Budget Committee is expected to adopt on a largely party-line vote.

It would add some $16 billion in outlays to President Reagan's proposed budget, largely through restoration of cuts the Administration wants to make in domestic programs and additions for job-related programs and recession-relief measures such as loans to prevent home foreclosures and health insurance for the jobless.

These move in the direction the AFL-CIO has urged, but fall short of labor's proposals.

The Democratic plan would bring the projected deficit far below the Reagan budget by raising revenue through repeal, deferment or substantial modification of the scheduled July 1 tax cut. The budget resolution would obligate Congress to legislate a formula for additional revenue but would not dictate the method.

Presumably, Republicans will attempt to put together a conservative coalition of the type that gave the Administration its budget victories in the last Congress.

Defense flap

A big controversy in both the House and Senate will be the Administration's request for a 10 percent after-inflation rise in defense spending. The House Democratic version proposed to cut the increase back to 4 percent in real terms. But the Administration was also headed for a setback in the Senate Appropriations Committee, which was reported in agreement on holding the rise below 6 percent.

At the Administration's request, the Republican-controlled Senate committee agreed to put off action on the defense budget until after the Easter recess. The White House was reported trying to work out a compromise that would avoid a direct defeat for the President.

'82 contract gains averaged 7.4% for public employees

Major state and local government collective bargaining contracts in 1982 provided an average first-year gain in total compensation of 7.4 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Compensation includes wages and benefits.

Over the life of these contracts, BLS said, the annual average compensation increase also was 7.4 percent. Wages alone increased an average of 7.2 percent in both the first contract year and annually over the life of the agreements.

The BLS data are derived from 42 settlements last year each covering 5,000 or more workers for a total of 573,000 workers.

The bureau noted that the measures on government contracts are not comparable with data published for the private sector earlier this year. Cost-of-living clauses cover only 2 percent of workers in the state and local government settlements, compared with 34 percent of those in the private sector, for example. Also, pension benefits are not subject to collective bargaining in many public jurisdictions, BLS noted.

Private-sector contracts covering 5,000 or more workers each last year provided an average increase in wages and benefits of 3.2 percent in the first year and 2.7 percent a year over term.

Stocking up

Food for jobless members of Auto Workers Local 72 on long-term layoff from the American Motors Corp. plant in Kenosha, Wis., fills the local's headquarters. The food was brought with donations of $15,865.80 from the local's working members and a matching contribution from AMC. About 92,600 pounds of groceries were sorted, bagged and distributed to some 1,150 laid-off members by union volunteers and retirees. The UAW got competitive bids on the food with the help of Food & Commercial Workers Local 1444 in Kenosha.

Weekly plant collections aid jobless UAW members

Detroit—Members of the Auto Workers who still have jobs are bringing food and cash donations to plants and union halls every Thursday to help out jobless UAW members.

At the same time that the union announced the expansion of its own direct-help program, it called on the federal government to speed up emergency assistance for the jobless and the needy.

UAW Vice President Owen Bieber announced the stepped-up collection program, which took effect Mar. 10, at a conference on services for unemployed members held at the union's headquarters.

More than 200 UAW local union officers and staff as well as representatives of state and local social service agencies participated in the conference. It focused on ways to deliver a full range of social, financial and emotional aid to jobless workers and their families.

Bieber said the new emergency food drive is patterned on the 10-week UAW-General Motors Corp. "Care and Share" program that just expired. But he stressed that what the UAW is doing "in no way absolves the federal government and its agencies from their responsibility to act."

The UAW-GM program, in which contributions of food or cash made by union members were matched by the company, resulted in the collection of nearly $2.1 million worth of food and $948,971 in cash from workers. GM matched it with over $3 million in cash. The union said UAW retirees contributed some $25,000 of its donations.

Bieber said GM local unions will continue to accept donations for distribution through local community assistance programs, and that the purpose of the new food program is to coordinate those and other efforts already underway around the country and to "put the full backing of the international union behind them."

Political action

He also told the conference that political action is an important part of the union's assistance program because "the real solutions to chronic unemployment are political solutions."

The UAW "will not only be helping our unemployed brothers and sisters to get on their feet, but will also be urging them to use those feet to get to the polls."

Bieber also urged federal, state and local authorities to distribute surplus food supplies to the unemployed, to expand all other types of assistance such as shelter and clothing.

Earlier this month, in a gesture of solidarity, members of the German Metalworkers Union at an Opel automobile plant near Frankfurt collected and sent to the UAW in Detroit some $25,000 in cash, as well as food and clothing, to aid unemployed auto workers.

The West German unionists said they acted out of a desire to help American brothers and sisters in a time of crisis and in memory of similar generosity extended to workers at their plant by UAW members just after World War II.

Religious groups assail budget plan

Leaders of the nation's major religious denominations said the Reagan Administration's fiscal 1984 budget proposal is morally unacceptable because it "rejects the rights of the poor and of the unemployed."

In a press conference at the U.S. Capitol, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders said "the federal budget represents the most important moral statement our government will make this year."

Their joint statement said they were "profoundly disturbed" by the Reagan budget, which they said presented "a vision of a nation intent on a selfish and dangerous course of social stinginess and military overkill."

Unifying issue

In what they called "an unprecedented show of unity" by denominational leaders on the budget issue, they urged Congress to enact "a just federal budget—a moral statement for our nation—which boldly proclaims the vision of a just society rooted in our nation's most compassionate traditions and guided by our deepest beliefs in God's intention for humankind."

The statement was signed by representatives of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, American Jewish Congress, U.S. Catholic Conference, United Church of Christ, United Methodist Church, United Presbyterian Church, the Southern Presbyterian Church, Disciples of Christ, Reformed Church in America, Church of the Brethren, African Methodist Episcopal Church, Progressive National Baptist Convention, American Baptist Churches, Friends United Meeting, Unitarian-Universalist Association and the American Ethical Union.

Public debate

Kenneth L. Teegarden, president of the Disciples of Christ, called that statement "the opening effort of the churches in the public debate over the budget."

Teegarden said churches across the nation have been struggling to assist the large numbers of recession victims through soup kitchens and other ways. But he said the needs can only be met by reorienting budget priorities.

"The private sector will do what it can, but there is simply no way to fill the gap," said Ron Krietemeyer, director of the U.S. Catholic Conference's Domestic Social Development Office. He said that church volunteers are confronted with "an obscene level of need—all those who are turned away every night."

In their two-page statement, the religious leaders said the Reagan budget would "condemn the poor to suffer even more." They urged Congress "to refuse to reduce any further those survival programs on which the poor depend, and to restore funding to meet the needs of our poorest citizens."

They called on Congress to enact pending jobs and emergency relief legislation and also "a more far-reaching jobs program."

In addition, the statement said Congress should "commit itself to creating a full employment economy where everyone has the right to earn fair wages at a job freely chosen."

Jobs trade-off

The Reagan budget, the statement stressed, "continues the policy of using unemployment as the principal weapon to fight inflation. It thereby deliberately flouts society's collective responsibility to take direct action to reduce this enormous and unnecessary waste of human potential."

On the budget's large military spending increases, the statement said that "in the name of defense, this budget equates peacekeeping with firepower and thereby increases our insecurity as more and more destabilizing weapons systems are added to an already bloated arsenal."

Social security retirement age rollcall

The House voted 228-202 on Mar. 9 for a labor-opposed amendment to the social security bill that would gradually raise the age at which full social security retirement benefits can be paid from 65 to 67.

Voting right (R) against the amendment were 188 Democrats and 14 Republicans. Wrong votes (W) for the amendment were cast by 76 Democrats and 152 Republicans.

Holes in the Floor

AMERICA'S GOLDEN AGE, as President Reagan apparently views it, began to tarnish early in this century. That's when government began to climb on the backs of the people, according to the White House reading of American history.

The President explained it all in his message to Congress advocating a cut-rate "youth opportunity wage."

"For nearly a century and a half, this nation experienced no significant youth unemployment problem. Then, just after the turn of the century, state legislatures began enacting minimum wage laws," the President complained.

Actually, as the presidential message notes, those early state efforts were so minuscule that "there was little impact." Even Mr. Reagan couldn't complain too strenuously over the minimum wage of $1 to $1.25 a day, applicable only to women and girls, that Arkansas adopted in 1915 and didn't get around to updating until 1968.

THE REAL culprit, the President insisted, was enactment by Congress of the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act, which included a federal minimum wage for firms in interstate commerce.

Reagan told Congress that this federal wage floor "contributed to declining youth employment in manufacturing." But fortunately, "other industries such as retail trade and the service sector still provided an outlet for the energies of youth who wished to work."

But all good things come to an end, and "during the 1960s and the 1970s, the minimum wage was increased and its coverage was expanded. Youth unemployment increased, Reagan said, conveniently ignoring the fact that unemployment has likewise increased among all age groups.

Two years ago, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan took a more skeptical view in testimony at Senate hearings on a subminimum youth wage proposed by a right-wing Republican senator. Donovan noted at the time that present law allows full-time students to be employed at 85 percent of the minimum wage in after-school and summer jobs—and hundreds of thousands of them are so employed.

But, he was told, procedures for hiring at the student rate are "cumbersome."

The Secretary of Labor's reply was that it might be even more "cumbersome" for the Labor Dept. to supervise a broader youth subminimum wage to make sure that it is not being abused.

Now, singing the White House tune, Mr. Donovan makes the incredible claim that the Administration's subminimum wage proposal "would not displace adult workers" and "would create a minimum of 150,000 to 640,000 new jobs for youth.

OF COURSE, the erosion of buying power since Congress last adjusted the pay floor has had the effect of cutting the real pay of everyone employed at the minimum wage.

Mr. Reagan had something to say about that, also. He will "vigorously oppose" any increase in the minimum, even if limited to adults, because it would add to unemployment.

If a lower minimum wage will increase jobs and a higher pay floor will decrease jobs, it doesn't take much of a leap of the imagination to see where the Reagan Administration's line of reasoning is taking us.

Those No Account Banks

IT ISN'T OFTEN, as some readers may have noted, that the AFL-CIO finds itself in strong agreement with the Reagan Administration on an economic issue.

But the President is on the right track in resisting the pressure created by the nation's banks for repeal of the modest 10 percent withholding tax on interest and dividend income.

Working people have their estimated income tax withheld from their paychecks, but people whose income comes largely from investments are on what amounts to an honor system. The result is an estimated $19 billion a year in lost tax revenues.

That money is needed—for programs to get people back to work, for national defense and, yes, to hold down the budget deficit.

Politics of greed block FDR's road to progress

By Press Associates, Inc.

Normally, it takes years for historians to gather material, ponder it and put history into perspective. But Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., chronicler of the New Deal era, already has seen enough of the Reagan counterrevolution.

Schlesinger spoke his mind at a dinner in the nation's capital for veterans of the Roosevelt Administration. The event celebrated the 50th anniversary of Franklin D. Roosevelt's first inaugural.

There did, indeed, seem to be giants in those days, Schlesinger said as he called the roll of talented people drawn to the New Deal. He said "history must measure these men and women by what they did" and recited their work:

"Before FDR there was no social security for the old, no unemployment compensation for the jobless, no food stamps for the poor, no federal lunches for school children, no federal regulation of the stock market, no federal guarantee of bank deposits, no federal protection for collective bargaining, no federal standards for minimum wages and maximum hours, no federal support for farm prices or rural electrification, no federal commitment to high employment or to equal opportunity.

Unresponsive government

"Before FDR, in short, the national government accepted no responsibility for Americans who found themselves, through no fault of their own, in economic or social distress."

The Great Depression confronted American democracy with a deadly challenge, Schlesinger said. When FDR took office in 1933, a quarter of the labor force was jobless. Mobs gathered in the cities. The countryside talked of revolution.

FDR promised action and act he did, Schlesinger said. New Deal programs built schools and roads and dams, developed the Tennessee Valley and other poor regions and created jobs and opportunities for millions of people.

In listening to FDR's inaugural speech again, Schlesinger said, certain words leapt out which had special relevance to today's problems. Business control of government had failed the nation; the "unscrupulous money-changers stand indicted" by public opinion and have fled the temple, FDR said.

Ethic of decency

Schlesinger said FDR had "posed an ethic of decency against the ethic of greed." FDR knew this was an age-old struggle to decide whether those of wealth and privilege also should hold political power and use it to increase that wealth and privilege.

"Greed is the animating principle of the Reagan Administration," Schlesinger declared, "untiring greed, anointed greed, ill-concealed by lofty words about self-reliance or voluntary charity or monetarism or supply-side economics or the new federalism or states' rights."

Schlesinger said the scandal in the Environmental Protection Agency is only the tip of the iceberg. The determination of the Interior Dept. "to turn the public domain over to private greed" will bring back overgrazing, overcutting and the looting of natural resources, he warned, adding:

"Greed controls tax policy; it controls labor policy; it controls antitrust policy; it has delivered the regulatory agencies to the corporations they were set up to regulate. Greedy men and, alas, women too have settled in public office like a plague of locusts, converting public responsibility into corporate enrichment."

Before the Reagan Administration leaves town, he predicted, its record will make the Teapot Dome and Dixon-Yates scandals look like Sunday school picnics.

Schlesinger recalled that FDR said "the test of progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little."

MEMO FROM COPE

Not to Mention Foxes in the Chicken Coop

Moles and the 'Coors Connection'

Moles, moles . . . everywhere you look, moles. Right-wing moles installed in the infrastructure (a word getting a lot of exercise these days) of government—many of them, apparently, planted into federal positions by, or because of, union-busting brewer Joe Coors, who's footsie with Ronald Reagan as a member of the President's "kitchen cabinet."

A recent Washington Post story reveals this alarming underside to the more publicized charges and counter-charges involving the Environmental Protection Agency—information not in the least diminished in impact by the resignation, under fire, of EPA Administrator Anne Gorsuch-Burford.

The Post disclosed how the EPA—a regulatory agency, after all—was literally stacked with persons at high levels—including Burford—whose prior public lives had been devoted to zapping environmental protection laws, and whose instincts were to protect polluting businesses from the agency that regulates them.

If ever the foxes were put in control of the chicken coop, this was it. And it raises questions that go beyond the immediate EPA hassle:

What about other parts of the federal government? To what extent are they, too, peopled with "Coors Connection" recruits or others like them? What kind of mischief can they do, or are they doing? (See accompanying story.)

The Post article tells of a band of conservatives in the Colorado state legislature who took control of key committees and top leadership positions in 1979. Proteges of Joe Coors, they were dubbed the "House Crazies" by some of their colleagues.

They were the point people in corporate-inspired assaults against a range of state environmental protection programs—among these, for example, measures to control toxic waste dumps.

One of the "Crazies" was none other than then-Colorado State Rep. Anne Gorsuch (now Burford) who voted to kill major hazardous waste regulation bills in the state and was rewarded for it by President Reagan as his pick to head the agency that regulates, among much else of environmental concern, hazardous waste sites.

Gorsuch-Burford brought with her to the EPA a passel of Colorado colleagues who shared her commitment to spare polluting industries the consequences and costs of the environmental messes they made. One of these was fellow state "House Crazy" Steven Durham—a graduate of Young Americans for Freedom, which has provided the shock troops and the leaders of today's "new right." Today, Durham is EPA's western regional administrator.

Another is Thornton Field, who was not in the state legislature, but lobbied it as a lawyer in Joe Coors' stable, his lobbying in part directed at getting the Coors brewing company off the hook on abiding by certain environmental protections. Field was at first special assistant to Gorsuch-Burford, is now head of EPA's enforcement division, one of many examples of persons highly placed in EPA who come out of the industries they are now sworn to regulate.

Not a "House Crazy," but another one of the "Coors Connection" crowd, is James Sanderson, whose possible conflict of interest is under U.S. House inquiry, and also had as a client in Colorado the Coors company. A part-time consultant to EPA under Gorsuch-Burford, he's been charged with efforts to lower environmental water standards at both the state and national levels, making things easier for industries, tougher for the environment.

At least two others of the Coors cadre of Colorado "House Crazies" were named by Reagan to key positions within the federal government. Robert Burford (now married to Gorsuch) is director of land management for the Interior Dept., headed by another Colorado protege of Coors, James Watt. (Coors money set up the Mountain States Legal Foundation to counter public service-type legal groups. Its first director was Watt.)

A typical "House Crazy," then-state Rep. Tom Tancredo, became regional head in Denver of the U.S. Dept. of Education. In 1980, the Post story says, Tancredo led a fight for cuts in Colorado's anti-poverty programs on grounds "they take away the individual's responsibility."

He displayed a similar flare for placing feet in mouth during the current flap over EPA. He was quoted as saying the whole thing is "a confrontation between two philosophies of government, one represented by Ronald Reagan, and the other represented by the media in Washington"—as if the media invented budget cuts of more than 40 percent at EPA, staff cuts of more than 10 percent, failure to use forcefully the laws intended to help clean up the environment, an inclination to cozy up to the business community at the expense of environmental protection.

Surely, there's no reason to be surprised that President Reagan would appoint to high positions persons who will carry out his policies. His policies are not aimed at strong regulatory enforcement of environmental laws.

But it's nice to know where all the moles are coming from—in many cases straight from a "Coors Connection."

From Whence They Come

Three of the main tributaries pouring recruits into the river of personnel appointed by the Reagan Administration are Young Americans for Freedom, a cluster of other right-wing organizations, and one representing various connections to union-busting brewer Joe Coors, close friend of Reagan.

The President himself confirms the abundance of rightists he's appointed. Speaking to the recent Conservative Political Action Conference, he said:

"For the first time in half a century, we've developed a whole new cadre of young conservatives in government."

Some of the appointments are to positions of substantial clout and importance (Anne Gorsuch-Burford, for one and James Watt, for another). Others are little more than ceremonial.

At least 50 appointees have, or had, ties to YAF, which for years has been the breeding ground for leaders of the "new right." At least 35 come from the "Coors Connection" either from the Coors-financed rightist think-tank, the Heritage Foundation, or from a network of conservative legal foundations underwritten partly by Coors. (Among other top appointees, Coors gave to EPA the guy who developed a 'hit list' to rid the agency of people who are "bleeding-heart" liberals or other naughty things. He was forced to resign soon after Mrs. Burford.)

About 100 others have been recruited from other rightist groups, including the Richard Viguerie web, and the American Conservative Union and the National Right to Work (for less) Committee.

Not all are still with the Administration, but others certainly have come on board, so the numbers hold up. They are, if anything, understated.

Coors's Heritage Foundation is so pleased with its contribution of personnel to the Administration that it tooted its own horn in a late-1981 issue of its newsletter. With the help of its own "friends in high places," the publication said proudly, "a great many of the destructive big government policies around since the New Deal have been shaken out of the federal government during the first year" of the Reagan Administration.

Some of the higher-elevation holes filled by "Coors Connection" people—in addition to those cited in the accompanying story on EPA—are a special assistant to the Labor Secretary; the director of the White House Office of Policy Management; a deputy executive secretary of Health & Human Services; an associate director of David Stockman's Office of Management & Budget (Stockman himself is out of YAF); an assistant Agriculture Secretary; a deputy assistant attorney general; the assistant Secretary of the Treasury for economic policy; the commissioner of Social Security.

Heading up the Office of Personnel Management is Donald Devine, out of YAF and American Conservative Union and a sometime consultant to the Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation. Others plucked from the right-to-work-for-less group are Hugh Reilly, highly placed in the Labor Dept., former legislative director for NRTWC; and Andrew Hare, former vice president of NRTWC, lodged in Health & Human Services.

Morton Blackwell left the Richard Viguerie shop, where he was an editor, for a more direct pipe to the President as a White House special assistant.

An assistant for, of all things, labor relations, at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development is Baker Armstrong Smith, who organized the Center on National Policy to "curb the abuse of union power," a field in which fund-raising is so lush some one must have felt the right-to-workers shouldn't have it all to themselves.

Odds 'n Ends

PROBLEM WITH POLLS often is you know more before you read them than after. In some of them, all is confusion. Recent Washington Post poll is a case in point. Paper asked respondents to grade President Reagan on 32 questions. Responses show big majorities feel he's unfair to poor and middle class, is a "rich man's President," who has "no idea what people who aren't wealthy are going through," yet is "starting to change the country in a good way." He "sticks to his principles," yet he "has created big budget deficits" (which violate his most sacred principles). By 50-45 percent, respondents do not agree that "he is unfair to old people," but by 62-25 percent they do not agree that "he has good ideas for changing the social security systems." You figure it out.

WITH TAX TIME hurrying near, it's comforting to learn that while you'll pay your full rate, some of the nation's banks won't. A congressional study shows that 20 of the largest banks pay an average of only a 2.7 percent tax rate on domestic income (1981 figures). Six of the 20 actually pulled in refunds or credits against future liabilities despite 1981 income ranging from $8 million to $154 million. The $154 million belonged to Bank America, the nation's second largest, which notched an $18 million refund or credit. The effective rate paid by the 20 big banks was $53 million in taxes on income of $1.9 billion.

TALK OF 'RECOVERY' is all very comforting if it pans out, but not much comfort to huge number of Americans who lost their homes through foreclosure. In first half of 1982, more than 21,000 American families were ousted.

NOT MUCH COMFORT, either, in store for food stamp recipients unless Congress blocks Reagan efforts toward further cuts, $1 billion worth from a program that's already felt the Reagan ax. On top of that, Reagan proposes another $300 million gouge from school lunch program, millions from welfare aid to families, and a freeze on high-nutrition food supplements for pregnant women, which would wind up costing that program's clients $800 million over five years. Even some conservatives' stomachs are turned by the flint-hearts of this Administration. Said Sen. Mark Andrews (R-S.D.), "Of all the dumb ways of saving money, not feeding kids is the dumbest."

Poland fights Solidarity with penal work camps

By James M. Shevis

The Polish military government of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski has created a Soviet-style system of forced labor in an effort to stamp out the Solidarity free trade union movement.

The AFL-CIO has learned that the Jaruzelski regime has forcibly conscripted thousands of Solidarity activists and herded them into what are known as "penal military camps." Most of these individuals were detained and imprisoned at some point following the crackdown on Solidarity Dec. 13, 1981. Some were released only in recent months.

The New York-based Committee in Support of Solidarity said it has received reports from Poland, including an eyewitness account, that describe deep human suffering and further deprivation of workers' rights.

"This new form of repression is completely done in secret from the Polish people at large as well as the international community, unlike the internment that took place during the 'state of war,'" said the committee's director, Eric Chenoweth. The "state of war" was a period of martial law declared by the Polish government in 1981.

"They want to break these people, which they weren't able to do through internment," Chenoweth said. "They also want to strike fear into the population as a whole so that Solidarity will not rise up again."

Working and living conditions at the penal camps are far worse than experienced by detainees during the state of war, Chenoweth said. Those inducted into the camps are put to hard labor, such as felling trees.

World opinion

"The camps, mostly isolated in forest areas, are not open to visits from family members of the inductees nor to any outside observation," Chenoweth reported. "The Polish government obviously feels that it is immune from world opinion and scrutiny over this new outrage against human rights."

The Committee in Support of Solidarity, whose board members include AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Teachers President Albert Shanker, said it has passed along its information on the penal camps to the International Labor Organization in Geneva and will seek to have the matter brought before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the Madrid review talks on the Helsinki Final Act, and other international forums.

Forced labor is a violation of both the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 1975 Helsinki agreement,

Message to Congress

Unemployed Americans from scores of job-depressed cities assemble at the Capitol to prod Congress to act on the labor-backed measures of jobs creation and emergency relief from the Reagan recession. The sign carried by this West Virginia carpenter tells the story. (Additional photo, Page 3.)

House sets budget to spur recovery, restore programs

By David L. Perlman

The House rebelled at the Reagan Administration's recession-breeding economic policies and voted 229-196 for a budget resolution that rejected further cuts in social programs and took what the AFL-CIO viewed as significant steps toward economic recovery.

For the first time in the Reagan presidency, the conservative coalition was unable to form a majority in the House to dictate the terms of a budget resolution.

The AFL-CIO welcomed the turnabout as a response "to the will of the people as expressed in last November's election." Virtually all of the newly elected Democrats voted with their party's mainstream. Conservative defections were limited to a hard-core 36 votes. Four Republicans broke with their party to support the budget.

Positive step

"America needs even greater programs for jobs, housing, health care and unemployment compensation," the AFL-CIO said. But it termed the House-passed budget "a responsible, positive step" and urged the Senate to join in leading the nation back from recession.

The budget approved by the House would restore virtually all of the cuts the Reagan Administration had sought to make in non-defense programs and add money to most of them, although seldom at the level the AFL-CIO had urged.

It would allow up to $9 billion over two years for public jobs, provide full funding of highway and mass transit programs, and substantial increases over both the Reagan budget and current expenditures for education programs.

Funds would be provided for loans to avoid foreclosure of homes and farms, and to assure health care for unemployed workers and their families.

Housing expanded

Federally assisted housing programs would be expanded by 152,000 units and the emergency program of federal supplemental unemployment insurance would be further extended.

Funds for child nutrition and food stamps would be increased, instead of being further cut as the Administration had proposed.

The budget allows for a 4 percent pay raise for both federal civilian employees and the military—instead of the pay freeze proposed by the President. The cost-of-living adjustments in federal and railroad retirement benefits would be delayed six months—the same as social security—instead of being frozen for a full year as the Administration sought.

There would be more money to provide training for workers hit by plant closings and heavy layoffs and to help pay the heating bills of low-income households. The

Emergency funds cleared for 'first-phase' jobs bill

Congress gave bipartisan approval to a $4.65-billion emergency appropriation that will make a dent in unemployment and provide humanitarian assistance to recession victims.

The total emerged above the $4.3 billion limit President Reagan had set in his mid-February negotiations with congressional Democrats. But it's much less than the AFL-CIO has proposed to get America back to work.

A second-phase jobs bill is being shaped for later action by Congress, and there are strong disagreements over its ingredients.

The first-phase bill will help about one million persons, congressional sources estimate, and will fund the equivalent of 400,000 year-long jobs. Its passage was the first action completed by the new 98th Congress to deal with the unemployment crisis.

A preamble to the bill cleared for President Reagan's signature refers to the plight of "nearly 14 million unemployed Americans, including those no longer searching for work" and millions of others who "work only part time due to the lack of full-time gainful employment."

Depression levels

The actual numbers of unemployed rival those of the Great Depression, the legislation notes, and their hardships are greater than in any of the nation's recessions since then.

To translate money into jobs and assistance in the shortest possible time, Congress broke through the budget ceilings it had laid down last year and voted added funds for programs that had been cut back or, in some cases, were to have been phased out.

Change in social security law shaped by need for revenue

Congress neared final passage of a package of social security changes—some of them controversial—that will avert an immediate funding crisis and keep the system solvent for the foreseeable future.

Most of the changes were consensus recommendations of the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform. They were designed to quickly replenish cash reserves that have been drained by a combination of high unemployment that reduced payroll tax revenues and high inflation that pushed up benefit payments in line with living costs.

Included in the legislation, although unrelated to social security, is a six-month extension of the federally-funded supplemental unemployment compensation program—the safety net for persons who have used up the maximum benefits provided under state law.

If Congress had not acted, federal payments to the long-term unemployed would have been cut off on Mar. 31.

While backing the bulk of the social security changes, labor objected to two of its provisions, only one of which was a bipartisan recommendation of the reform commisson. That was the mandatory coverage of new federal workers, starting next January.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a member of the commission, dissented from this recommendation and urged deferment of action until there was in place a pro-

Stronger bonds urged between science, labor

Harriman, N.Y. — The space shuttle goes where it's supposed to go and does what it's supposed to do thanks to the combined achievements of "mathematicians and plumbers—and a host of other highly skilled technicians and craftsmen," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pointed out at a conference on the relationship of science and labor.

The space program is just one example, Kirkland said, of the links between labor and science that already exist. He said those bonds must be strengthened to cope with a world "that is continuously remaking itself, for better or worse."

There is a basis for cooperation between science and labor, Kirkland observed, because "rational approaches to social problems can't be developed in isolated laboratories. Scientists need to be connected to the world of work" so that they can "fully grasp the impact of their own labors on their fellow citizens."

Mutual concerns

Kirkland was a principal speaker at the conference at Arden House here, which brought together leaders of the scientific community and representatives of organized labor to explore mutual concerns. The meeting was sponsored by Columbia University.

Kirkland pointed to the close relationship between the goals of labor and science to improve the quality of life in this country and "to advance the whole human enterprise." He said trade unions have worked toward those ends for more than a century through organizing, collective bargaining, and legislative and political action.

Continuing goals

Labor has fought for public health and public education, for greater leisure and greater learning "for the great mass of the American people," he told the conference.

But Kirkland warned that many of these achievements are under heavy fire from the Reagan Administration's "massive, concerted effort to enhance private wealth at public expense and to put public resources to the service of those whose highest goals is to maximize profit."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the conference that science and technology can create new jobs, safer and easier work, better working conditions, higher productivity and earnings, more leisure and "more opportunity for cultivation and enrichment of the human potential."

But organized labor also sees that technological progress can lead to dangerous and potentially destructive effects on workers, including loss of jobs, dehumanization of work, downgrading of skills, threats to safety and health, loss of earnings and social and cultural alienation.

"There is no logical or inevitable tradeoff to be made between the welfare of workers on one hand and progress in science and technology on the other hand," Donahue observed. "But if such a choice is forced on American workers, it should come as no surprise that workers and their unions will give priority to the welfare of workers."

Kirkland deplored the "pseudo-scientific" theory that high unemployment is "the natural and inevitable product of the continuing scientific revolution" because the United States is becoming a "high-tech economy" that no longer needs industrial workers.

Welcome technology

American labor accepts the advance of technology and even welcomes it, Kirkland said, but he warned that labor strongly objects to the idea that workers are "disposable human beings," or that "our political and social institutions should be the passive objects of technological change rather than the conscious masters of the process."

Organized labor has repeatedly called for joint labor-business-government cooperation to revitalize the nation's industrial base, minimize the impact of technological change on workers and channel capital into productive resources, he noted.

He termed the National Accord between the AFL-CIO and the Carter Administration an important step in that direction, but noted that the Reagan Administration has shown no interest in reviving it, preferring "to give business a free hand and to trust in the magic of the market."

Barren mergers

That free hand has meant that resources that should go into research and development "are being squandered in barren mergers and other manifestations of corporate cannibalism," Kirkland charged.

He said executives are risking the assets of large corporations in short-term manipulations that will produce "specious and temporary gains to justify huge bonuses, insuring themselves with 'golden parachutes.'"

Such short-term thinking, Kirkland told the conference, threatens long-term decline in other areas, too. He called the cuts in government education, scientific, cultural and social programs a waste of both public funds and human resources.

Kirkland concluded that both the labor movement and the scientific community bear a special responsibility "to help devise the rational approaches necessary to keep our society democratic, alive and growing."

Louisiana firm fined for defying bargaining order

After years of flouting federal labor law, a Louisiana company that had persistently refused to negotiate a contract with the Carpenters has been assessed a $25,000 penalty for contempt of a National Labor Relations Board ruling.

A federal appellate court also ordered the J. R. McDermott Co. of Harvey, La., to pay a $5,000 fine for every future violation of the judgment and contempt order and $500 for each day it fails to bargain in good faith with the union.

"We hope now, after these years of wasteful delay, McDermott will do what it should have done a long time ago—negotiate a fair and mutually satisfactory agreement," Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell said.

The dispute began in 1974 when a group of deep sea divers—at the time affiliated with another union—filed for a representation election with the NLRB. McDermott's divers division then had 126 employees working on offshore drilling and pipeline construction in the Gulf of Mexico.

Election won twice

The union won the election, 40 to 33. The company appealed, and a second NLRB election was held in February 1975, which the union also won. About six months later, the deep sea divers' local affiliated with the Carpenters, which has a substantial number of divers in its membership.

McDermott would not agree to a first contract, and in January 1977 the NLRB found the company had refused to bargain in good faith. In 1978, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans upheld the NLRB and ordered the firm to bargain. By now, the company had acquired Babcock & Wilcox Co., and become a billion-dollar corporation.

In 1979, the company made motions to negotiate, but no progress was ever made toward reaching an agreement. After two years, the appeals court appointed a special master to investigate the NLRB's appeal that the company should be held in contempt for refusing to bargain in good faith.

In his report to the court, Special Master Morton Needelman found that "McDermott did not come to the bargaining table with an open mind susceptible to agreement, but rather it had a fixed determination to resist the union's legal right to participate in setting the terms and conditions of employment."

Conference shifted

The AFL-CIO Regional Conference for the southeastern states has been rescheduled for Apr. 4-6 at Myrtle Beach, S.C.

The conference will draw participants from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee.

The three-day meeting, originally scheduled for Memphis, was canceled because of a union's dispute with hotel management.

UAW members okay Volkswagen, Champion pacts

Detroit—The Auto Workers at Volkswagen of America and Champion Spark Plug Co. plants ratified new three-year contracts covering some 8,000 workers. The Champion settlement ended a six-week strike.

The Volkswagen agreement covers 2,500 active and 2,400 laid-off workers at the Westmoreland assembly plant in New Stanton, Pa., and 650 UAW members at the South Charleston, W.Va., stamping plant.

The contract maintains wage rates and benefits set in the old agreement and switches to annual cost-of-living adjustments for the first two years, before reverting to quarterly COL adjustments in December 1985.

The new pact, the second for UAW members at Volkswagen, strengthened the supplemental unemployment benefit fund, added job security gains and health and safety protections.

The Champion agreement provides continued quarterly COLA, but each of the next 10 adjustments will be reduced by 1 percent of actual COLA rate. Effective in the third year, $2.30 in previous COLA payments will be folded into hourly base pay rates, and workers will get a 3 percent increase, UAW Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus said.

Company demands to eliminate paid holidays was a major strike issue. The UAW added one floating holiday and increased the annual paid Christmas shutdown to six days in 1983, 7 in 1984 and 8 in 1985.

The contract, approved by a 59 percent vote, covers UAW members at plants in Toledo and Cambridge, Ohio; Burlington, Iowa, and Windsor, Ont. Detroit Local 272 rejected the agreements and remains on strike over local issues.

Congress urged to preserve assistance for import victims

The AFL-CIO pressed at Senate hearings for a continuation of trade adjustment assistance the Reagan Administration wants to eliminate.

Cutbacks made by Congress over the past two years at the Administration's prodding have eliminated virtually all cash benefits to workers displaced by imports, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan noted.

If Congress goes along with the total wipe-out of the program, he protested, it would break promises made to workers in trade legislation dating back to 1962.

The Administration's budget for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1983, provides no funds for retraining, job search and relocation of workers displaced by imports.

Koplan welcomed the introduction of a bill by Senators John Heinz (R-Pa.) and Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) that would continue the program with some strengthening amendments.

As with a similar House bill, it would make training assistance for displaced workers an entitlement and would provide a modest $15-a-day subsistence allowance for workers enrolled in training programs who were not receiving any other unemployment compensation.

Prior to the Reagan Administration, displaced workers had been entitled to special unemployment benefits of 70 percent of lost pay up to a ceiling equal to the national average manufacturing wage. It had been payable for up to 52 weeks, with an additional 26 weeks allowed if necessary to complete retraining programs.

The labor-endorsed bill would also raise the job search and relocation allowance from $600 to $800 and drop a requirement that a displaced worker take any "suitable" job, even at the minimum wage, after 26 weeks of unemployment.

Koplan urged also that the program be extended to cover workers employed by suppliers or contractors who serve firms wiped out by imports.

Labor doesn't consider trade adjustment assistance "a substitute for a fair trade policy," Koplan said. But it does insist that "promises made to workers . . . should be honored."

labor studies

The George Meany Center will offer six labor studies courses in April at its Silver Spring, Md., campus. The schedule:

Plant Closings, Apr. 5-7—A short course on the union's role in plant shutdowns, including bargaining rights and assistance, as well as federal programs to aid affected workers, employers and communities.

How to Handle the Media, Apr. 10-15—An institute to help union leaders make more effective use of television, TV cable, radio and the press. The Labor Institute of Public Affairs will assist in the program.

Advanced Organizing, Apr. 10-22—A two-week institute cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, limited to experienced organizers and organizing directors.

Pension Clinic, Apr. 12-13—A two-day session for union research staff members on negotiating pensions, costing pensions and analyzing pension reports.

Effective Union Actions for Civil Rights, Apr. 17-21—The AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights annual conference for designees of AFL-CIO affiliates.

Mini Computers for Union Locals, Apr. 5-8 at the University of California, Berkeley, and Apr. 24-29 at the Silver Spring campus. Sessions will cover hardware, software, computer language and service and purchase contracts.

Unions using the campus for leadership training programs are the Postal Workers, Apr. 5-8; Communications Workers, Apr. 10-13, and Service Employees, Apr. 24-29.

An American Institute for Free Labor Development class for 38 trade unionists from 13 Latin American countries will complete studies Apr. 15.

Eastern pact averts strike by Machinists

The Machinists reached tentative agreement with Eastern Airlines on a new three-year contract covering 13,500 mechanics, baggage handlers, and ground workers.

The settlement came shortly before a Mar. 24 strike deadline, after several days of intense negotiations at National Mediation Board headquarters in Washington. Details of the contract proposal, which must be approved by IAM members employed by Eastern, were withheld until union leaders had discussed the agreement with the membership.

IAM negotiator Charles Bryan, discussing the tentative agreement with reporters, said the union was "completely satisfied with the agreement. I feel it will be ratified." A ratification vote is expected to be completed in about a week.

Proposal rejected

The union had been set to strike earlier this month at the conclusion of a 30-day cooling-off period that began when federal mediators determined that negotiations had reached an impasse. The strike was called off by the union to consider Eastern's "absolute last offer." Union officers urged rejection of the proposal because it lacked full retroactivity. Members voted it down by a 3 to 1 margin.

Returning to the bargaining table, the parties sought to resolve the issues of pay and the timing of the money provisions. "Probably the most burning issue with the membership is the issue of retroactive pay," Bryan said at the time. Members expressed displeasure over the application of pay increases in the rejected Mar. 12 offer, which did not date back to Jan. 1, 1982, when the old contract expired.

The union also had complained that the rejected offer was "back-loaded," meaning that most of the gains came late in the contract. The latest offer, Bryan said, is "a major improvement over the proposal that was turned down."

Terms of the earlier proposal provided wage increases of 32.2 percent, with raises of 6 percent on Apr. 1, Nov. 1, and Apr. 1, 1984, to be followed by an 11-percent increase on Nov. 1, 1984.

Eastern had contended that financial problems made it impossible for management to come up with money to pay the retroactivity. But Bryan argued that Eastern was exaggerating its financial difficulties as part of its bargaining strategy.

They want jobs

Loud and clear message was brought to Congress and President Reagan as nearly 3,000 jobless workers from 20 high-unemployment communities in the Northeast and Midwest marched on the Capitol. The rally for jobs programs and recession relief was coordinated by the National Unemployment Network and endorsed by the Full Employment Action Council and the National Council of Churches. Grassroots lobbying followed the rally.

Poland using secret labor camps in effort to crush union movement which Poland has signed. The Soviet Union, which pulls the strings controlling the Polish regime, has a long, heavily documented history of using forced labor. The U.S. State Dept., in a report to Congress last month, said the Soviet forced labor system embraces 4 million involuntary workers, including many political and religious prisoners.

According to the most recent information received by the Committee in Support of Solidarity—an affidavit submitted earlier this month to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights by Miroslaw Dominczyk, a former Solidarity leader—there are 22 "penal army camps" in Poland with an estimated 8,000 people in them.

Dominczyk, the former chairman of Solidarity's Swietokrzyski region, said he has information from a soldier on Christmas pass and from members of families of inductees that nearly 80 percent of those conscripted are Solidarity members. Earlier, they were imprisoned without charges, and most of the other internees actively supported the Solidarity free trade union movement.

Dominczyk was himself interned from Dec. 13, 1981, until last Oct. 18. He served as chairman of the Committee to Defend Prisoners of Conscience for the Swietokrzyski region. He arrived in the United States Feb. 23. In his affidavit of Mar. 3, he charged that the Polish government began the conscription last November under the Penal Army Code.

"They were conscripted regardless of their age and health," Dominczyk said. "Even the handicapped and elderly have been conscripted. Conscriptions of which I have direct knowledge are for indeterminate periods of time. I have seen a number of documents on which the period designated for military service was 'indefinite.' "

The penal camps are governed by military law, he said, and inductees violating rules and regulations of the camps may be subject to court martial and severe punishment, including long prison sentences.

Chenoweth said the Committee in Support of Solidarity has received information from an eyewitness that some 600 workers from the giant Nowa Huta steel works outside Krakow were conscripted and sent to penal camps on the morning of Nov. 10, the day on which the Solidarity underground had called for a general strike in Poland.

Smuggled letters from the camps, printed in Tygodnik Mazowsze, Solidarity's underground weekly publication in Warsaw, tell of prisoner abuse.

Grueling routine

"From 8 a.m. until 2:30 p.m., there is hard labor in water and mud," an excerpt from one letter reads. "At around 3 p.m., we have dinner. Activities start again at 4 p.m. and last until dusk. . . . It is a ritual to threaten us with long prison sentences during the roll call. The officer and NCO cadre, gathered from all over Poland, has been told that we are bandits who may stab them at anytime. . . .

"On Nov. 8, we were forced to run three miles with full equipment. . . . We staged a hunger strike (to protest) the quality of food. Some were taken ill.

"This is not a call-up of reserves. In reality, we are interned because they were afraid of what we would do on Nov. 10. Although many of us were never union activists we were interned because we were not afraid to say what we thought. No one has told us when we will get out."

Another account of life in the camps, printed in the December issue of Solidarity's underground publication Hutnik in Krakow, comes from an inductee at Czerwony Bor, about 90 miles from Warsaw:

"There are people (here) on crutches and no fingers on their hands. They live in special houses made from freight cars lined with thin chip-board, about 40 people per house, heated by two kubusie (small coal fires). The food is rubbish. . . . Physical terror—field exercises from almost dawn till dusk, then psychological terror—constant interrogation, arrogance, insults."

Poznan roundup

In the underground Solidarity publication, Wielkoposki Observator, printed in the Poznan region, an account of the conscription of about 160 Solidarity activists from the region notes that the roundup occurred on Nov. 5-6.

"The date wasn't accidental—it was timed to prevent participation in the (Nov. 10) protests. . . .

"Regular draftees and local people were informed that the new companies were composed of criminals. But they are in reality coal miners, steelworkers, railway workers, technicians, scientists, teachers, actors, and workers. They were repressed by the secret police even before the state of war as well as during it."

High consumer rates bail out banks

The nation's big banks may be keeping consumer interest rates artificially high to cover anticipated losses on their foreign and domestic loan portfolios, the AFL-CIO charged at Senate hearings.

Director Henry B. Schechter of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy told a Senate Banking subcommittee there are indications that banks, which have been involved in adverse loan experiences both domestically and abroad, have had relatively low declining returns on their total assets.

"Under such circumstances, there is a natural inclination not to reduce high consumer interest rates," he told the subcommittee on consumer affairs.

Schechter cited a survey of banks showing the percent of "problem" loans relative to total loans outstanding in 1982, which put Illinois Continental and Bank of America at the top.

Loan ratio

Illinois Continental's problems resulted in part from a large involvement in loans to the Penn Square bank in Oklahoma that failed last year. Bank of America, with the next highest problem loan ratio, had been very active in foreign loans to some of the large debtor nations that had to defer payment of principal.

On the other hand, Northwest Bank had the lowest problem loan ratio and, as of mid-February, had significantly lower interest rates for unsecured personal loans and for new car loans than other banks surveyed.

Schechter charged that unnecessarily high consumer interest rates by banks—particularly on automobile and home loans—are endangering economic recovery. Total retail sales declined three months in a row through February and durable consumer goods sales, which depend heavily on use of consumer credit, declined more than twice as rapidly as total consumer sales last month, he pointed out.

Rollback needed

He cited an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement adopted last month calling for a rollback in consumer interest rates to stimulate the recovery. The statement called for the re-establishment of selective credit controls "to get the economy out of the strait jacket of across-the-board, tight monetary policies" imposed by the Federal Reserve Board.

The statement noted that consumer loan and home mortgage interest rates have declined far less than the prime rate banks charge their best corporate customers. With inflation at about a 4-percent annual rate, consumers are paying 12 to 22 percent for most loans, home mortgages are 12 to 14 percent, while prime rates are 10.5 percent.

"Real interest rates being charged on consumer loans are two to three times higher than they should be by historic standards," Schechter said.

Bank financing of automobile loans in many instances is 15, 16, or 17 percent. At the same time, the finance company subsidiaries of the major auto companies have been offering financing at 11.9 percent, and making money, Schechter observed.

The banks insist that they have to charge higher rates because they have to pay depositors more as a result of the "money market accounts" introduced in 1982.

"This raises a more fundamental question which certainly bears consideration by Congress," Schechter said. "If consumers are forced to pay more because banks may compete for household depositor funds with unlimited high interest rate payments, is it a wise national policy to permit such unlimited competition?"

In the area of credit card borrowing, banks have not lowered interest rates from the peaks reached during the last couple of years when states raised the limits on such charges, Schechter observed.

Loan losses

"The lenders claimed that they had to make up for prior year losses in the credit card business, that bookkeeping expenses involved were very high, and that there was a great deal of fraud that had to be covered through earnings," Schechter said.

He urged the Banking Committee to obtain detailed information on banks' domestic and foreign loans for a definitive answer on the extent to which other loan losses result in higher interest rates.

Jobs for the unemployed

Job security, wage increases mark CWA California pact

Los Angeles — The Communications Workers reached agreement with General Telephone of California on a three-year contract providing a 25-percent wage increase and job security for workers affected by technological change.

Job safeguards are among the union's top bargaining goals for all its negotiations in 1983, CWA said.

The new contract, covering some 21,000 workers in 13 CWA local unions, also calls for substantial improvements in major medical coverage, including an increase in the lifetime benefit from $100,000 to $500,000. Pensions were also improved.

The agreement has been submitted for ratification to the members, who will complete mail ballot voting by Apr. 2. The terms were approved by officers of the locals.

Workers covered include operators as well as construction, office clerical, traffic and maintenance employees.

Retroactivity

In wages, the union reported that employees at the top of their pay schedule will get a 7 percent raise retroactive to Mar. 4, followed by 2.25 percent on Oct. 10; 4 percent in March 1984; 4 percent in October 1984; 4 percent in March 1985 and 3 percent in October 1985. The pact expires in March 1986.

Two plans were negotiated to protect workers from layoffs or firings because of technological changes. Workers with at least 20 years service will be entitled to retire on full pension plus an additional $200 to $400 a month, depending on length of service, for up to four years. They will also be entitled to an additional $3,000, paid toward continued insurance premiums for up to four years, as reimbursement for a retraining course in another field, or as reimbursement for moving expenses.

Relocation

The second plan will apply to all employees with at least one year's service who are asked to relocate to a new job at least 50 miles away but don't want to move.

They will be entitled to one week's pay for each of the first 10 years of service and two weeks per service year over that, to a maximum of 36 weeks pay. The company will also pay half their insurance premiums for the first six months after they leave the company and up to $2,500 for completion of retraining courses.

Participation in both plans will be voluntary and must be offered to employees in order of seniority in their job titles.

CWA will also be negotiating with other major telephone employers this year, including contracts for 500,000 Bell System workers whose agreements expire Aug. 6. Those talks are scheduled to open May 19.

ACTWU study finds

Cotton dust standard spurs company gains

A new study by the Clothing & Textile Workers shows that many companies have already been able to meet the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's cotton dust exposure controls that will take effect in 1984 without suffering financially.

The ACTWU study found that major textile companies complying with the cotton dust standard have done better than the industry generally in terms of profit rates and return on investment, and their international competitive position has improved.

The study, titled "The Economic Impact of the OSHA Cotton Dust Standard," found that 81 percent of the workers in a sample group of companies work in areas meeting the dust exposure limits.

And the severe economic hardship industry said would occur by installing engineering hasn't happened to those companies who voluntarily upgraded their facilities in anticipation of the standard's March 1984 effective date.

The cotton dust standard protects textile workers from the disabling lung disease byssinosis, or "brown lung."

A life saver

ACTWU President Murray Finley noted the standard has saved the lives and prevented the suffering of thousands of workers, while encouraging the industry to modernize.

The standard, first proposed in 1976, promulgated in 1978 and upheld by the Supreme Court in 1981, "is a real regulatory success story," ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman said. "It's time the Reagan Administration quit wasting the taxpayers' money and put aside its plan to weaken the OSHA cotton dust standard. Not only is the industry successfully protecting workers' health, they are showing financial benefits from their efforts as well."

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute (ATMI) has claimed since 1976 that the engineering controls required by the standard are economically infeasible.

Revising standard

After the Supreme Court upheld the standard, the Reagan Administration's new OSHA team responded to industry complaints by moving to weaken the regulation. In 1983, the Office of Management & Budget reviewed the standard's cost effectiveness and said OSHA had not provided industry enough economic relief. The OMB said the requirement for engineering controls should be lifted and exposure limits met through the use of dust masks, work practices and medical surveillance.

ACTWU's study is based on data from the ATMI, congressional testimony and industry economic reports. It covers seven major companies and shows at least half the workers in 11 of the 12 production operations worked in conditions meeting the exposure limits. The companies are Burlington Industries, Cannon Mills, Cone Mills, Dan River, Fieldcrest Mills, J. P. Stevens and West Point-Pepperell.

The average capital expenditure per employee more than doubled between 1978 and 1980 for the sample firms, to well above the industry average. Yet their return on investment increased from 8.5 percent to 9.9 percent, while the industry's return dropped from 11.1 percent to 8.6 percent. Similar gains were made in profit margins for the sample companies.

Kirkland renews call for action on racketeering bill

The AFL-CIO continues to support legislation that would toughen federal penalties against convicted union officials, Federation President Lane Kirkland wrote the chairman of a Senate subcommittee.

In the last Congress, the Senate twice passed a labor-endorsed, bipartisan bill to toughen penalties against employer payoffs to union officials. It would also have speeded the disbarment from union or pension fund office of officials who abuse their trust for personal gain. The House did not complete action on the measure, so it died with the adjournment of the 97th Congress.

Kirkland wrote Subcommittee Chairman Donald N. Nickles (R-Okla.) that the AFL-CIO favors prompt action on the bill in this Congress and stands by its previous testimony.

Kirkland made clear in the testimony submitted for the current round of hearings that the labor movement "can only be strengthened" by getting rid of crooks, and that the AFL-CIO considers racketeers who prey on unions "our natural enemies."

OSHA's ties to industry raise policy concerns

Allegations of cozy connections between the federal job safety agency and industries it should be policing raised concerns at House hearings over the Reagan Administration's retreat on worker health protections.

Thorne G. Auchter, head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, came under intense fire from Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) for OSHA's denial of union petitions to lower exposure limits on three hazardous chemicals.

Obey, chairman of the House Appropriations Labor subcommittee, suggested during a heated three-hour exchange that the safety agency has developed a tendency of "protecting chemical companies" rather than public health.

He said that workers concerned with their health have had to "fight incredibly hard" to get OSHA to respond in ways that protect their welfare, especially on exposure to hazardous chemicals.

OSHA policy

OSHA's policy under President Reagan, Obey said, has been "not to give a benefit of doubt in the slightest to persons asking for relief."

The agency's failure to act on carcinogens is part of a "consistent pattern of behavior" running through the Administration that puts industry interests above others as demonstrated by recent hearings on the Environmental Protection Agency, Obey charged. He said he would urge every congressional committee with oversight jurisdiction to review OSHA's performance.

Auchter said, "I'm not an attorney or scientist, I'm a manager." He said he relies upon advice from OSHA's legal and scientific staff about chemicals, but he denied he is influenced by industry or the White House Office of Management & Budget concerning health regulations.

Neglected legal advice

Obey produced memos from OSHA lawyers that said ethylene oxide (EtO) and ethylene dibromide (EDB) pose grave danger to exposed workers and a case could be made for a lower exposure level. Studies have shown both chemicals to be cancer-causing and to cause reproductive damage at exposure levels lower than OSHA's current limits.

The day before the hearing, a federal court of appeals ordered OSHA to propose a new standard for EtO by mid-April, with a final standard to be issued within a year.

Auchter said he reached a decision to deny a petition from 14 unions for an emergency formaldehyde standard after a "series of meetings" with OSHA staff but said he didn't request advice from OSHA's legal staff. He said he assumed the legal advice would be the same for formaldehyde as for EtO and EDB. He said agency scientists are currently evaluating new data on the cancer risks of formaldehyde at levels below the current limit.

The Auto Workers, which sued OSHA over a new formaldehyde standard, obtained over 400 internal OSHA documents under the Freedom of Information Act. Some of these show formaldehyde poses a significant cancer risk at exposure levels lower than the current 3 ppm limit.

Noting the apparent lack of documentation in the formaldehyde decision, Obey pointed out that a record of two breakfast meetings with the Formaldehyde Institute had surfaced during the EPA investigations. The meetings were recorded in the appointments calendar of EPA Assistant Administrator John A. Todhunter.

Part of the job

Auchter denied attending the breakfast meetings and added: "I wouldn't know if someone from the Formaldehyde Institute were sitting in this room." He said it is part of OSHA's job to meet with industry representatives as well as labor representatives.

Obey also accused OSHA officials of withholding a 1981 internal study on asbestos "until it served their purpose." The report shows an increased cancer risk at OSHA's current exposure standard.

Auchter said the report was not released because it was "incomplete" but admitted OSHA had made no effort to step up enforcement on asbestos since the report.

Rewards for industry

Obey also questioned OSHA's use of the number of industry-challenged citations as one criterion to judge the performance of the agency's compliance staff. Obey said Auchter had "institutionalized a process" for assessing OSHA staff which rewards industry for contesting citations and punishes compliance staff for issuing citations.

"That's the biggest load of hogwash, congressman," Auchter replied. He said Obey didn't understand "productivity" and, referring to his charts, said compliance staff can make more inspections if they do not have to spend time in court dealing with contested citations.

Obey charged that Auchter's actions could be perceived as a "capitulation to industry" for which EPA officials recently were fired. "If you don't think you have enough staff, then ask for a bigger budget," Obey said.

OSHA has requested funds for 1,200 compliance officers for fiscal 1984, the same as the last two years. Only 1,100 compliance positions are filled, according to OSHA. Auchter earlier told the subcommittee OSHA funding levels are "totally adequate."

Transit Union maps appeal of wage ruling

The Amalgamated Transit Union said it will appeal to the Supreme Court a federal district court ruling which would exempt public transit systems from federal wage and hour provisions. The decision conflicts with three appellate court decisions upholding the ATU position.

U.S. District Court Judge Fred Shannon has twice ruled the San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority (SAMTA) is exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act provisions which require it to pay an estimated $1.5 million in unpaid overtime to about 700 ATU Local 694 members.

However, the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a district court decision that the Chattanooga Area Regional Transit Authority is exempt from the FLSA and remanded the case to the lower court for trial on its merits. Affected by the decision are 125 ATU Local 1212 members in Chattanooga, Tenn.

In Atlanta, the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the district court position that 25 members of ATU Local 898 are entitled to overtime payments from the municipal transit system in Macon, Ga. The case was sent back to the lower court for determination of backpay awards.

Payment ordered

In January, the Supreme Court upheld the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals decision ordering Pennsylvania's New Castle Transit Authority to pay overtime to ATU Local 89 members.

In that case, the appellate court ruled that since local and state governmental transit systems rely greatly on federal grants and funds, they cannot use the states' rights provision of the Constitution to deny workers overtime pay.

The federal court in the New Castle case ruled the 10th Amendment and a 1976 Supreme Court decision held the FLSA did not extend to states when they were "engaged in traditional government functions."

The appellate court, however, held "states are not free to assume functions historically performed by the private sector and thereby insulate those activities from federal regulations of interstate commerce."

1976 filing

The ATU had filed overtime claims in 1976 against SAMTA, and in 1979, the Labor Dept. ordered the transit authority to pay the claims. SAMTA sued to block the order and Judge Shannon then ruled in its favor.

The case was appealed to the Supreme Court, which remanded it to the lower court, because a decision on a Long Island Rail Road overtime pay dispute might have some impact on the San Antonio case. The Supreme Court had ruled LIRR was still subject to the Railway Labor Act after it passed from private to public operation.

Judge Shannon reviewed the case and again ruled in SAMTA's favor.

Shannon held that the LIRR decision had no impact on the San Antonio dispute.

Cure for unemployment

Unemployment is destroying the health and well-being of many workers and their families, Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts tells more than 1,000 delegates to the union's legislative and political action conference in Washington. He urged stronger efforts by Congress to enact effective measures to assist the jobless, stimulate employment and revitalize declining industries and communities.

Labor-endorsed bills adopted in West Virginia

Charleston, W.Va. — West Virginia's legislature enacted voter registration by mail and banned the use of polygraph examinations as employment tests in its just-concluded 1983 session.

State AFL-CIO President Joseph W. Powell tied the achievements of an "outstanding" session to last November's elections, when a record 87.2 percent of COPE-endorsed candidates for the legislature were winners.

The polygraph ban exempts only law enforcement agencies and dispensers or manufacturers of drugs, and requires that persons giving polygraph tests be licensed by the state Labor Dept.

The legislature approved stronger state regulation of natural gas pipelines, including a requirement that companies purchase the lowest priced gas. It also provided for a 20-percent reduction in natural gas prices for low-income families from November through March.

In other labor-backed legislative action:

- A requirement was adopted for 40-percent consumer representation, including labor, on boards of directors of nonprofit and municipal or county hospitals.
- A hospital cost review agency was established as part of the state Health Dept. despite opposition from hospital administrators. It includes a "pass-through" provision for non-supervisory wages.
- West Virginia became the 12th state to ratify the proposed constitutional amendment to provide voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia.
- Progressive tax legislation was enacted, raising revenue but not at the expense of lower-income residents.
- Improvements in workers' compensation were adopted.

Adverse economic reports point to lackluster recovery

Signs that the recovery from the Reagan Recession is weaker than the Administration predicted emerged in a series of government reports showing both businessmen and consumers wary of the future.

A report from the Commerce Dept. said American businesses plan to spend $310.9 billion for new plant and equipment in 1983, or 1.7 percent less than in 1982. Meanwhile, new orders for manufactured durable goods, important to the pace of economic recovery, fell 4 percent in February.

Adding credence to speculation that recovery may remain uneven, a Commerce Dept. report on personal income showed a rise of only one-tenth of 1 percent last month. Consumers increased their spending even less.

Private analysts, who say consumer spending will have to fuel the economy's rebound, viewed the figures as lackluster and disappointing.

Plant use drops

In a separate report, the Commerce Dept. said that manufacturers' use of plant capacity dropped 1 percentage point between September and December 1982 to a record low of 68 percent. A department survey of industry showed that the decline in plant use was widespread in both the durable and nondurable sectors.

Durables, which include metals, machinery, vehicles, lumber, furniture, fabricated metals, instruments, and miscellaneous other products, declined 2 percentage points to 63 percent. Nondurables, including textiles, paper, chemicals, petroleum, rubber, food, tobacco, apparel, printing-publishing, and leather, fell one point to 73 percent.

The December rate was the lowest recorded since the department began the statistical series in 1965. In June 1981, the plant use rate for durables was 77 percent and 90 percent for nondurables.

In another adverse economic report, the Labor Dept. said that new claims for unemployment benefits rose to 501,000 during the first week in March, erasing a decline in new claims from the previous week. The over-the-week jump of 41,000 in new claimants for regular state benefits nearly matched the 42,000 decline experienced a week earlier when claims for jobless benefits were slowed because of the Presidents Day holiday.

Other government reports showed the United States registered a huge $8.09 billion deficit last year in its balance of payments on the current account, and the nation's economy declined at an annual rate of 1.1 percent in the fourth quarter of 1982.

The 1.1-percent drop in "real," or inflation-adjusted, gross national product was actually an improvement from the originally reported decline of 1.9 percent. Real GNP—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services—increased by seven-tenths of 1 percent in the third quarter of 1982.

While the Commerce Dept.'s preliminary estimate of economic growth in the current January-to-March quarter is for a gain of 4 percent, some economists caution that the upturn is narrowly based and largely the result of a slowdown in inventory liquidation.

Real GNP for the fourth quarter of 1982 was revised upward to reflect higher net exports, fixed investment, and government purchases than were estimated previously, the department said. The revision resulted in a slight upward revision for 1982 as a whole. The economy declined 1.7 percent over the year, rather than 1.8 percent as estimated earlier.

CONVENTIONS

The Association of Flight Attendants will hold its 1983 convention Nov. 15-17 in Denver.

The Laundry & Dry Cleaning Union's 1983 convention will be held May 30-June 1 in Pittsburgh. In an earlier edition of the AFL-CIO News, the convention date was incorrectly listed as May 23-27.

Congress votes emergency funds for job programs

Many of the jobs will come from construction and repairs to federal buildings. But there will also be community development grants that will allow up to $500 million to be spent for "public service activities," including direct public employment.

An Amtrak grant is earmarked for "labor-intensive" projects. Funds are provided for summer youth jobs and for hiring older workers for part-time jobs, for maternal and child care services and for mass transit projects, for training displaced workers and for Job Corps programs.

The bill also includes $125 million for unemployment benefits to laid-off rail workers who are not covered by regular state unemployment insurance. Attached to the measure, in addition to the $4.6 billion, is $5 billion appropriated for advances to states to enable them to keep up unemployment insurance payments.

The Senate had originally added to the House-passed bill a $1.2 billion item for accelerated payment of revenue-sharing grants to communities. But a House-Senate conference committee dropped that section of the bill when White House aides warned it could lead to a presidential veto.

Labor's commendation

George Elsey, retired president of the American Red Cross, right, receives a plaque from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Community Services Director Walter Davis in recognition of his dozen years of ARC leadership and his role in maintaining close relations with labor. Under his tenure, the number of labor representatives working with the Red Cross grew from five to 22.

Real wages drop 1.5 percent despite decline in price index

Worker buying power plummeted in February while consumer prices declined and wholesale prices inched up.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported real average earnings of blue-collar workers fell 1.5 percent from the January level after seasonal adjustment. That was the worst deterioration in real earnings for any month since April 1979.

Over the year, from February 1982 to February 1983, the decline in real earnings was three-tenths of 1 percent, BLS said. Real earnings are wages expressed in constant 1977 dollars.

BLS attributed the earnings decline to a 2-percent drop in the average number of hours worked.

While gross weekly earnings expressed in current dollars averaged $271.07 last month, compared to $275.89 in January, inflation-adjusted wages averaged $168.47, compared to $171.04 in January.

Last month's two-tenths of 1 percent decline in the government's consumer price index was only the second monthly overall decline in more than 17 years, BLS said. Falling gasoline prices at the pump accounted for most of the decline.

Gasoline prices dropped 6.7 percent over the month, a part of the 10.8-percent decline within four months. If the drop in gasoline and other fuel prices had not been included, the overall CPI would have risen three-tenths of 1 percent, BLS said.

The over-the-month decline was the same in both major consumer price indexes compiled by the government. In CPI-U—which covers about 80 percent of the population, including professional, managerial and technical workers, the self-employed, wage earners and clerical workers—rents are now substituted for home ownership costs. The narrower CPI-W, which includes only urban wage earners and clerical workers and represents about half the population, still uses home ownership costs.

Homeownership in the CPI-W, which includes house prices, mortgage interest rates, property taxes, property insurance, and maintenance and repair costs, rose three-tenths of 1 percent in February.

Clothing costs rose five-tenths of 1 percent. Medical care costs in February surged eight-tenths of 1 percent.

On the producer, or wholesale, price front, finished goods rose only one-tenth of 1 percent in February as falling oil prices offset higher food and new car costs.

vision acceptable to federal and postal workers for supplementary benefits through the civil service retirement system.

Labor's position prevailed in the Senate, which adopted an amendment postponing the change until Congress enacted a supplemental benefit plan. But the amendment, introduced by Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), was dropped by a House-Senate conference committee.

Also included in the bill over labor's objections was a Republican-backed provision that will push back the normal retirement age under social security from 65 to 67 in a two-stage phase-in, starting after the turn of the century.

The AFL-CIO had opposed it as a breach of faith with most workers already in the labor force and a severe penalty on the large number of workers forced into early retirement by poor health or unemployment.

A House-Senate conference on the final shape of the bill had just been completed when the AFL-CIO News went to press, but its passage was anticipated.

The changes supported by the AFL-CIO were keyed to protecting present and future benefits with a minimum of hardship for those who can least afford it.

Present retirees will have their July cost-of-living adjustment deferred six months until January. And higher-income retirees would be taxed on half of their social security benefits—representing the employer contributions to the fund. But individuals whose total taxable income is under $25,000, or under $32,000 for a couple, would not be subject to the tax.

Likewise, a one-year acceleration in an already-scheduled rise in the payroll tax would be met through a government payment on behalf of employees. But employers would pay at the higher rate.

Withdrawal barred

One change sought by public sector unions would prohibit state and local government agencies from withdrawing from social security coverage if their workers are already covered. As at present, coverage would not be mandatory. But once covered, public agencies will no longer be able to withdraw from coverage by giving two years notice.

Without these and other fine-tuning adjustments, the social security system wouldn't be able to meet its obligations. Urging the necessity of protecting the social security system, Kirkland testified at congressional hearings that it has "done more than any other American institution to provide our elderly citizens economic security and dignity."

States shape laws to protect workers from toxic materials

Nearly 20 state legislatures are considering measures that would guarantee workers the "right-to-know" the chemicals they work with. Specific legislation on hazardous substances has been introduced in Illinois, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Missouri and Texas.

The AFL-CIO campaign for state right-to-know legislation seeks to counter the efforts of business groups to persuade the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue weakened federal standards.

George H. R. Taylor, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, sent all affiliates an updated report on legislation that has been enacted in seven states and several cities to assure identification of hazardous substances in the workplace.

He said labor's efforts to get state right-to-know laws passed is causing chemical manufacturers concern that they will be hit with regulations that are stiffer than the expected federal standard.

Taylor said AFL-CIO lawyers have determined that an OSHA standard will preempt state and local laws only if:

- The federal standard is stronger than state or local protections.
- The state or local laws are in direct conflict with provisions of the federal standard.

Taylor noted that the final determination on preemption would probably come from the courts after the federal standard is issued.

A right-to-know rule has been an objective of organized labor for more than a decade, and during the Carter Administration, OSHA proposed a standard to require labeling of containers with chemical names and hazard information.

The Reagan Administration scrapped the hazard identification and labeling standard and replaced it with a "hazard communication" proposal that does not require labeling, reduces the list of covered chemicals by 90 percent and eliminates protection for 10 million workers.

It covers only for workers in manufacturing, excluding those exposed to chemicals in other industries.

Industry decides hazards

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser said the proposed OSHA standard is "almost useless to working men and women." He noted the real names of chemicals would not be required on containers, manufacturers would have the freedom to decide which chemicals are hazardous and trade secret protection would be so broad that the identity of almost any chemical could be concealed.

New Jersey, which has a massive concentration of chemical manufacturing plants is among the states considering "right-to-know" legislation and could become a battleground on the issue.

The New Jersey bill provides for the disclosure of information on about 50,000 chemicals published by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health. The chemical industry has called for trimming the list to about 8,000.

The manufacturers also contend that the proposed law would be too costly and would endanger their "trade secrets."

House budget geared to recovery

postal subsidy for non-profit mail would be sufficient to maintain current mailing rates.

And a beginning would be made toward the reindustrialization program the labor movement has strongly urged. The budget would provide $100 million in fiscal 1984 to launch a National Industrial Development Bank and provide $2 billion in loan guaranteees the first year.

The House-passed budget would raise defense outlays $21 billion over this year's level and budget authority by more than $18 billion. But where the President asked for an after-inflation increase of 10 percent, the budget would provide an inflation-adjusted 4 percent rise.

Continued increases

The proposed increase, the Budget Committee noted, would come on top of a rise in real defense spending that averaged 11 percent a year for the past two years.

The House budget would set outlays—which include social security payments—at $863.5 billion, or $22.8 billion over the President's budget. But revenues would rise to $689 billion, up nearly $30 billion from the Reagan budget, resulting in a lower deficit.

The budget resolution would compel Congress to raise revenues, but leaves open a variety of options. These include scaling back or deferring the 10-percent cut in individual and corporate income taxes scheduled for this July or other combinations including what the committee report describes as "tax reforms designed to improve equity and economic efficiency."

Next step

The next step is up to the Senate, where the Republican majority would normally be more in tune with the Administration program.

But the Senate has shown increasing signs of independence in the wake of last November's election and double-digit unemployment. Its Budget Committee was in the process of marking up a budget resolution that would have pared the 10-percent rise in defense spending sought by the President to less than 6 percent.

At the White House urging, it put off further action until after the Easter recess to avoid what would appear to be a direct defeat for the President.

To avoid significant Republican defections on the House budget vote, House GOP leaders decided not to let the President's budget come to a vote or propose an alternative budget of their own.

Instead of backing the President's program, they argued merely that the Democratic budget should be rejected so that a "better" budget could be shaped.

After the Senate adopts its budget resolution, a House-Senate conference committee will try to reach a compromise acceptable to both bodies. The final version does not go to the President and thus cannot be vetoed. But subsequent legislation and appropriations bills to implement its provisions can be vetoed.

Committee action

After the budget resolution is approved, the next step is for congressional committees to report out legislation that would bring programs in their jurisdiction in line with the new budget figures.

The budget levels operate only as ceilings and guidelines. Congress does not have to appropriate the full amount. But it must vote a special exemption in order to go above a budget ceiling.

The Budget Difference

ELECTIONS DO make a difference. It was the votes cast for labor-supported candidates last November that made possible the 229-196 vote in the House of Representatives for a budget resolution that responds to the nation's need for economic growth, job creation and help for recession victims.

It was not labor's budget that the House adopted. The economic program advanced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting takes a faster and surer route to economic recovery. But the House budget, reflecting a consensus of mainstream Democrats, moves responsibly in the same general direction.

That's quite a contrast to the budget resolutions adopted by the House in the previous Congress, when the conservative coalition was in the driver's seat. The combination of savage cuts in domestic programs and over-generous tax giveaways to the wealthy contributed to the duration, severity and hardships of the recession.

President Reagan and Republican leaders in the House have exceeded the normal bounds of political exaggeration in their attacks on what the President chose to term the "so-called liberal Democratic budget."

IN A RADIO speech before the House vote, the President warned that adoption of the Democratic budget would send the economy "into a tailspin."

Where has Mr. Reagan been these past two years when unemployment and misery approached Depression levels?

Nor does the chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, Guy Vander Jagt of Michigan, ring any bells with his statement after the House vote that the Democrats "goofed" and "handed us a significant campaign issue . . . taxes and spending."

Astonishingly, the Republicans refused to bring an alternative to the Democratic budget to the House floor for a vote, even though the rule under which the budget was adopted allowed such a substitute.

Just two months ago, the President sent his budget proposal to Congress. But the GOP leadership refrained from putting it before the House, knowing that scores of Republicans would join Democrats in voting against it. Nor were they able to agree on any other alternative. At the end, their argument boiled down to asking the House to reject the Democratic budget in the anticipation that something "better" might eventually emerge.

This is the formula for a perpetual minority party that does not expect to govern, not a party that holds the presidency and shares control of Congress.

There is, of course, more than politics involved in budget decisions and President Reagan is right when he says defense needs should not be made "the scapegoat of the federal budget."

It is unfortunate that the Administration's budget proposals veer so sharply in the other direction as to make scapegoats of the poor and the unemployed—while obstinately refusing to consider the tax changes that are essential to avoid shortchanging either military or domestic needs.

The Constitution mandates a government to "provide for the common defense" and to "promote the general welfare." No scapegoating here.

A Moral Obligation

CONGRESS PUT the cart before the horse in directing that new federal employees be brought under the social security system before there is in place an acceptable plan of supplemental benefits through the Civil Service Retirement System.

To the trade union movement, that's comparable to an employer's unilateral rewriting of a contract.

By its actions, Congress has incurred a heavy moral obligation to negotiate in good faith with the unions representing federal and postal employees on a plan that will ensure that neither present nor future government workers will be hurt by the transition.

High Noon

Washington Window

Hopes of jobless pinned on congressional action

By Press Associates, Inc.

As very modest jobs and relief legislation moved through Congress, unemployed workers from the nation's recession-ravaged industrial heartland journeyed to Washington to confront the lawmakers with the flesh and blood reality of job loss.

Among the hundreds of hand-crafted banners and placards carried at the Mar. 15 rally at the Capitol, one seemed to sum it up: "Jobs, Jobs, Jobs—We Need Jobs!"

Most traveled long distances by bus or car caravan from cities like Chicago, Gary, Flint, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Pittsburgh and Providence.

Steelworkers, auto workers, machinists, electrical workers, textile workers, glass workers, teachers, local government workers—all united by their common plight—unemployment.

But the spirit of unity extended back to the communities they came from. James Cottone, 37, an unemployed member of Steelworkers Local 2227 in Pittsburgh, was a bit surprised and highly gratified by the response he and other jobless workers received as they solicited street and plant gate donations to rent the buses. Cottone said employed workers gladly stuffed $5 and even $10 bills into the donation can.

Indicators up, jobs aren't

The nearly 3,000 jobless who came to the rally and to lobby members of Congress had heard the news of rising economic indicators. They had heard President Reagan proclaim the economy to be "on the mend."

But they weren't impressed. Many have been without jobs for more than a year now—their unemployment benefits exhausted, their savings gone, their homes sold on the auction block.

Neither were they impressed by the $5 billion, more or less, jobs and emergency relief legislation pending in Congress.

What is really needed, they told the legislators, is the kind of $68 billion job-creation program proposed by the AFL-CIO. They also insisted on the need for government aid to prevent home foreclosures and evictions, and for medical protection for the jobless.

Behind each jobless worker who came to Washington there was a story of personal hardship.

There was Michael Delbridge, 31, from Auto Workers Local 659, who rode down in a bus with other jobless workers from seven UAW locals in the Flint, Mich., area.

More than a paycheck

Delbridge had worked at Chevy Flint for nine years when he was laid off in January 1982. His unemployment ran out in February. "We gave concessions to the company to save jobs, but lost our jobs anyway," said Delbridge. "The bank foreclosed on my home. The IRS is after my car." "I found out that a job is not just a paycheck. It's a way of life. It's security. It's self-esteem."

"As a nation," he said, "we're falling apart. Other countries are sending us food packages. But what you see here today is part of getting things back together."

Then there was Richard Harrison, 41, of Steelworkers Local 1408 in McKeesport, Pa. During the past year, Harrison has worked only three weeks at the National Tube Works where he has over 12 years' seniority. His jobless benefits will run out in July.

"It's real tough being laid off," said Harrison. "I never thought it would happen to me—not for this long anyway."

As the demonstrators broke up into small groups to visit congressional offices, the workers said they'd come back if Congress fails to take meaningful action on unemployment. When they come the next time, they said, they'll bring a lot more of their friends.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Reagan 'Jobs' Plan: Wage Cut, Business Tax Cuts

At a time of massive joblessness, the Reagan Administration's "Employment Act of 1983," sent to Congress last week, should be called "The Wage-Gouging, Business Tax Windfall Act of 1983." The legislation does not create a single new job, but could cost the jobs of workers now employed.

The legislation includes:

• Subminimum Wage: Currently the minimum wage is $3.35 per hour, less than $7,000 per year. The President wants to cut this to $2.50 per hour for teenagers working during the summer. Employers could fire current workers and replace them with teens, doing nothing to bring down total unemployment.

The minimum wage has been eroded by inflation and is thus already a subminimum wage. To provide the same purchasing power as the $1.40 minimum of 1967, the current minimum should be boosted to $4.15 per hour.

• UI "Vouchers": The President wants to give unemployed Americans "vouchers" instead of unemployment compensation. If the jobless worker found a job, the voucher would go to the employer as a tax credit.

In recent testimony the AFL-CIO warned that there would be little to stop employers from laying off current workers and substituting workers who bring voucher tax credits. This scheme is just another Reagan tactic for cutting business taxes.

• More Cuts in Compensation: For the past two years Reagan has been slashing job training programs. Now he wants the states to spend meager unemployment insurance funds on training. But this is not an either/or situation. We need training programs and unemployment compensation.

House, Senate OK 'Phase I' Jobs Bill

Despite the opposition of hard-nosed Republicans, Congress neared completion of its "Phase I" recession-relief program as a conference committee resolved differences between the House and Senate versions. The legislation is a modest first effort at creating some jobs and easing the hardship for victims of the Reagan recession. But even this token anti-recession bill was whittled down by the threat of a Reagan veto, and opposed by die-hard conservatives.

The jobs bill was approved 82-16 in the Senate following a lengthy delay. Swift action was vital because the bill also includes funds to keep unemployment compensation going out in 27 states receiving extended benefits.

The jobs bill is the first effort by Congress to lessen the hardship of the Reagan recession. It includes funds to maintain and improve public works such as highways, community development projects, emergency food and shelter for the homeless, and help for the railroad retirement system.

The following 16 Senators voted against this effort to help the victims of recession:

Congress Taking a Short Recess; Time To Work These Issues

Congress will be in recess from March 28 to April 4. Contact your Representative and Senators while they are back home and seek commitments from them on issues of concern to you and your union.

HOUSE OK'S AFL-CIO-BACKED BUDGET PLAN; FOCUS SHIFTS NOW TO THE SENATE

Congress' first step in writing the budget for the year beginning next Oct. 1 is to pass a First Budget Resolution, which is a broad outline of government revenues, spending, and distribution of funds among various programs.

This year the House rejected the Reagan plan for more budget cuts and passed an AFL-CIO-backed alternative.

This budget is a step toward economic recovery and fairness in government programs and tax policy. It includes funds for job creation, foreclosure relief, improved education and training programs, health care for the jobless, and extended unemployment benefits. It would moderate the defense build-up and allow for tax reforms.

The battle now shifts to the Senate, which has postponed action on the budget at the President's request.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose Reagan budget slashing and to support the House-passed budget resolution.

MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE FOR THE JOBLESS

As of Sept. 30, 1982, more than 5 percent of all outstanding home mortgages were delinquent, a near-record high since the Mortgage Bankers Association started its survey in 1953. The home mortgage foreclosure rate has been rising steeply; nearly 170,000 families face foreclosure.

Legislation has been introduced (H.R. 1983) to provide emergency home loans for jobless Americans in danger of losing their homes. In areas of the country where mortgage delinquencies are high, the government would help pay principal, interest, taxes, insurance and utilities for up to 36 months. Homeowners would contribute up to 38 percent of their income.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: H.R. 1983 may come to a vote after the recess. Urge your Representative to support H.R. 1983, and to support any amendment to extend coverage to renters.

Taxes Are Withheld on Your Wages; Why Not on Unearned Income?

A fast-moving battle over fairness in taxation has been joined in Congress, and your help is needed to turn the tide against banking interests who are trying to protect high-income tax-dodgers. The issue is whether taxes should be withheld from unearned income, just as they already are withheld from your earned income--your paycheck.

Last year's tax amendments included a provision to withhold taxes at a 10-percent rate on interest and dividend income, beginning July 1. Bankers want Congress to repeal this measure before it takes effect. The major beneficiaries would be the top 3.4 percent of taxpayers, who receive more than one-third of the $440 billion in interest and dividend income each year.

AFL-CIO lobbyists have been working to maintain withholding as a fair means of collecting taxes that have always been due but in the past uncollected. Your help is needed, because a majority of Senators and Representatives, pressured by bankers, have cosponsored repeal legislation. Only support for withholding from union member constituents may prevent repeal.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Ask your legislators to oppose any measure that would repeal or delay withholding of taxes on interest and dividend income.

IF BANKERS WIN, YOU LOSE

- $270 billion in taxes is withheld annually from earned income--wages and salaries. This "pay as you go" system prevents a big tax bill at the end of the year, and helps ensure that everyone pays the taxes that are due.
- The current controversy is over a new law providing for withholding of taxes on unearned income--savings account interest and stock dividends. An estimated 15 percent of dividend income, and 11 percent of interest income, has been going unreported. Withholding will simply ensure that these fat-cat tax-dodgers pay what is due.
- This is not a new tax, but rather a means of improving tax compliance.
- The new withholding measure will raise a lot of money: $19 billion over five years. If withholding is repealed, Congress will be looking for ways to make up the loss. Congress might increase taxes on oil products or tax your employee health insurance benefits.
- Thus repeal of tax withholding could end up raising your taxes--and all because some tax-dodgers don't want to pay what's due.

BANKERS PRESSURING CONGRESS

American bankers have spared no expense in their determination to shield tax dodgers. They have undertaken a massive public relations campaign to pressure Congress into repealing the tax withholding reform measure.

The American Bankers Association, leading the drive, is working with a dozen major trade associations in lobbying Congress. They have mailed as many as 80 million pre-printed postcards to their customers, asking that the cards be signed and sent to Congress. They have placed advertisements in magazines and newspapers.

The bankers haven't let the truth get in their way. "The government will be picking the taxpayers' pockets," says one ABA document. The government will "loot your savings account," it continues. In fact, the honest taxpayer won't pay a penny more than he would if withholding had not been enacted. Withholding will matter only to those who don't pay their taxes.

Unfortunately, many have been misled by the bankers' campaign and have sent the postcards to Capitol Hill. That's why it is important that we send Congress some mail on the other side of the issue.

Reform package assures integrity of social security

By James M. Shevis

Organized labor welcomed congressional passage of reform legislation to assure the integrity of the social security system, but expressed disappointment with provisions extending the retirement age and imposing mandatory coverage of newly hired federal workers.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO pointed out that the legislation—based primarily on recommendations of the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform—will not increase the tax burden for workers beyond tax increases already scheduled for the next five years.

Director Bert Seidman of the federation's Dept. of Social Security said that despite the provisions on retirement age and coverage of new federal employees, the Social Security Amendments of 1983 are preferable to the alternative of a protracted political battle and the likelihood of more serious benefit cuts or temporary Band-Aid solutions that could jeopardize the program.

Signing awaited

Congressional approval of the social security bill was completed in the early morning hours of Mar. 25, when the Senate adopted a conference committee report on the measure, 58-14. The House had approved the package a day earlier by a 243-102 vote. President Reagan is expected to sign the measure into law the week of Apr. 10.

The compromise rescue plan, approved two months after the reform commission presented its recommendations, is expected to raise about $165 billion over the next seven years, guaranteeing that retirement checks will continue to go out to some 36 million recipients.

If Congress had done nothing, the system's Old Age & Survivors Disability Insurance fund would have run short in July and faced serious financial trouble throughout the Eighties.

Passage of the Social Security Amendments "should bring peace of mind to workers and the elderly, for their social security benefits will be made secure for now and in the future," Seidman said.

Attached to the bill were provisions extending an emergency jobless benefits program six months to help more than 2 million unemployed workers. If Congress had not acted, federal payments to the long-term unemployed would have been cut off on Mar. 31.

As cleared by Congress, the social security reform package requires that all federal workers hired after Jan. 1, 1984, be brought under the system. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a member of the reform commission, had dissented from this recommendation, urging deferment of action pending creation of a program of supplementary benefits for federal workers and postal workers through the civil service retirement system.

The AFL-CIO intends to work with postal and federal employee unions to insure that the promised pension plan to supplement social security will provide a combined package of benefits at least equal to those now enjoyed by present workers, Seidman said.

Union warns U.S. Steel against import scheme

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers warned that the U.S. Steel Corp.'s plan to import unfinished steel from the government-owned British Steel Corp. will wipe out thousands of American jobs and threaten the survival of the nation's steel industry.

"It is our intention as a union to resist this arrangement in every way that is at our disposal," USWA President Lloyd McBride said in a statement. "These discussions have grave implications which go beyond any one facility to the very future of the industry itself.

"It raises questions about whether domestic producers are going to become essentially finishers of steel and dependent on foreign steelmakers for semifinished steel," McBride said.

Subsidized slabs

Since word surfaced that U.S. Steel officials had held talks with British Steel Corp. toward securing an "uninterrupted flow" of steel slabs to the company's Fairless works near Philadelphia, McBride said he has been in "almost daily contact" with U.S. Steel urging it to forgo the use of "subsidized steel." He has also called on the Administration and Congress to take immediate steps to ensure proper enforcement of U.S. trade laws.

"The British Steel Corp. is an industrial arm of the British government," McBride observed. "However these undertakings may be rationalized, the fact remains that subsidized steel slab is just as illegal entering this country if it is purchased by a domestic producer as it would be if purchased by a customer of one of the domestic producers.

"Unless there is a concerted effort in the public sector, we are faced with further erosion of steelworker employment and the beginning of the demise of the American steel industry."

Beginning comeback

The U.S. steel industry is just beginning to revive after a prolonged slump in which 163,000 steelworkers have been laid off or put on short workweeks. Earlier this month, USWA signed a new, 41-month contract in which union members made concessions to help the industry survive the worst downturn since the Great Depression.

In his statement, McBride said he understood that part of the negotiations between U.S. Steel and British Steel involved the British "buying into" the Fairless works. The complex represents about 12 percent of U.S. Steel's production capacity. The union is concerned that if U.S. Steel begins buying unfinished steel from abroad for processing at Fairless, the company might eliminate its raw-steel producing facilities there, causing the layoff of as

Benefit extension eases hardship of long-term jobless

Congress approved and President Reagan signed into law a six-month extension of the federally funded supplemental unemployment compensation program—vital economic assistance for persons who have exhausted their regular and extended benefits—just as it was to expire.

Debated as part of the social security reform bill, the jobless benefits measure was sent to Reagan separately for his signature so that payments would not be interrupted. The supplemental benefits program was set to expire on Mar. 31.

The provisions on unemployment compensation contain $2 billion to continue the supplemental jobless benefits program through Sept. 30. As enacted, the provi-

Elderly fight new cuts in programs

Older Americans will suffer "new and devastating cuts in services" if Congress approves the proposed Administration budget for the fiscal year that begins on Oct. 1, 1983, a coalition of groups representing the elderly charged.

"If the proposed budget cuts are enacted, many vulnerable older persons will simply fall through the gaps," the Leadership Council of Aging Organizations concluded in a 48-page study.

The fiscal 1984 budget resolution adopted by the House would restore virtually all of the non-defense programs slashed by the Reagan budget proposal. The Senate has delayed action on the budget until after its Easter recess.

"A great many older persons are unable to replace federal assistance through employment, and are subject to escalating medical expenses," the coalition said. "These vulnerable elderly are being asked to accept an intolerable burden."

The study—an analysis of the Administration's proposed budget as it affects older persons—reviews 18 programs which provide services or benefits to the elderly, all of which face budget reductions, freezes or, in several cases, elimination.

Unequal effect

The coalition's analysis points out that persons who are most dependent on federal entitlements suffer disproportionately from benefit freezes or reductions.

The lives of poor people, who often rely on several federal programs, will be devastated by the compound impact of budget cuts, the report notes.

Hardest hit will be women and minorities who make up the largest segment of the poor elderly, it pointed out.

The burden of the Reagan budget cutbacks is not equally shared, the council charged. The most basic needs of older persons are being threatened by slated program reductions, the study observes. Income, health care, food, and shelter are all targets of the Administration's budgetary "savings" scheme.

Among the 28 national organizations that make up the council are the National Council of Senior Citizens, the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Social Security and the Auto Workers Retired Members Dept. NCSC President Jacob Clayman is chairman of the coalition.

Noting that spending for programs for the elderly already have been reduced by

Secretary-treasurers' agenda

Allocations sought for study on problems of shift workers

There is solid scientific evidence linking shift work to workers' emotional, physical and social problems, but much more research is needed to effectively solve these problems, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

In testimony before a House science and technology subcommittee, Federation Economist John Zalusky urged the allocation of funds for the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) earmarked for research on the effects of shift work.

The need is becoming more pressing, Zalusky said, because the workforce is growing older and retirement age is being extended. Evidence shows that the adverse consequences of shift work increase with the age of the worker.

Zalusky said Labor Dept. figures show that about 16 percent of the workforce is now on some type of shift pattern other than the typical day-work schedule.

Although the overall proportion of workers on shifts has remained fairly steady over the last decade, some industries have substantially increased their percentage of shift workers, Zalusky said. Among them are the petroleum refining, synthetic fiber, shipbuilding and computer industries and gas and electric utilities.

Reason for shifts

He noted that most industries go to shifts for one of four main reasons: the need for 24-hour services, like police, fire and utilities; continuous maintenance of manufacturing processes that can't be shut down; to accommodate the public, such as providing all-night shopping or food service, and to maximize quick recovery of capital.

Zalusky estimated that as technology advances with rapid product obsolescence becoming a bigger problem and the cost of capital relative to the cost of labor increasing, more and more workers will be pressed to work shifts so employers can keep business going day and night, seven days a week.

Unions have long experience with shift work, and most collective bargaining agreements have special provisions for dealing with it, Zalusky said, pointing to shift premium pay, bidding by seniority, shorter late shift hours or minimum rest hours between shifts. Progress in finding practical solutions to shift work problems through collective bargaining would be helped by the availability of more detailed scientific knowledge, Zalusky told the committee.

Research

He pointed out that NIOSH only began to associate its research on sleep patterns, physiological rhythms and human performance with shift work in the early 1970s.

In a companion paper presented with his testimony, Zalusky wrote that while research is far from complete, studies already show that interference with the human body's biological rhythms of sleeping and eating can cause serious physical and psychological problems.

Family and social life are disrupted, Zalusky said, adding that substantial research is needed in this area, including studies of the relationship between shift work and divorce rates, spouse abuse, drug use and juvenile delinquency.

Zalusky cited evidence that shift work is not socially or even economically desirable in the long run, but as long as attention is focused on employers' concerns about cost-benefit ratios, research on the issue will be directed only at "making the best of a poor situation."

Amendments bolster social security funds

cern to labor was a Republican-backed proposal pushing back the normal retirement age under social security from 65 to 67 in two steps by the year 2027.

The age for full retirement would first be raised gradually to 66 over a six-year period ending in 2009. The second step—raising the age from 66 to 67—also would be phased in over six years, ending in 2027.

Early retirement would still be allowed at age 62, but benefits would be cut from the current 80 percent of full retirement benefits to 75 percent by the year 2009 and to 70 percent by the year 2027.

The AFL-CIO opposed the age extension as a breach of faith for workers who have made contributions during their working lives with the expectation of receiving promised benefits. Labor also stressed that the provision will work a particular hardship on workers forced out of the labor market and into early retirement because of poor health or poor economic conditions.

"The AFL-CIO will work to modify and repeal this provision before it becomes effective," Seidman said.

● Besides all new federal hires, those required to join the social security system after Jan. 1, 1984, include the President, Vice President, all members of Congress, federal judges, and about 3,000 other top political appointees and senior government executives.

Other coverage

Employees of all nonprofit organizations would be brought under the program effective next Jan. 1. State or local governments will no longer be permitted to withdraw from the system. Those that have withdrawn will be permitted to return to the system voluntarily.

● The payroll tax to finance social security and Medicare benefits would remain at 6.7 percent next year for employees but climb to 7 percent for employers.

The tax is scheduled to climb to 7.05 percent for both workers and employers in 1985, to 7.15 percent for both in 1986 and 1987, and to 7.51 percent for employers and employees alike in 1988-89. The payroll tax would increase to 7.65 percent for both groups in 1990 and afterward.

The legislation would increase the levy for the self-employed, who now pay 9.35 percent, to 11.3 percent in 1984, rising to 13.02 percent in 1988-89.

No new tax

Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, points out that workers will bear no new additional tax burden for five years, since these increases had already been scheduled, and the additional tax under the new legislation will consist only of a two-year partial acceleration of an already scheduled increase under the 1977 amendments to the Social Security Act.

● Retirees would pay income tax on half their social security benefits if their adjusted gross income plus half their benefits exceed $25,000 for individuals or $32,000 for couples.

● The cost-of-living increase scheduled for July would be delayed until January, with future increases coming in successive Januarys.

The COL adjustment would be made next January even if the increase in the government's consumer price index on which the adjustment is based falls below 3 percent. Under existing law, adjustments are forgone when the CPI is that low.

● The penalty currently placed on retirees with outside earnings would be liberalized. Under existing law, those under age 70 have their benefits reduced $1 for each $2 they earn above $6,600. Under the new legislation, benefits would be reduced $1 for each $3 earned, beginning in 1990.

● Benefits designed especially to help widowed, divorced and disabled women would be liberalized also. These include an increase in benefits for disabled widows and widowers aged 50-59.

● The three social security trust funds —Old Age & Survivors Insurance, Disability Insurance, and Health Insurance— would be allowed to borrow funds from each other through 1987. But the first two would be unable to borrow from the health insurance fund, which finances the Medicare insurance program, if its reserves fall below a certain level.

● The bonus individuals receive for delaying retirement past the age of 65 would increase from 3 to 8 percent of benefits a year. The bonus would be phased in between 1990 and 2008, and would be available for those up to age 70.

● The social security system would be removed from the federal budget beginning in fiscal 1992. Until then, the system would be shown as a separate function within the budget.

● Monthly Supplemental Security income (SSI) benefits would be increased by $20 for individuals and $30 for couples, effective July 1, 1983.

● The SSI cost-of-living increase due this July would be delayed for six months until January 1984, and paid every January thereafter.

Senate vote on delaying interest withholding tax

The Senate on Mar. 22 voted 54-43 to table a motion by Sen. John Melcher (D-Mont.) to delay the 10 percent withholding tax on interest and dividend income. The measure temporarily threatened passage of the social security reform package. The AFL-CIO supports closing this tax loophole and considers a vote for tabling the motion, offered by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), as supporting labor's position.

St. Louis meets at Union Label Show

Six-day exhibition attracts overflow crowd of 250,000

Visitors collect free samples and prizes at the Union-Industries Show.

By Susan Dunlop

St. Louis—A panorama of skills, services and products made by union members was on display as the 38th AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show opened its doors for a six-day run here, attracting one of the largest crowds in the show's history.

An estimated 250,000 visitors from the greater St. Louis area attended the exhibition Mar. 25-30 at the city's convention center where the main exhibit area is named the United Labor Hall in honor of the labor movement's support for the development of the center and its commitment to smooth, on-schedule construction.

The free, public show highlighted the skill and productivity of union workers alongside a wide array of goods and services they produce in cooperation with their employers.

The exposition is produced by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. in a different city each year.

Workers' role

At the show's opening day ceremonies, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue pointed out that the Union-Industries Show "demonstrates dramatically that American workers recognize they have as great a stake as management has in the productivity and profitability of industry—for as industry thrives, so do workers through the 'fair share' mechanism of collective bargaining."

Donahue said that the show points up to the community the "best side" of labor-management relations, and shows that the labor movement is "a vital and indispensable" part of the American economy and society.

While the exhibition highlights just how much workers and employers can accomplish together, Donahue said, "at the same time, we cannot forget that too much of America's vast industrial capacity sits idle, as do millions of American workers, jobless through no fault of their own."

It is in the economic and social interests of this country to put people back to work, and government can and should be a partner in a vital project of such national scope, Donahue said.

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO has called for a program of public service jobs that will create employment, generate taxes and produce useful and badly needed community facilities.

The AFL-CIO's own exhibit at the show emphasized the importance of communications with union members and the public. A specially constructed "theater" featured video news and information programming produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the federation's television production and communications arm.

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers unveiled a colorful new exhibit in the city where the union was founded 92 years ago, and members of IBEW Locals 1 and 2 explained their skills to show visitors and helped give away appliances and many other products made by IBEW members.

Pride in the products made by union members was the focal point of the Allied Industrial Workers exhibit which featured members' skills in making everything from toys to touring motorcycles. Nearby, the Theatrical Stage Employes explained why movies wouldn't be the same without their unique talents and skills in a display that drew visitors with a "sneak preview" of upcoming films.

The Steelworkers exhibit focused on the wide range of products members make and the services they provide to the community. Funds to benefit USWA food banks for the unemployed were raised at the exhibit through the sale of the 45 rpm record "Steel Mill Blues," written and recorded by the nephew of a jobless union member.

Prizes and skills

The Food & Commercial Workers arena was the setting for prize giveaways that pointed up UFCW members' skills in a wide range of industries including meatcutting, manufacturing, retailing, professional services and health care. A highlight of the show was the annual Barbers & Beauticians Hair Fashion spectacular, a national competition for men's and women's hairstylists.

The skills of union members in a multitude of industries ranging from aerospace technology to air conditioners was highlighted at the Machinists exhibit, which also underscored the labor movement's interest in serving the community with a live demonstration by a blind worker of how guide dogs are trained and made available by International Guiding Eyes, founded by a Machinists member.

Tasty samples

Plenty of tasty free samples and a virtuoso cake decorating demonstration drew visitors to the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers booth. At the Graphic Arts display, visitors watched as their take-home souvenirs were printed on high technology printing equipment.

A key theme of many exhibits at the show was apprenticeship and training, including the exhibits staged by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and by the Sheet Metal Workers where apprentices made trays given away as prizes.

Carpenters apprentices constructed small benches while they explained their varied skills, and the Laborers emphasized the many phases of the construction industry in which their members receive training through the union's schools, including skills such as laser surveying.

The city's famous landmark, the Gateway Arch, and the labor movement's role in creating it, were featured at the Iron Workers exhibit in a film that showed how union workers of many trades and crafts built the 630-foot high structure.

Safe driving

The Operating Engineers demonstrated the skills of their members, and spotlighted the importance of seat belt safety—both on and off the job—with a machine called "The Convincer" that did just that for show visitors who tried it.

The more than 300 exhibits in the show made the point that union members are found in virtually every industry. The Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers, for example, displayed products ranging from basic aluminum to fine dinnerware. Members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at the show explained their jobs in oil refining as well as in the making of many consumer products such as soaps and shampoos. At the Auto Workers exhibit visitors could look over the latest model UAW-built cars in a display that emphasized buying union-made products to help create jobs.

The Boilermakers booth featured floating scale models of ships built by the union's members, and the Chemical Workers popular "Magic of Chemistry" show pointed up the wide range of goods made by ICWU members.

Top quality products made by union members—many of which were given away as prizes to show visitors, were the keynotes of colorful exhibits by the Rubber Workers, the Molders and the Clothing & Textile Workers, and show visitors walked away from the Ladies' Garment Workers exhibit humming the famous "Look for the Union Label" jingle after watching union members sew aprons out of special ILGWU fabric.

The essential role in the U.S. economy of the railroad industry and its workers was the theme of exhibits mounted by the Railway Clerks, the Railway Carmen, the Signalmen, and the Maintenance of Way Employees.

Emphasis on quality

The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers explained their union's involvement in industries from mining to consumer products, while the Upholstery Workers demonstrated fine furniture making, and members of the Stove & Furnace Workers explained their participation in making both quality wood-burning stoves and high technology kitchen ranges.

The significance of union workers' skills was stressed at the Bricklayers exhibit, at exhibits by the Plasterers, and the Painters where union sign painters made their difficult trade look easy.

Prize giveaways were a popular event staged by many exhibitors at the show, including bags of union-made products from the Grain Millers, the Seafarers and the Paperworkers. Overall, more than $100,000 in prizes and free souvenirs were handed out at the six-day event, show officials reported.

The importance of union members' jobs in vital fields such as health care was underscored by the Service Employees, where union nurses gave free blood pressure checks, and by the Fire Fighters where fire safety was explained.

Chefs at work

Union members actually performing their skilled jobs drew visitors to watch the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees chefs at work, as well as the glass bottle blowers at the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers exhibit. Flint Glass Workers members demonstrated the art of glass etching and hand painting on glass lamps and vases.

Exhibits by the Furniture Workers, the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, the Distillery Workers and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers showed off to visitors the diversity of industries in which union members are employed.

And on a practical note, while the Letter Carriers and Postal Workers display showed how mail delivery has evolved, a working post office provided stamps and a special Union-Industries Show cachet and cancel as a unique souvenir.

African unionists released

Pressure from the AFL-CIO and other free trade union groups has led to the release of six black South African labor leaders jailed last month in a clear effort to break independent black unions in South Africa.

Released Mar. 30 without charges were President Thozamile Gqweta of the South African Allied Workers Union, Sisa Njikelana, Bangwizi Sifingo, Humphrey Maxogwana, and Jef Wabena of the same union, and Sidney Madamudi of the General Allied Workers.

All had been arrested in Port Elizabeth on Mar. 18. Police gave no reason for detaining them. Gqweta was picked up at his home in the middle of the night. Njikelana was arrested at his home after police searched for what they called subversive literature, and the others were in a bus at the time of their arrest.

At the request of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the AFL-CIO and other free labor organizations cabled South African Prime Minister P. W. Botha expressing outrage over this latest violation of trade union rights and called for guarantees of the safety and good health of the detainees.

For Gqweta, it was his eighth arrest without charges, and Njikelana had been arrested five or six times. The arrests fit a pattern of the South African police who have harassed the black unions by disrupting their operations.

At the time of their arrests, Gqweta and the others were in the middle of negotiations with a local chloride plant that employs black workers.

The AFL-CIO also sent a letter to the South African ambassador to the United States, Bernardus G. Fourie, in Washington, informing him of its protests.

ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken cabled Botha, "The unending persecution of black trade unionists . . . constitutes further evidence that so-called labor reforms do not touch the majority of black workers who are subject to loss of citizenship and forced migration and are victims of daily violations of trade union rights."

Humphrey Donahue gets regional post

Humphrey Donahue has been named assistant director of AFL-CIO Region VII by Federation President Lane Kirkland.

Donahue, 53, has been an AFL-CIO field representative in New York since 1969. Earlier, Donahue was a vice president of Ironworkers Local 33 in Rochester, N.Y.

He will be based in the New York City headquarters of the region, which comprises New York, New Jersey and Puerto Rico.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland rallies union support for Chicago Democratic mayoral candidate, Rep. Harold Washington, right.

Chicago's mayoral contest linked to presidential race

Chicago—The outcome of the mayoral race in Chicago could be a key to the race for the White House in 1984, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared at a rally for the Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold Washington.

More than 18,000 supporters turned out for the gathering on the University of Illinois branch campus at the call of local labor, civil rights, business, professional, and community groups.

Kirkland reminded the rally of Samuel Gompers's political advice to "reward your friends and punish your enemies" and said that Washington has "earned the reward of labor support" with a 94 percent "right" voting record in his two terms in Congress and comparable high marks as a state lawmaker.

Unanimous endorsement

Washington has the unanimous endorsement of the executive board of the Chicago AFL-CIO, Kirkland pointed out.

The Democrat faces former Republican state legislator Bernard Epton in the Apr. 12 general election. Racial undertones have marred the campaign—Washington is black, Epton, white—drawing national attention to the race in the city that is traditionally a Democratic stronghold.

Kirkland warned that "if the working people of Chicago are divided along racial lines, the only beneficiaries will be the Reaganites," and the losers will be "not only the people of Chicago . . . but also the millions of unemployed . . . the weak and the needy . . . and all Americans who look to their government to promote social and economic justice and equal rights."

He called the mayoral race a chance for the people of Chicago "to cast their votes for a new Administration in Washington" because this election can presage the outcome of the 1984 presidential contest in Illinois.

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser told the rally that the old coalition of workers, blacks and other minorities "is being tested in Chicago by forces trying to tear us apart."

Kirkland said that over the last 50 years "most of the progress made in this country has come from the combined effort of labor, minorities, women, youth and the disadvantaged, working together—usually through the instrumentality of the Democratic Party."

That alliance, he pointed out, was "shaped during the New Deal and renewed in subsequent struggles." He reminded the participants that the date of the election also marks the 43rd anniversary of the death of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Kirkland said a massive "march to the polls" giving Washington "a solid victory and a strong mandate" would be a fitting memorial to the late President and a turnabout on the suggestion once made by Reagan that people who don't like the conditions under which they are living should "vote with their feet."

Other labor speakers at the rally included State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy, William A. Lee, president of the Chicago labor federation, and Robert G. Gibson, president of the Illinois AFL-CIO.

Degree pays off

A college bachelor's degree can boost lifetime earnings by 40 percent, but the extra salary for men is double that for women, the Census Bureau reported.

Lifetime earnings for male college graduates should range from $1.2 million to $2.75 million, while earnings of high school graduates would be $860,000 to $1.87 million.

Female college graduates should expect lifetime earnings from $520,000 to $1.12 million, compared to $380,000 to $800,000 in lifetime earnings for female high school graduates.

The figures, based on population survey data gathered in 1979-1981, are for wages earned between ages 18-64 and are in 1981 dollars. The agency cautioned the earnings figures do not account for significant differences in the amount and continuity of previous work experience between men and women.

Union warns import scheme threatens basic steel industry

many as 2,000 additional USWA members who are already working shorter weeks.

Congress and the American people need to know that "this could lead directly toward the creation of a 'steel OPEC' situation in which the United States could conceivably become dependent upon offshore steel production by the end of this decade," McBride also pointed out.

"If the United States is going to be dependent upon the melt shops of Europe, Japan or Third World countries for much of its semifinished steel, then it becomes apparent that at any given point a nation which was once known as the leading industrial society in the world will have become a dependent nation, easily victimized in the volatile emergencies that are a part of our time."

U.S. Steel officials, acknowledging the talks with British Steel, said that no conclusions had been reached. The American firm has led the domestic industry in seeking administrative and legislative action for protection from steel imports—particularly from government-subsidized producers such as British Steel, which is one of the more heavily subsidized foreign producers.

McBride clashed with J. Bruce Johnston, senior vice president of employee relations for U.S. Steel, over the latter's contention that McBride had been informed of the talks with British Steel last November. Johnston served as the company's chief negotiator in the contract talks with the union.

Import threat

McBride said that Johnston had advised him then that if the parties failed to hammer out a new contract there was a strong likelihood that the firm would keep its plants open in the event of a strike and rely on the importation of steel slabs as a part of that decision.

"These comments were made in the context of failing to reach an agreement," McBride stressed.

After the renewal of contract talks in February, McBride said, there was no further mention of the company's possible course of action, specifically involving discussions with British Steel Corp.

"The union would have every right to expect that imported steel would not be used after a settlement was reached," he pointed out. It stands to reason, McBride said, that had the union's negotiators been advised of the British steel plan and its viability regardless of the outcome of a contract agreement, "then their approach toward negotiations would have been in an entirely different light.

"This whole experience should be examined in that context," McBride said.

Publishing jobs tied to key clause in Copyright Act

Hundreds of thousands of American printing and publishing jobs would be lost if the manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act is allowed to expire in July 1986, union witnesses warned the International Trade Commission.

The ITC, at the request of the House Ways & Means Committee, is investigating the economic effects termination of the clause would have on employment, imports and exports and long-term conditions of industry competitiveness. It is expected to report its findings by July 1.

The manufacturing clause was extended last July for four years when Congress overrode President Reagan's veto. It requires that nondramatic literary works written in English by U.S. residents be printed and bound in the United States or Canada to be assured full copyright protection.

More than expected

AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager told the commission that termination of the clause would "result in the loss of hundreds of thousands of job opportunities"—many more than the Labor Dept.'s estimate of 170,000 to 367,000.

She pointed out that shutdown of a production facility has a multiplier effect on an entire community, stressing that job losses are not restricted to the direct or indirect opportunities in the industry and supporting industries.

She said that absent the copyright law U.S. book and catalogue publishers could abandon domestic production to take advantage of substandard wages, tax breaks, trade barriers and export subsidies abroad.

Vice President William A. Schroeder of the Graphic Arts International Union testified that the opponents of the clause are focusing on book production while ignoring the more than $20 billion in commercial printing done annually in the United States, which could also be lost to overseas production.

Long-term devastation

The long-term effect of terminating the manufacturing clause would result in the "effective elimination of large segments of the U.S. printing and publishing industry," Schroeder warned. He cited directories, catalogs, books, greeting cards, business forms, magazines and periodicals not containing timely material, and miscellaneous publishing as the types of printing that will be "produced in the cheap labor market of Southeast Asia."

He said that women, who make up 40 percent of the graphic arts industry and who hold mainly semi-skilled and unskilled bindery jobs, would be the major victims of the shift to overseas production.

Schroeder also cited parallels between the printing industry and the auto, steel, shoe, clothing and electronics industries already battered by stiff foreign competition.

Farm Workers pact ends long strike

Ventura, Calif. — Farm Workers ratified an agreement with West Foods Mushroom Farm to end a 15-month strike and bring substantial wage and benefit increases for UFW members.

UFW President Cesar Chavez said the 20-month contract brings all major mushroom producers in California to the same level of wages and benefits. It also establishes, for the first time, an industrywide contract expiration date. He pointed out that 75 percent of all West Coast mushroom workers are union members.

Chavez praised the "tremendous solidarity" of the workers during the strike which began Nov. 19, 1981, when all 325 of the workers walked off the job.

The new contract with West Foods, a subsidiary of Castle & Cooke Foods, Inc., provides for an immediate wage increase to $5.85 an hour, up from the pre-strike rate of $4.21. An additional 35-cent-an-hour raise will be paid next November. Dental and vision care coverage were added. Piece rates went to 38.75 cents per three-pound box picked, up from 31.5 cents. The contract, which was ratified by a vote of 178 to 0, expires Nov. 8, 1984.

Federal aid cuts create crisis for city schools

Most of the nation's large school districts are financially worse off now than five years ago and will be even poorer by 1988, a survey by the Teachers showed.

The poll of local AFT officials in 35 school systems with a total student enrollment of 4.2 million—10.4 percent of all U.S. public school children — was conducted to determine the impact of the Reagan budget cuts and recession on public education.

Among the larger school systems surveyed were New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, Miami, Detroit, Baltimore and Louisville, Ky.

Local budgetary problems have been exacerbated by the Administration's unprecedented slashes in federal aid to schools, the AFT said. The poll also found:

- Employee layoffs and program cutbacks were the most prevalent methods of trimming 1981-82 school budgets.
- Nine of 10 local union leaders feel federal aid to education will continue to decline over the next three years.
- More than 80 percent of the leaders said unions need to gain more political power at the state level, work closer with school boards and local elected officials.
- Eight of 10 respondents listed federal budget cuts and declining local tax bases as most responsible for the financial hard times of public education.

Disproportionate cuts

AFT Research Director James Ward noted in reviewing the findings that the federal education cuts fell disproportionately on city school districts that have a larger share of children with special needs, including the disadvantage, the poor, and those with limited knowledge of English.

"The prolonged recession coupled with the economic policies pursued by President Reagan have taken their toll on city budgets resulting in reduced state and local tax revenues and increased state and local expenditures for jobless benefits and welfare programs," Ward observed.

To the question, "How would you characterize the financial situation in your school district today compared to five years ago?" 58.8 percent of the local leaders said it was worse, 23.5 percent better and 17.5 percent, about the same.

Ward noted that among those cities indicating the situation is better are Washington, D.C., Toledo, Ohio, Yonkers, N.Y. and Gary, Ind., which have already weathered severe fiscal crisis.

Asked how they expected the financial situation to be five years from now when compared to today, 66.7 percent said, "worse," 24.2 percent said, "better," and 9.1 percent said it would remain the same.

None of the respondents expected federal aid to education to increase in the next three years and only 12.5 percent felt it would stay the same. Likewise, over 25 percent suspected categorical state aid would decrease and 13.3 percent felt general state assistance to education would drop also.

To cope with slashed federal aid and declining local tax bases, the survey showed that school systems are increasingly using wage freezes, layoffs and program cuts to balance their budgets. Sixty-nine percent of the respondents felt compensatory education for the disadvantaged (Title I) was the most adversely affected program, while 25 percent cited cuts in early childhood education and desegregation programs and termination of school security personnel.

Forming alliances

The AFT has taken steps on both the national and local levels to form an alliance with the other organizations to focus concerns on the crisis in education. It is working with the Committee for Economic Development, a nonpartisan group representing the leadership of 200 major corportions, to examine declines in math and science education.

Economic index continues up, but weak spots cloud outlook

The government's barometer of future trends in the economy rose for the sixth month in a row, indicating a pickup in economic activity, but there were weak spots that clouded the outlook for recovery.

The 1.4-percent climb in the Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators was much smaller than January's revised 3.5-percent gain, which was the biggest in three decades.

The index is a compilation of 12 separate economic statistics designed to show trends in the overall economy in coming months. Seven of the 10 indicators available for February contributed to the over-the-month increase. The strongest was a jump in the nation's money supply.

Workweek decline

The biggest negative factor was a drop in the average workweek back to its length in December, a symptom of stubbornly resurgent unemployment. The nation's jobless rate in February was 10.4 percent.

Also showing worse performances in February were orders for new consumer goods and materials as well as contracts and orders for new plants and equipment.

Showing improvement—and thus contributing to the rise in the index—were prices of sensitive materials, formation of new businesses, first-time claims for jobless benefits, stock prices, business deliveries, building permits for future home construction, and the money supply.

The two indicators not yet available were those measuring changes in business inventories and in borrowing by consumers and companies.

Other reports amounted to a mixed bag:

- The Labor Dept. reported a 22-percent jump in the number of full-time permanent job openings registered with state employment bureaus in January. While an improvement, the 153,000 job openings represented the sixth lowest figure registered.
- Sales of new single-family houses fell 5.9 percent in February following a substantial rise the month before, the Commerce Dept. said. The industry still is plagued by high mortgage interest rates that keep prospective buyers out of the market.
- The Federal Home Loan Bank Board reported that the delinquency rate on home mortgage payments was the highest since the government regulatory agency began collecting such statistics in 1973.
- New construction contracts declined 6 percent in February, mainly because of bad weather, F. W. Dodge Co. said.
- Machine tool orders in February were down 40 percent from a year earlier and only 6.8 percent higher than in January, the National Machine Tool Builders' Association reported.
- The nation's merchandise trade deficit was $3.58 billion in February—up slightly from January's deficit of $3.57 billion, the smallest in six months.

Because of improving sales of exports and shrinking oil imports, the Commerce Dept. revised its 1983 deficit projection to no higher than $60 billion, still a record but less deterioration than feared earlier.

'We Can Top That Deal!'

Elderly assail Reagan slashes in vital assistance programs

two previous Reagan budgets, the analysis observes:

"What we see this year as the Administration's 1984 fiscal year budget is scrutinized is not only new and devastating cuts in services to older persons but also the cumulative impact of three years of budget reductions.

"These reductions have shredded what was once a safety net of social programs."

As an example of what the coalition called the "multiple" effect of the proposed Reagan cuts, the study noted that food stamps would be counted as income in determining rents for subsidized housing residents at the same time that housing subsidies are being reduced.

"As a result, food stamp recipients who also reside in subsidized housing would face both rent increases and food stamp reductions." And, "despite skyrocketing fuel costs," low-income energy assistance would be reduced by 34 percent, the analysis said.

The report also notes that proposals for Medicare, which currently provides health care assistance to about 26-million aged individuals, would force the hospitalized elderly to pay up to $1,180 more out of their own pockets than the current law permits.

Nutrition programs for the elderly are also slated for reductions. Funding for group and home-delivered meals would be cut, and a larger emphasis placed on the use of voluntary contributions to make up the difference. In addition, the food stamp program, which has been subject to sharp cutbacks in each of the last two years, is targeted for further reductions. Housing and community service employment programs for the elderly face cuts as well.

"These examples only begin to outline the impact that the Administration's proposed budget reductions would have on older persons," the analysis observes.

Benefit extension eases hardship of long-term jobless

sions allow those who have exhausted up to 39 weeks of regular and extended benefits to qualify for a maximum of eight to 14 additional weeks of payments, depending on their state's unemployment date.

Jobless workers who had already run through the emergency supplemental benefits before Apr. 1 become eligible for 6 to 10 additional weeks. And those currently receiving supplemental benefits also will be eligible for additional weeks. Those who have not exhausted their benefits by Sept. 30 when the program expires will receive up to 50 percent of their remaining benefits.

The measure also gives states that have borrowed from the federal government for their unemployment trust funds more time to pay the interest on such loans if they take steps to bolster their programs. Currently, states—mostly those hit hardest by unemployment—owe some $12 billion to the federal trust fund.

The new legislation also allows states to deduct money from an individual's jobless benefits to pay for health insurance, if the individual elects such coverage.

It also requires states to deny unemployment benefits to nonprofessional school employees between academic years or terms if they have a "reasonable assurance" of returning to work. Benefits now are denied in such circumstances only for professional school employees.

Cleveland project aids workers facing layoff

Cleveland—The problems of unemployment have become so critical here that several labor, social service and government organizations have begun a project to help workers facing layoffs or job termination to prepare them for the shock of unemployment.

The unemployment rate in the Cleveland area exceeded 12 percent in February. In neighboring Lorain County the jobless rate was 18.2 percent.

A Special Economic Response Team (SERT) recently began visiting the affected plants. Before workers lose their jobs, social workers, Ohio Bureau of Employment Services specialists, consumer advisers, mental health experts and others tell them what survival services are available in their communities.

SERT teams from 20 agencies now are trying to head off some of the more serious family, psychological or financial problems springing from widespread unemployment, Executive Director Michael J. Murphy of the Cleveland AFL-CIO's United Labor Agency said.

The United Way Services is helping the ULA, which designed the program, coordinate many different social agencies.

Recently, five agencies gave presentations and distributed unemployment compensation applications to members of Laborers Local 860 at a small suburban plant that is closing.

"The labor and social workers were applauded after the presentation," Murphy said.

Often, the unemployed are isolated once the plant closes, he said. Many have never been out of work in the past and are totally unfamiliar with the social agencies they have supported for years with their tax money or United Way contributions.

The program makes them aware of the services and their rights and leads them to find training for new jobs, Murphy said.

One of the biggest problems for unemployed workers is to maintain a feeling of self esteem, Murphy said. "And we want to begin in the final weeks while they are all together in the workplace."

Rollcall on economic recovery budget

The House voted 229-196 on Mar. 23 for a budget resolution that would fund programs for economic recovery and help for recession victims.

On labor's scoreboard, right votes (R) were cast by 225 Democrats and 4 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 36 Democrats and 160 Republicans.

Numerals show congressional districts. PR — paired right; PW — paired wrong; A — absent and not paired.

Labor and Science

IF OUR SOCIETY is to start moving forward again and stop slipping backward, we need political leaders who can see beyond the next election and business leaders who can see beyond next year's earnings report.

We need to set long-term goals and allocate the resources required to meet those goals. When John F. Kennedy committed the nation to landing a man on the moon within a decade, the necessary material and human resources were applied, and the goal was achieved.

By this time, given the groundwork already laid, preparation for the systematic exploration of Mars should be well underway. Instead, because those now in authority see the unbridled marketplace as the sole source of human progress, that great scientific enterprise has been deferred.

Our inability to match resources with needs and goals is felt closer to home.

On the one hand, we see 12 million able and potentially productive workers desperately searching for jobs. On the other, we face the imminent collapse of much of the physical infrastructure that undergirds our national economic life.

Those who accept this waste of human resources because they find it preferable to government infringement on the free movement of the "invisible hand" of the marketplace lack not only compassion but the capability for scientific reasoning.

WHEN I WENT to school, laboratory experiments were not guided by invisible hands. One started out with a hypothesis and proceeded systematically to test it. One did not just mix a lot of chemicals together at random, without a plan, to see how they would interact—at least, not if the instructor was watching.

There is, however, a pseudo-scientific rationale for accepting the massive disengagement of human resources from our national needs. High unemployment, we are told, is the natural and inevitable product of the continuing scientific revolution.

In plainer English, we are becoming a hi-tech economy, and there simply isn't need for steel workers, auto workers, and other relics of the industrial age.

The American labor movement is not Luddite. We accept, indeed, we rejoice in the march of technology, for its promise of material abundance, more leisure, and less physical toil. We also accept the inevitability of structural changes in the composition of the work force—the rise of new occupations and the disappearance of others.

What we do object to is the notion that our political and social institutions should be the passive objects of technological change rather than the conscious masters of the process, and that the workers displaced by the process are disposable human beings.

THE SCIENTIFIC community bears a special responsibility to help devise the rational approaches necessary to keep our society democratic, alive and growing over the long haul. So does the American labor movement.

Between us there is a basis for cooperation. Rational approaches to social problems cannot be developed in isolated laboratories. Scientists need to be connected to the world of work—the factories, the offices, the mines, the rails, the roads, and the skies where our people earn their daily bread. Without such a connection, scientists cannot fully grasp the impact of their own labors on their fellow citizens.

The labor movement needs to be connected to the scientific community, so that we can better understand, and anticipate, what lies ahead in a world that is continuously remaking itself, for better or worse.

In a thousand ways we can see, the horizon is again expanding; the human race stands poised to make another giant step forward.

We may fail and fall back, and that has happened before. The aim of the American labor movement is to make sure that step is taken safely, and on schedule, and that nobody is left back on the far side.

—From an address by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at Columbia University's Conference on Science & Labor, Arden House, Harriman, N.Y., Mar. 18, 1983.

Washington Window

Banks claim large share of corporate tax loophole

By Press Associates, Inc.

As income tax time rolled around again, some things being said and done in Washington rubbed against the raw nerves of many hardworking taxpayers.

A few weeks ago, President Reagan startled his aides and reporters alike with an off-the-cuff proposal to eliminate corporate income tax. He said there "really isn't justification" for this tax on business profits.

Taxpayers received a second jolt from events on Capitol Hill, where first a jobs bill and then social security reform and jobless benefits extension legislation were held hostage to an unrelated tax amendment backed by the banking industry.

Banks and other financial institutions waged a multimillion dollar lobbying blitz aimed at repeal of a 1982 law requiring them to withhold 10 percent of interest and dividend income beginning this July. The law aims at recapturing more than $3 billion lost to the Treasury each year due to tax evasion by affluent recipients of stock dividend and interest income. The banks, of course, prefer to keep that money and earn more money on it.

A study by the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation showed that the nation's largest banks paid taxes of only 2.7 percent on domestic income in 1981.

Pays zero, gets refund

Six of the 20 banks studied actually collected tax refunds or credits against future liabilities. For example, Bank of America, the nation's second largest bank, had U.S. income of $154 million, but got a refund or tax credit of $18 million.

In urging Congress to reject "the banks' self-serving efforts to repeal withholding," the AFL-CIO noted that banks "pay a smaller percentage of income tax than does a working family of four that earns only $10,000 yearly."

But banks aren't the only corporations that manage to avoid paying their fair share by using complicated but legal loopholes written into the tax code.

The congressional study showed that while banks had the third-lowest tax rate among major industries, they were almost matched by crude oil producers, who paid $31 million on $966 million of domestic income in 1981.

When Reagan raised the idea of doing away with the corporate income tax, he may not have realized how far the tax system has moved in that direction in the past 30 years.

Tax-free profits

The corporate tax rate, 52 percent in 1953, now stands at 46 percent. But tax loopholes gradually have whittled that down to 35 percent for the average business. For the top Fortune 100 companies, it's down to 15 percent. And a few of these giants paid no taxes at all in some recent years.

The corporate share of the total tax burden has been plunging—from 30 percent in 1953 to 12.5 percent in 1980. Since Reagan took office, it has dropped to just over 6 percent despite last year's repeal of some of the tax giveaways to business enacted in 1981.

While corporations will pay more than $35 billion in taxes this year, an array of corporate tax preferences will excuse them from paying about $64 billion.

Thus, a recent Library of Congress study concluded that "the present set of tax rules is not much different from the effects of having no corporate tax at all."

Instead of being wiped off the books, the corporate tax needs to be strengthened. Loopholes should be plugged, especially for favored industries like banking and oil.

Tax breaks should be geared not to tax avoidance by the rich, but rather carefully targeted to help revitalize the industrial base and to bolster the nation's ability to compete internationally.

MEMO FROM COPE

Reagan Budget Budging Not —But It Sure Reveals a Lot

Chances are the Congress once again will spend a good part of the year thrashing around in the Great Budget Bog, before emerging—wet and angry—sometime next fall with a completed product.

What's happened so far is this: President Reagan and his numbers man, David Stockman, sent a budget up to Congress proposing further big gouges out of people-helping social programs and enormous increases in defense spending. It was heralded by the Administration, as usual, as a fairness budget.

House Democrats ignored the President's budget and adopted their own, which filled in some holes Reagan made in social programs, called for some added taxes on those who can comfortably pay more than they're paying, and included a deficit lower than Reagan's. House Republicans didn't even introduce the Reagan-Stockman version.

Budget matters go to the Senate next, where—since it is controlled by the GOP—the Reagan proposals will get more serious consideration, though nobody — including the President — expects his budget to prevail. Then, the House and Senate will battle their way to an eventual compromise.

Thus, the original Reagan budget for fiscal year 1984—it can be said—is budging not. Unlike 1981, he is not able to call all the shots. However, even though what comes out won't be what he put in, Reagan's proposal is worth a close look, mostly as another mountain of evidence that belies his continuing assurances that he and his Administration are knocking themselves out keeping that old "safety net" in place so's it'll protect needy people and working people.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research took a look and came up with revealing data on how deep Reagan would cut people-helping programs, if he had his way. Keep in mind, these proposed cuts are on top of deep slashes already made by previous Reagan budgets. (Descriptions are exclusive of any changes in the included categories as a result of separate legislation now before—or recently enacted by—the Congress.) By category:

Unemployment Comp

Proposed cut: $4.1 billion (result of Reagan-proposed 1981 legislation).

Applies to extended benefits program, which normally provides 13 weeks coverage beyond regular period of benefits, and was intended to protect long-term jobless (of which there have been more than at any time in 40 years).

This $4.1 billion comes on top of cuts of same size in 1982 and 1983.

Taxing Health Insurance

Proposed take-away: $2.3 billion.

Reagan seeks to penalize workers with tax as income on everything exceeding $2,100 per family and $840 per individual paid into employee health plan by employer. Reagan claims this would make workers more "cost conscious" (as if clients and not the health profession have boomed medical costs). What it would really do is reduce coverage for preventive care, out-patient diagnostic services and other important health needs—and have little effect on matters over which patients have no control.

Jobs and Training

Proposed cut: $400 million (on top of $2.1 billion in already-enacted slashes).

Series of programs affected which would eliminate nearly 60,000 jobs out of job-creating programs, on top of 340,000 jobs wiped out by 1982-83 budget cuts, jobs mostly for poor and disadvantaged workers.

Among programs at which Reagan takes aim: Federal aid to states for job training; summer youth jobs; special training for workers displaced by plant closings or relocations; Job Corps; employment for older Americans; job counseling and other services for persons under Aid to Families with Dependent Children program; special training for veterans, native Americans and migrant and seasonal farm workers; aid for workers displaced by imports.

Education (I)

Proposed cut: $767,822,000.

Reagan targets for complete elimination 35 programs administered by the Dept. of Education, among them a range of fellowships, library services, student incentive grants, various legal training programs.

Education (II)

Proposed cut: $1.7 billion.

Reagan proposed budget cuts strike hard at key education programs including those for the educationally disadvantaged; vocational and adult education; guaranteed student loans for higher education; various student aid programs; aid to communities whose school systems are impacted by children of federal employees; bilingual education.

Transportation

Proposed cut: $586 million.

Would affect water transportation, rails and mass transit, with aggregate job loss of 18,000.

(Funding from additional five-cent-a-gallon federal gas tax enacted by 1982 lame duck session of Congress is expected to provide $3.2 billion earmarked for highway and bridge construction and repair, and for mass transit. Mass transit gains would be neutralized under Reagan budget through separate proposed cuts.)

Urban Development, Housing

Proposed cut: $33.5 billion.

Major, big-money, programs would be gutted under Reagan budget: Economic Development Administration; urban development action grants; publicly-assisted housing ($27.1 billion right there); rural housing; waste treatment plant construction grants. Job losses as result of such program cuts, cumulative under Reagan budgets 1982-84, would add up to 866,000.

The Needy

Proposed cut: $6.1 billion.

The safety-net-that-isn't-there-anyway would suffer further shredding. Reagan proposals come down hard on programs that in aggregate already have taken $20 billion in cuts. These include Aid to Families with Dependent Children; food stamps; child nutrition; Medicare/Medicaid; services to the elderly; child care; various other social services.

Federal Employees

Proposed cut: $8.1 billion.

Reagan demands freeze on federal employee pay, cuts in civil service retirement benefits and in compensation for government workers or their survivors for job-related injuries, drastic cutback of support for postal service.

Repeat: The Reagan budget will not be enacted as proposed. What finally will be enacted is anybody's guess—but it will be more generous in spirit and in fact to workers and the needy than the Administration's version.

The Reagan budget didn't lose out when the House recently passed the Democratic alternative. It lost out long before that—on Nov. 2, 1982, when voters took away Reagan's ideological control of the House and shook up his Senate troops. Voters turned Congress away from the Administration's Scrooge routine. Maybe in November 1984 the turn-around will be completed.

Reminder for Reagan

"Our greatest primary task is to put people to work. This is no unsolvable problem if we face it wisely and courageously. It can be accomplished in part by direct recruiting by the government itself, treating the task as we would treat the emergency of war, but at the same time, through this employment, accomplishing greatly needed projects to stimulate and reorganize the use of our natural resources."

—Franklin D. Roosevelt, first inaugural address

Which Party Is Deficit Champ?

Quick . . . which political party do you think of when you hear the word "deficit?"

Be honest. You thought "Democratic Party," didn't you? Haven't the Republicans been telling you right along the Democrats are the party of deficits? They wouldn't fib to us, would they?

Seems they would. The following chart prepared by the U.S. House Committee on the Budget lists the 10 largest deficits (and projected deficits) in our history and the President in office at the time. In order:

Rank	Fiscal Year	Deficit (Billions $)	President
1	1983	207.7	Reagan (R)
2	1985	194.2	Reagan (R)
3	1984	188.8	Reagan (R)
4	1986	147.7	Reagan (R)
5	1982	110.6	Reagan (R)
6	1976	66.4	Ford (R)
7	1980	59.6	Carter (D)
8	1981	57.9	Carter (D)
9	1943*	54.9	Roosevelt (D)
10	1978	48.8	Carter (D)

 World War II year*

If you figure it's not fair to compare deficits in absolute dollars because of big changes in the economy over 50 years, then look at the deficit as a percent of gross national product (with exception of World War II years, when abnormally high percent of GNP was devoted to war effort). Similar result.

Rank	Fiscal Year	Percent of GNP	President
1	1983	6.5	Reagan (R)
2	1984	5.4	Reagan (R)
3	1985	5.1	Reagan (R)
4	1976	4.1	Ford (R)
5	1982	3.7	Reagan (R)
6	1986	3.6	Reagan (R)
7	1975	3.1	Ford (R)
8	1968	3.0	Johnson (D)
9	1959	2.7	Eisenhower (R)
10	1977	2.4	Ford (R)

The deficit champs? Hands down—The Republicans.

It Pays to Leave No Stone Unturned

It turns out an important element in last November's victory for Republican George Deukmejian over Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley in the California gubernatorial election was the state GOP's determination to leave no stone unturned.

The turned stone that helped turn the election was absentee ballots. The state GOP spent $350,000 two months before the election to mail packets to 2.6 million households with at least one registered Republican in them. The packets included an absentee ballot application that the voter could fill out and mail back to GOP headquarters in a postage-paid envelope.

More than 100,000 party supporters responded. The party mailed or hand-delivered completed applications to the appropriate election boards which then sent absentee ballots to applicants.

In the balloting done election day at regular polling places, Bradley ran up a statewide edge of nearly 20,000 votes. But Deukmejian won 113,231 more absentee votes than Bradley, wiping out the 20,000 Bradley margin and winning by 93,000. The GOP absentee ballot strategy made the difference.

The irony is that a law enacted by a Democratic-controlled legislature in 1978 made possible the GOP victory in 1982. That law eliminated a requirement that to get an absentee ballot, a voter must submit a letter stating a valid reason why he or she can not appear at the polling place on election day.

Reagan retreat on rights scored

Jobs, election issues set regional meeting theme

Myrtle Beach, S.C. — The problems posed for workers and their unions by the Reagan Recession and the chance to turn things around in the 1984 election were central themes at the first regional AFL-CIO conference in this year's series.

Some 300 leaders from seven southeastern states met here for a "rap session" with federation officers and staff on the issues facing labor in the next two years.

"There are critical issues that need to be addressed through national executive and legislative action," Federation President Lane Kirkland said at a news conference.

First priority

"Among them, of course, are the number one issue of providing job opportunities for the people of this country, reversing the steady decline of job opportunities and of our employment base, addressing the serious problem of unfair competition based upon the exploitation of workers at subhuman wages overseas, and the deliberate targeting of this great American market by predatory competitors abroad."

Throughout the three-day meeting, delegates participated in 14 workshops covering a range of issues from social security and political education to legislation, communications, organization, and community rights.

This is the third straight year the AFL-CIO has held the conferences, six more of which are on the 1983 schedule. Kirkland has described their purpose as "designed to produce a free flow of ideas, opinions and evaluations of labor's program" among trade union leaders at all levels.

Trade unionists from six southwestern states—Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming—will convene for the next regional conference in Albuquerque, N.M., Apr. 11-13. From Apr. 13-15, western states labor representatives will meet in Los Angeles. Later in April, similar conferences are scheduled in St. Paul, Minn., and Niagara Falls, N.Y.

The theme of this year's conferences is "Put America to Work for a Change," representing labor's top goal of finding jobs for the millions of workers put out of work by the Reagan Recession.

Plans also are being developed at the conferences for the observance of Solidarity Day III with at least one major union rally in each of the 50 states on Labor Day 1983. The first Solidarity Day, Sept. 19, 1981, brought more than 400,000 people to the nation's capital. Solidarity II focused on the election turnout in 1982.

New federal contract rules weaken affirmative action

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO sharply criticized the Reagan Administration's decision to go ahead with rule changes that will drastically weaken affirmative action requirements for contractors who do business with the federal government.

Condemning the watered-down rules that the Labor Dept. said it will soon issue for its Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs, the AFL-CIO called on the Administration "to put aside these proposed changes and vigorously support the present requirements."

The Labor Dept. said the new regulations will be similar to earlier proposals floated in 1981 and again in 1982, but twice put on hold in the wake of criticism from labor, Hispanic, black and women's organizations. Once they are issued, the new rules would have the force of law.

The AFL-CIO statement stressed that the labor movement has been "dismayed" at continuing Reagan Administration attempts "to dismantle social, education and equal employment opportunity programs designed to give minorities, women and the disadvantaged an opportunity to function as full and equal participants in the workplace."

Enforcement support

The AFL-CIO has supported strong enforcement of all equal employment opportunity laws, and in particular the regulations used by OFCCP to prohibit discriminatory practices by government contractors, the statement said.

The proposed new regulations will exempt large numbers of contractors from compliance with affirmative action requirements, sharply reduce requirements on employment of women and minorities, and make it much harder for workers and their unions to file discrimination complaints and sue for back pay as a remedy.

The need for affirmative action programs has not disappeared, and the damage caused by "generations of discrimination" still exists, the AFL-CIO said.

"Equal access to the hiring office, an equal chance to stand in line and an equal chance to fill out job application forms are not enough," the statement emphasized.

The federation called on the Reagan Administration to stop the "backsliding" on 40 years of progress—under both Democratic and Republican administrations—in programs meant to stop discrimination by contractors paid with federal funds.

In spite of the strong protests against the two earlier proposals for rule changes, the Labor Dept. said its latest proposal, due out in May, will have only "technical" differences.

A copy of the regulations obtained by the New York Times indicates that the new rules will no longer allow the government to seek back pay for classes of people that have suffered from discrimination.

Jobless toll points up lag in recovery

By James M. Shevis

Government statistics showing unemployment little changed at 10.3 percent in March offer ample evidence that the modest economic recovery is not helping the massive number of jobless Americans, the AFL-CIO declared in calling on Congress for more aid to put the nation back to work.

"Congress must give first priority to broader jobs and public assistance programs to follow the first-step recovery legislation already passed," the federation said. A $4.65-billion emergency appropriation to fund some 400,000 year-long public service and construction jobs cleared Congress last month. A second-phase jobs bill is under consideration.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report on March unemployment showed 11,381,000 people looking for work but unable to find jobs. This was a decline of 109,000 since February. The total civilian employment in March rose to 99,103,000, up by 40,000.

Agrees not to solicit

Union-buster takes down shingle

By David L. Perlman

From now on, union-busting companies will have to seek out the services of management consultant Rayford T. Blankenship. He's promised, in a consent order settling a suit brought by Local 87 of the Laborers, to stop hustling business as a specialist in getting unions decertified.

There's a good-sized file on Blankenship in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services. It includes NLRB documents dealing with illegal interrogation of workers, firings of union supporters and a host of unfair labor practice charges. His base has been Indiana and employers have hired him in campaigns involving the Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Clothing & Textile Workers, Teamsters, Food & Commercial Workers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, State, County & Municipal Employees, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Service Employees.

In the case involving Local 87, Mark Twain Marine Industries at West Frankfurt, Ill., hired Blankenship three months before the expiration of a contract. His assignment, the suit charged, was to foster anti-union sentiment and break off the collective bargaining relationship.

Company pays twice

The union blames Blankenship for the strike that resulted. And the company ended up paying $200,000 in back pay stemming from its unfair labor practices.

In the end, the union and company patched up a bargaining relationship, as management and Blankenship had a falling out involving charges and countercharges that helped form the basis for the Local 87 lawsuit.

Blankenship said the company hired him to "unseat and decertify" Local 87 and still owed him money for his services as a "labor relations expert."

The company said Blankenship had falsely claimed to be a lawyer and it had already paid him $18,000 for alleged "legal services."

The consent decree directs that Blankenship "shall not induce any employer to violate or repudiate its collective bargaining agreement with a labor organization representing ts employees."

It said Blankenship may accept employment "if so offered" in a legally instituted decertification election but "shall not solicit such employment." He is barred from soliciting work as a consultant in decertification proceedings.

And he can no longer hold himself out to be a lawyer.

Harley cycle workers hail higher tariffs

The Allied Industrial Workers and the Machinists welcomed President Reagan's order levying higher tariffs on large imported motorcycles in a move to grant temporary relief to America's only remaining motorcycle manufacturer, Harley-Davidson Motor Co.

The action followed the recommendations of the International Trade Commission made in January after the ITC found Harley-Davidson had been severely injured by imports from four Japanese companies—Honda, Kawasaki, Suzuki and Yamaha. In 1982, Japan accounted for 80 percent of the 170,000 imported heavyweight motorcycle units.

Five-year plan

The order will raise the tariff rate on motorcycles with engine displacements above 700 cubic centimeters from the present 4.4 percent to 49.4 percent for the first year. The rate will return to the 4.4 percent level after five years. The rate will be 39.4 percent in the second year, 24.4 percent in the third, 19.4 percent in the fourth and 14.4 percent in the fifth year.

A concentrated effort by the AIW and the IAM helped precipitate the tariff order. AIW Milwaukee Local 209 President Jerry Knackert described the effort at a press conference Apr. 1: "We wrote letters, we submitted testimony to the ITC and we actively went out and helped with petitions which were submitted to the White House. The 2½-foot-high stack of petitions contained more than 54,000 names."

The tariff order was made under the "escape clause" of the international General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade, which permits tariff help for industries severely hurt by import penetration. Harley-Davidson had warned the ITC that without such relief it might have to shut down. Nearly 40 percent of the workforce has been laid off in recent years. The AIW said its membership dropped from 2,000 to just 500 at the company's Milwaukee engine plant. Similar layoffs have occurred in plants at York, Pa., Tomahawk, Wis., and Hayward, Calif.

Foreign components

The tariff action does not affect the largest single market for motorcycles, recreational vehicles under 400 cubic centimeters, and does not apply to the U.S. plants of Honda of Ohio and Kawasaki of Nebraska where imported engines and power trains are used in the production of motorcycles.

The order permits West Germany to ship 5,000 heavyweight motorcycles to the United States the first year at regular duties. The import limit will increase to 6,000, 7,000, 8,500 and 10,000 in the four subsequent years.

The first 4,000 Triumph motorcycles from Britain and Ducatis from Italy are exempted from the additional duties, while the first 6,000 units from Japan are also exempt the first year. Those limits will escalate by 1,000 units yearly for five years.

Maritime Trades back cargo quota measure

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. has endorsed a bill that could create thousands of jobs in the industry by requiring that a percentage of all U.S. exports and imports be carried in American-built, American-flag ships.

MTD President Frank Drozak, president of the Seafarers, said the measure recently introduced in the House will help develop an American-flag bulk shipping capability as well as a "badly needed transportation asset" to the national defense.

The MTD said the bill, known as the Competitive Shipbuilding & Shipping Act, would require that 5 percent of all waterborne bulk cargoes in U.S. foreign trade be carried on U.S.-flag ships, beginning in 1984. This percentage would go up by 1 percent a year until a minimum of 20 percent of all U.S. bulk tonnage is shipped on American-built, American-flag fleets by 1999.

Health care for jobless

St. Paul, Minn.—Long-term jobless workers and their families will receive free medical care under a 12-week demonstration project arranged by the Minnesota AFL-CIO with the SHARE Health Plan, a local unionized health maintenance organization.

Beginning Apr. 14, SHARE's St. Paul clinic will be open three hours each Thursday evening to provide treatment to workers unemployed at least six months who are ineligible for welfare and are not covered by group health insurance, State AFL-CIO President David Roe said.

He noted that many workers who lose their jobs or are laid off for extended periods, cannot afford the premiums for group health insurance and the cost of individual plans is almost always prohibitive.

Dr. Larry Kaplan, project director for SHARE, said the volunteer services of doctors, nurse practitioners, registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, laboratory technicians and clerical staff are valued at $2,000 per session, and SHARE will cover the estimated $150 in clinic expenses per session.

Treatment will not cover X-rays or medications unless SHARE is able to obtain grants to cover those costs, Roe said.

He pointed out that many of the 95,000 jobless in the nine-county metropolitan area have lost basic health care insurance. The state federation has set up a phone bank to schedule appointments. Senior citizens, nurses, employed and unemployed union members have volunteered to help.

Tobey Lappako, the state labor federation's consumer affairs director, said a statewide health project for unemployed workers is being explored.

Media panel faults Forbes for unfair dig at AFL-CIO

The National News Council upheld an AFL-CIO complaint and said Forbes magazine was wrong in a story about federation finances.

The business news publication also denied the AFL-CIO "a minimal act of fairness" when it refused to set the record straight by publishing a correction or a letter to the editor.

The finding was a response to a complaint filed by AFL-CIO Information Director Murray Seeger last December after the editors of Forbes magazine ignored his rebuttal. The National News Council is an independent body of media and public representatives that considers complaints of inaccurate or unfair news coverage.

The AFL-CIO's protest was based on an article that suggested unions didn't like Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan because he cut off federal grants to unions for job training or for studies.

"Donovan aides say privately that the AFL-CIO has had to raise its annual membership tax $15 million a year to make up for lost government cash," the most offensive of the assertions read.

Anonymous accusation

Seeger told the council that the magazine's editors "printed this accusation from an anonymous spokesman without asking the AFL-CIO for confirmation," the magazine had not even acknowledged two letters from the AFL-CIO seeking a correction, and a follow-up telephone call had brought no results.

The letter the magazine ignored noted that the dues increase (which was actually less than the figure quoted) had been adopted in open convention for purposes that were discussed on the convention floor and reported at the time in the news media. These included funding for the new Labor Institute of Public Affairs, reaffiliation of the AFL-CIO with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and establishment of the George Meany Library and Archives, among others.

No federal funds

"The dues increase did not replace any government income since the AFL-CIO does not receive any cash from the government," Seeger's letter stressed.

Labor Dept. contracts, primarily to the federation's Human Resources Development Institute involving job training for minority youth and the unemployed, are kept completely separate from other AFL-CIO functions and are subject to federal audit.

Any commingling of funds would be illegal as well as strictly against AFL-CIO policy, the federation stressed.

The National News Council noted confirmation by the Labor Dept. grants to the AFL-CIO or its affiliates are for specific purposes and cannot be used for general overhead or regular union services.

Unfactual

The council concluded that the statement dealing with the cause of the AFL-CIO per capita increase "has no discernible foundation in fact."

It rejected the magazine's claim that the AFL-CIO's protest was mere "hair-splitting." The National News Council report concluded:

"To the federation, there was nothing trivial about the flat assertion that it had put through its dues increase to make up for lost government cash when both practice and law forbade any use of federal funds to finance standard union activities.

Under these circumstances, publication of a letter to the editor by Forbes was in order as a minimal act of fairness."

Ludlum pact follows line of steel pattern

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers local union presidents approved a new agreement with Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp. that links a temporary wage cut to a company pledge to put the savings into improving its plants.

The new terms, which take effect immediately, call for a wage cut of 50 cents an hour that will be restored in three steps by the October 1986 expiration date.

The company also agreed to put 25 cents an hour starting next year into individual retirement accounts for employees.

The agreement covers 5,400 workers at five Allegheny Ludlum plants in Pennsylvania, Delaware and Connecticut. It replaces a contract that was to expire Aug. 1.

Under the wage provisions, the 50 cent cut will be put back in steps of 18 cents an hour in April 1984, 14 cents in April 1985 and 18 cents in April 1986.

Other provisions of the agreement with Allegheny Ludlum follow the pattern set in contracts signed in February by the Steelworkers and seven other major steel companies.

Bargaining ploy

Allegheny Ludlum was originally part of that round of bargaining, but it dropped out in early February in a move the union said was an attempt to negotiate bigger concessions. The basic industry agreement calls for a cut of $1.25 an hour, to be restored over the life of the contract.

The USWA said it was able to negotiate a smaller wage cut with Allegheny Ludlum because the company, although hurt by an industry-wide depression and competition from imports, reported profits last year while others posted record losses.

In another difference from the basic agreement, no new supplemental unemployment benefits were negotiated with Allegheny Ludlum as they were with the seven other major companies.

The contract also provides an early retirement incentive through a pension supplement of $400 per month for one year or until a worker reaches age 62. Eligible workers must be at least 60 and have a minimum of 30 years of service.

Rules on contracting-out of work were tightened, and the company also agreed to put money saved from the temporary wage cuts into safety and health programs.

Court orders release of data by 'double-breasted' builders

New Orleans—The Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered 10 New Orleans construction firms to furnish the Carpenters information regarding their possible use of "double-breasted" operations to evade contract obligations to employ only union labor.

A double-breasted operation in the trade refers to a contractor who operates two corporations, one to bid on jobs employing union craftsmen only, the other to compete for jobs using nonunion workers. In a 1980 unfair labor practice charge filed with the National Labor Relations Board, the union's District Council of New Orleans contended that double-breasted operations by the 10 firms, all members of the Associated General Contractors, violated the clause in its collective bargaining agreement recognizing the union as the exclusive representative of each employer's carpenters.

In upholding an NLRB order requiring the 10 AGC members to give the union information regarding their relationship with nonunion companies, two of the three appellate judges who heard the case held that the contractors violated their obligation under the Taft-Hartley Act to bargain in good faith. They said the union's request for answers to 13 questions submitted to the firms during 1980 contract renewal talks was relevant to the negotiations and administration of the collective bargaining agreement.

Judge Thomas M. Reavley said "the type of information sought by the union would assist it in confirming its suspicions and thereby allow it to make an informed choice whether to pursue legal means by which it could hold the nonunion companies to the terms of the collective bargaining agreements involved."

Prior to the request for information, the union had said it had evidence that at least three of the 10 contractors operated counterpart companies in order to compete for nonunion jobs. When it sent out letters to each firm asking whether any maintained a double-breasted operation, none replied.

Binding precedent

Under Fifth Circuit precedent, the nonunion counterpart of a double-breasted union contractor can be held to the terms of a union contract on the theory that the two companies really constitute a single employer.

The court rejected the contractors' argument that the requested information was irrelevant because the union already knew that two contractors in the New Orleans area — Perrilliet-Rickey and Pratt-Farnsworth — had created nonunion counterparts.

Reavley held that whatever information the union had regarding the two firms could not answer its suspicions about the other employers who had signed union contracts.

Members to vote

Printing trade unions aim for July 1 merger

By Arlee C. Green

The Graphic Arts International Union and the International Printing & Graphic Communications Union will merge July 1 if members of the two AFL-CIO affiliates approve a merger agreement.

The proposed merger has the unanimous approval of the two unions' governing bodies—GAIU's international council and IP&GCU's board of directors. The new union, with a membership of more than 200,000 workers, would be called the Graphic Communications International Union and operate out of GAIU headquarters in Washington.

Ballots on the proposed merger and new constitution will be mailed to members of the two unions Apr. 27 and the votes will be tallied on June 8.

Under the plan approved by the two governing boards, a nine-year transition or 'lock-up' period will facilitate the phased reduction of the merged union's general board from 48 positions on July 1, 1983, to 22 members by 1992. The final mix will include 10 officers and 12 regional members The general board will be the union's policy-making body between conventions. Day-to-day operations will be the responsibility of an executive board of union officers.

On July 1, 1983, if merger is approved, GAIU President Kenneth J. Brown will become president of the merged union and IP&GCU President Sol Fishko president emeritus.

IP&GCU Sec.-Treas. Michael P. McNally will retain that position in the new union, while GAIU Sec.-Treas James J. Norton will become financial/recording secretary. Eugene M. Boerner, GAIU executive vice president, will retain his position until his retirement, expected prior to the election of new officers in the spring of 1984. Boerner's office will be eliminated then and the newly elected officers sworn in June 1, 1984.

The new union's first convention will be in the fall of 1984 in Hollywood, Fla.

Regional meetings

Officers of the two unions have begun a series of regional meetings to detail the merger and new constitution to the members in local unions.

Both unions are themselves the product of mergers. The GAIU was formed from two mergers. The Amalgamated Lithographers of America and the International Photo Engravers Union combined in 1964 into the Lithographers & Photoengravers International Union, which merged in 1972 with the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders to form GAIU.

The IP&GCU was formed from the merger of the International Printing Pressmen & Assistants Union and the Stereotypers & Electrotypers Union in 1973.

A statement from the two unions said the forthcoming merger "will bring to an end 75 years of jurisdictional conflict . . . and permit the two international unions to consolidate their resources and broaden the base of representation, thus enabling the GCIU to better represent its members in this dramatically changing industry."

Congress urged to clamp lid on natural gas cost

Consumers face sharply increased natural gas prices if Congress allows the Reagan Administration to go ahead with deregulation plans, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned in letters to House members.

Denison urged support for the Natural Gas Consumer Relief bill introduced by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) with numerous co-sponsors.

It would roll back price ceilings to 1982 levels, limit "take-or-pay" contracts that push up the pipeline cost of gas, and extend control on "new" natural gas production to 1987.

The Administration's plan for total deregulation of all natural gas "will result in enormous profits to gas producers and sharply higher gas bills for consumers," Denison charged.

He pointed out also that existing law will also push up gas prices, although not quite as rapidly, because of its phased deregulation timetable.

The answer is a re-establishment of controls for the protection of consumers "in an industry in which there is no vestige of a free market," Denison urged.

King remembrance

Memphis trade unionists joined in the 15th anniversary observance of the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. on Apr. 4. They marched from the Clayborn Temple Church, where King gave one of his last speeches, to the Lorraine Motel, where he was shot to death while standing on the balcony. Participating unions included the State, County & Municipal Employees, Steelworkers, Rubber Workers, Furniture Workers, Office & Professional Employees and Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. King was slain during a visit to Memphis to rally striking AFSCME sanitation workers. AFSCME President Gerald McEntee told the crowd that the union "is dedicated to the principles and doctrine of that man who fell 15 years ago today."

APRI board explores issues facing blacks in '84 election

The legitimate role of government in the nation's life and the Reagan Administration's economic policy failures will be central issues in the 1984 elections, pollster Peter Hart told the national board of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Hart, public opinion poll-taker for Democratic Party candidates, predicted that the presidential election campaign will focus on five basic themes:

- The electorate's desire for "an end to special interest government" and the Reagan Administration's failure to understand "the difference between the public interest and the interests of corporations."
- The difference between "the rhetoric and the reality of this Administration."
- The difference between the two major parties on the issue of fairness in taxation and social policy.
- The public's desire for fair play for minorities and the poor.
- The capacity of a Democratic candidate to put forward a "realistic and comprehensive agenda" based on "constructive solutions."

Hart said prospects for Democratic electoral success are good for 1984, particularly in light of President Reagan's current 60 percent negative rating in public opinion polls. That rating, Hart noted, is much more negative among black voters.

Decisive role

Eddie Williams, president of the Joint Center for Political Studies, echoed Hart's remarks about black dissatisfaction with the Administration. He stressed that "blacks constitute one of the most important voting blocs in the contemporary political environment" and will play a decisive role in the fate of any Democratic candidate for President.

"Black turnout was unusually high in 1982," Williams noted, and he predicted that this pattern is likely to be repeated in 1984. "Black voter registration is increasing," he said, and "will increase even more as blacks react further to Reaganomics."

In William's view, the black vote will be crucial to the 1984 elections, particularly in the South where, he said, "the 1984 presidential election will be won or lost."

In response to questions about a possible black Democratic Party candidacy, Williams said such a candidacy could "fragment rather than unite black political leaders" and might "intensify racial polarization of the electorate."

The Hart and Williams presentations were part of day-long deliberations by some forty APRI national board members at their annual meeting, held this year in Washington. The board discussed the implications of the Chicago and Philadelphia mayoral races for the coalition of blacks, Hispanics and workers.

Future plans

It also heard a detailed report from APRI President Norman Hill, who analyzed the implications for blacks of labor's economic and political program. Hill outlined the institute's plans for regional and national educational conferences, plans for APRI's commemoration of the 20th anniversary of A. Philip Randolph's March on Washington for Freedom and Jobs, and plans for APRI's role in mobilizing black community support for Solidarity Day III next Labor Day.

Among other participants in the board meeting were APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin; Treasurer Albert Shanker; AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Frederick O'Neal, J. C. Turner and Barbara Hutchinson; Amalgamated Transit Union President John Rowland; Laborers' Vice President Robert Powell; AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard and COPE Director John Perkins.

Revenue-sharing extension pressed

Extension of the federal revenue-sharing program is urgently needed to keep states and localities from sinking into insolvency, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Calling for enactment of a bill to reauthorize the program for another five years, Assistant Director Arnold Cantor of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research told a Senate Finance subcommittee that cities and states face a severe financial crunch because of the Reagan recession, revenue shortfalls, high interest rates, competing tax-exempt financial instruments, inadequate tax structures, and critical spending needs.

"The fiscal problems facing states and localities—in large measure the result of Reagan's unfair economic program—have reached crisis proportions," Cantor said in testimony submitted to the Subcommittee on Economic Growth, Employment & Revenue Sharing, chaired by Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.).

Funding need

This fiscal distress at both the state and local levels "demonstrates the urgent need for the limited fiscal assistance provided by the federal revenue sharing programs," Cantor said.

The revenue-sharing program is scheduled to expire on Sept. 30. The measure favored by the AFL-CIO as the most consistent with its own approach to the issue is Heinz's proposed State & Local Assistance Act, which would extend the program five years, increase funding, and make states again eligible for revenue-sharing. States were made ineligible in 1980.

Cantor said that the financial difficulties plaguing states and localities have been exacerbated by the recession, which has put millions of workers out of jobs since it began in July 1981. High unemployment translates into lost revenue as sales, profits, incomes, and property values are lower than would otherwise be the case.

Adverse impact

"Thus, both revenues and outlays have been, and will continue to be, adversely affected by the massive addition to the unemployment rolls that this Administration has caused through its misguided and inequitable economic program," he said.

Another squeeze on local budgets has been high interest rates, which have affected the ability of states and areas to meet investment needs, he observed.

In the past two years, yields on high-grade municipal bonds averaged 11.23 and 11.57 percent, respectively, he noted. This compares with a range of 5 to 6.5 percent that prevailed throughout the 1970s. As a result of these inordinately high rates, he said, municipalities in 1981 paid almost $200 million more in interest for their $33 billion in long-term borrowing than they would have during the 1970s. In addition, a congressional Joint Economic Committee found tha tduring 1981, 59 long-term bond issues—a total of $570 million in borrowing—were canceled or postponed due to high interest rates.

Huge cuts in the federal budget have meant fewer federal grants-in-aid to states and municipalities. In fiscal 1982, the amount totaled $88.2 billion, a drop of more than $6.5 billion from the year before. As a result of the federal cuts, states and localities lost approximately 3 percent of their budgets, Cantor said.

In the past, states often were able to assist localities experiencing fiscal problems. Now the states are in an equally distressed financial condition, Cantor pointed out, and necessary levels of state assistance to localities are not possible or likely.

User fees

To compensate for the large reductions in federal aid, local governments have had to add or increase fees for public services, raise local taxes, and cut programs. In 1981, the JEC study showed, user fees grew faster than any other source of urban revenue and property taxes rose by an average of 10 percent for all cities.

User fees and tax increases have been regressive, adding to the burden of lower and moderate income persons, Cantor observed.

Cantor urged Congress to use the federal revenue sharing program as a framework for extending federal minimum wage and overtime standards to state and local governments.

High court bars crackdown on union officers

An employer can't punish a union officer more severely than a rank-and-file worker for mere participation in an unauthorized work stoppage, the Supreme Court ruled.

Its unanimous decision also made clear that any special obligation imposed on a union officer in connection with a no-strike clause must be clearly spelled out in the contract.

The outcome of the case supported the position taken by the National Labor Relations Board, the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals and the AFL-CIO. The federation joined with Local 563 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in a joint brief to the Supreme Court.

The case that reached the Supreme Court had its origins in a 1977 episode during construction of a nuclear generating plant on Pennsylvania's Three Mile Island. The IBEW members balked at crossing an informational picket line put up by a local of the Operating Engineers.

When the line was withdrawn and they returned to work, the Metropolitan Edison Co. imposed five-to-10-day disciplinary suspensions on all but two IBEW members. The two, who were officers of the local, were given 25-day suspensions and warned of dismissal for any future offense.

Special duty

The company claimed that union officers had a special duty to obey and help enforce the no-strike provision, even though the contract did not spell out specific obligations of union officers. Management also cited two arbitration decisions from previous years.

But the Supreme Court agreed with the NLRB that tougher penalties for union officers amounts to illegal discrimination because of union status. Any interpretation to the contrary must be based on "clear and unmistakable" contract language, the court said, and an arbitration decision based on a previous contract isn't a substitute.

The union brief noted that an employer has legal recourse against a union for violation of a contract, but may not interfere with the freedom of workers to select their own representatives.

It pointed out that an employer ordinarily would have no legitimate means of influencing the actions of a union officer who is a full-time official of the union or is employed by another company. It is up to the union and its members, not to management, to judge a union officer's obligation to enforce the contract, the brief stressed.

The trade union position was also upheld in a 6-3 Supreme Court decision rejecting an attempt to use the state courts to pursue a case that comes within NLRB jurisdiction.

An equipment supervisor who had been fired by the Georgia Power Co. after one week on the job brought a damage suit in state court against a local of the Operating Engineers and other defendants.

He claimed that the union had "coerced" the company into firing him because four years previously he had dropped his membership and gone to work for a non-union company.

No coercion

Earlier, he had made the same allegation in an unfair labor practice charge to the NLRB. But the NLRB regional director, after investigating the charge, found "no evidence" of the claimed coercion by the union and refused to issue a complaint.

Justice Byron R. White, writing for the Supreme Court majority, noted that the cause of action brought in state court was "identical" to the charge made under the National Labor Relations Act, which the NLRB rejected on the ground that "the union was not at fault."

Justice William H. Rehnquist, in dissent, said that the question was "a close one" but there were enough factors not bearing directly on federal labor law to justify consideration in state courts.

Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts leads 1,750 special convention delegates in discussion of long-term job security goals.

CWA convention explores future goals on job security

Philadelphia—A special convention of the Communications Workers adopted a series of long-term strategies focusing on job security through retraining and worker mobility.

Some 1,750 delegates took part in CWA's Committee on the Future convention, which was a year and a half in the planning.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts said the two-day convention made clear "that the challenge to CWA over the coming decade is, above all, to provide for our present and future members with employment security." What is called for, he added, is "nothing less than the renewal of our union."

The committee's 234-page report declared that "the key to employment security is through training and retraining, so that we can ride the crest of the wave of technological change. To do this, we must be able to gain access to the funds of employers and government, for we cannot do the job alone."

New initiatives

The committee called for new initiatives in bargaining, political action, joint consultation and public relations.

The convention adopted 12 resolutions, many of which would move the union toward a more aggressive bargaining and organizing position.

Delegates approved the creation of "strategy centers," which would attempt to link bargaining, organizing, political action, education and other activities.

For example, one strategy center is designed to cover the new American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and other corporations in the information industry. An estimated 240,000 workers would be affected. Another would cover the 306,000 CWA members in the emerging Bell operating companies.

Still another strategy center would cover the union's growing public worker constituency, currently numbering 60,000. Delegates created the post of public national director, with a seat on the CWA executive board.

Strategic planning

The convention proposed the establishment of a strategic planning and budget committee that would coordinate union strategy, administration and finances.

The resolution on bargaining strategy would move CWA toward initiatives in training and retraining, career redevelopment, job design and joint problem-solving with management.

A new bargaining goal would provide retraining for members already adversely affected by restructuring of the industry and new technology as well as those seeking a job change. "To be mobile is the key to employment security in the information industry, and that means being versatile," the committee report said.

The convention also called for closer cooperation with management to reduce the heavy grievance load. "The grievance load is getting far too costly for both sides in both time and money," the report noted.

New federal contract rules denounced as rights retreat

Back pay remedies would be sought only for "identifiable victims" of discrimination.

The new proposals would also bar the OFCCP from investigating any discriminatory practice that occurred more than two years before a complaint was initiated. Back pay awards could not exceed two years, instead of the present three-year maximum.

The rules also would drop the current requirement of a "pre-award review of an employer's compliance with equal employment and affirmative action standards before a contract is handed out.

Existing rules require contractors with 50 employees or more and government contracts of $50,000 and up to submit plans showing how they intend to put affirmative action and equal employment policies into practice.

Under the Reagan Administration's new rules, only companies with 100 or more employees and $100,000 or more in federal contracts would have to file plans.

Also under the new rules, employers would be "presumed" to have done the best they could to hire women and minorities if their employment rate in specific jobs is at least 80 percent of their availability in a geographic area. Beyond that point, no contractor would have to explain why minorities and women were being underutilized or to set hiring goals.

Hiring ratios

Current rules require contractors to strive to hire women and minorities at ratios equal to their availability.

The AFL-CIO also expressed concern over the Administration's characterization of hiring goals in its new rules as "targets" only, and over its statement that no contractor will be found to have violated hiring obligations just because those "targets" have not been met.

Current rules also require construction contractors to make a good faith effort to fill at least 6.9 percent of each job class or trade with women. The new rules would apply the 6.9 percent formula to the contractor's total workforce.

The AFL-CIO has asserted that such a change would only foster the continued concentration of women in low-level, low-paying jobs.

The new rules also will make it harder for unions or other organizations or groups of workers who are afraid they will be fired if they file complaints themselves. Current rules allow such class action suits, but the Reagan Administration regulations would allow complaints only if "all known victims" of the alleged discriminatory practice are named.

In its statement, the AFL-CIO stressed that organized labor will continue to work with civil rights, women's and other community groups "to stop the diluting of equal employment opportunity and affirmative action programs."

Jean McKee appointed to mediation agency post

Jean McKee, director of government relations for the General Mills Restaurant Group, has been named to the new position of executive director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service by FMCS Director Kay McMurray.

McKee, 53, worked in President Reagan's 1980 election campaign in Connecticut. Earlier, she was a public affairs consultant and served on the staff of former Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.).

Struck company cited for violation of state safety law

Indianapolis—The Indiana Desk Co., which padlocked its plant doors and boarded up windows after 172 members of Furniture Workers Local 334-236 went on strike a year ago, was cited for violating state safety and health regulations. Inspectors found 13 exits still padlocked, creating a serious hazard in the event of a plant fire or explosion.

The company was also fined for failing to correct a safety violation found a year earlier, when it was cited for 10 safety infractions—many of them serious, repeat violations, the UFWA said.

A fine of $1,000 for failing to guard an exposed radial saw blade was reduced by $200 for the company's "good faith" intentions.

However, UFWA President Carl Scarbrough questioned the company's intentions, "since the abatement period has been exceeded by 298 days."

Scarbrough said he was more concerned by the company's action to barricade the plant—causing "hazards to both our members and to the strikebreakers now inside the plant."

The National Labor Relations Board last November found that the company caused the strike by making unreasonable bargaining demands and prolonged it by failing to bargain in good faith, the union said.

The NLRB told the company to recall UFWA members, noting it could be liable for back pay if there was any delay. Only 15 have been called back.

The union said more than 100 UFWA members are still on strike and 135 strikebreakers are working at the plant. The recalled workers reported the safety violations to their union.

Regional 'rap' sessions

Jobs, election issues top conference topics

Special emphasis in this year's COPE workshops is being reserved for AFL-CIO assistance in the selection of labor delegates to the 1984 Democratic Party convention.

At Myrtle Beach, COPE leaders provided trade unionists details on the rules of the delegate selection process. In addition, a demographics survey of delegates to the Myrtle Beach meeting was conducted to obtain a profile of labor candidates who might be selected to attend the party convention.

At his news conference on Apr. 5, Kirkland said, "There is strong support for the proposition that we ought to enter the primaries in a united way." He said the participants here expressed to him "a strong concurrence in the desirability that we should play an effective role in the primary campaign."

December meeting

The federation's General Board, made up of representatives of affiliated unions and trade and industrial departments, is scheduled to meet in December in Washington to decide whether to make a pre-primary endorsement of a presidential candidate.

Kirkland left little doubt that he feels the country needs a change in leadership at the top, and he had a sympathetic audience here. Some of the highest unemployment in the country is in the South.

"Unemployment levels are in excess of the national average (10.3 percent in March)," Kirkland said. "Certain basic industries are particularly afflicted that are located here. And people here share the problems that working people face nationally—unemployment, the consequences of cutbacks in social programs, and the continuing erosion of our national industrial base. These are problems that are urgent and ought to be addressed by national leadership. And they will be at issue in the coming elections."

Problems neglected

As matters now stand, he said, these problems are not being addressed by an Administration more interested in helping the rich than the poor.

"In fact, the programs and positions of the current Administration have contributed to the problems rather than their solution," he charged.

"We have had for the past couple of years a deliberate policy of dismantling the role of the national government in our lives, and the reducing of that role to, in effect, the raising of armies and the creation of a comfortable climate for big business.

"That's not an adequate response by the government to the issues that we face."

Communications workshop

Regional conference participants in Myrtle Beach, S.C., view a videotape of labor highlights of the past year at a workshop on communications. It was one of 14 workshops covering a wide range of issues, including social security, civil rights, and political education. The three-day meeting drew 300 union representatives from seven southeastern states.

Union pension investments boost job-creating projects

Job-creating investments totalling more than $800 million have been made recently by trustees of union pension funds, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. reported.

Georgine announced a new series of pension investment "expositions" along with the results of a survey of trustees who had attended previous expositions.

He said the survey revealed that over a third of the funds whose trustees attended past expositions had made new commitments for job-creating projects in 1982.

"In rough figures, this works out to more than $800 mllion in job-creating investments," Georgine said.

Many of the pension funds have earmarked between 10 and 25 percent of their new assets for job-creating investments this year. Georgine noted that this would mean millions of dollars more of investments, since the combined assets of the various pension funds exceed $60 billion.

"We think it is clear that we have achieved a major breakthrough in job-creating investment activity by Building & Construction Trades Dept. affiliated plans," Georgine observed.

He said that virtually all the trustees contacted in the survey indicated the expositions had encouraged them to expand or undertake job-creating investment activities.

The expositions began in 1980 under BCTD auspices with the goal of acquainting labor and management pension trustees and their legal and financial advisers with the opportunities and responsibilities under the Employees Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA).

In 1982, four expositions were held in which the emphasis was on sound investments that could produce jobs for the unemployed building and construction trades members. The fund trustees met with representatives of banks, insurance companies, brokerage firms, trusts and other financial groups.

This year's series of expositions begins June 6 and 7 in Hollywood, Fla.

Government Employees hit threat to Civil Service system

The Government Employees vowed to fight Reagan Administration proposals for changes in work rules that the union charged amount to an attempt to replace the Civil Service system with political patronage.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said the union will battle the Administration's attack on the career merit system before Congress, the courts and the public.

"OPM Director Donald J. Devine is attempting to destroy the Civil Service system through the implementation of these proposed regulations that, in effect, politicize every function in every agency of government," Blaylock said.

"The issue here is not performance as Dr. Devine would like us to believe. The issue is whether the director of OPM (Office of Personnel Management) can repeal or implement portions of the Civil Service Reform Act solely for political purposes."

Five areas

The proposed regulations, announced Mar. 29, cover five major areas of worker relations: promotions, performance appraisals, step increases, reductions in force (RIFs), and collective bargaining.

The OPM changes would do away with automatic in-grade increases for an estimated 1.4 million white-collar, mid- and low-level federal workers. They would also reduce the number of federal employees eligible for overtime pay.

The Administration also said it would issue a "clarification of management rights," which in effect would give OPM the power to define what is an "appropriate" bargaining issue for federal employee unions.

Details of the proposed changes were published in the Mar. 30 Federal Register as proposed rules. Interested parties have 60 days to comment on the proposals. The changes are almost identical to those Devine proposed last January in an internal memo that leaked to the press. The changes drew immediate criticism at the time from employee unions and several members of Congress.

On the proposed change to eliminate automatic step increases, Blaylock charged that OPM is trying to change the existing pay principles, which ensure that all workers are treated fairly, and replace them with a manipulative system that would force employees to conform to OPM's "political ideology to get ahead."

As for proposed RIF changes, OPM is not only "attempting to base RIFs on the totally subjective performance appraisal system but will gut the Veterans Preference Act in the process," Blaylock pointed out.

"Workers who do not share the Administration's political ideology would be the first to go out the door with no regard for seniority," he said. "Political tenure would be the rule."

ILG opens drive to set limit on garment imports

New York—A national campaign to save jobs by curbing the number of imported garments sold in the United States has been kicked off by the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The campaign includes grassroots lobbying of members of Congress, followed by a national teleconference on Apr. 23 linking President Sol C. Chaikin and other union officials at the ILGWU headquarters with union members, journalists and community leaders in 25 cities across the country.

The union also will hold a legislative conference May 4-6 in Washington to step up the lobbying process. In announcing the effort, the ILGWU said its goal is a congressional resolution calling on President Reagan to use his trade negotiations power to roll back the number of garment imports to a maximum of 25 percent of the U.S. market.

Currently, the ILGWU said, imports account for about 41 percent of the market, or two of every five garments, up from one of every 20 garments just 25 years ago.

Imports are the major factor behind rising unemployment in the garment industry, the union said. It pointed out that in 1982 when the rate of unemployment was 9.5 percent nationally, it was 15.5 percent in the apparel industry.

Strategy session

Leaders of federal employee unions outlined plans to fight Reagan Administration proposals to freeze federal pay, extend retirement age, and destroy the Civil Service system at a legislative strategy session in Washington. From the left, Executive Director John F. Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., PED President Kenneth T. Blaylock, PED Legislative Rep. Steve Pruitt, Legislative Director Jerry Klepner of the National Federation of Federal Employees, and Legislative Director David Gusky of the National Treasury Employees Union.

Triangle fire

The Ladies' Garment Workers combined an observance of the 72nd anniversary of the Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire with a day-long fire safety course. ILGWU members learned of fire hazards, prevention tips and emergency procedures from New York City Fire Dept. instructors at Randalls Island Training Academy that included a hands-on demonstration on how to put out a fire. At the site of the 1911 fire at Greene Street and Washington Place in New York, union officers recounted the tragedy that took the lives of 146 workers.

Jobless toll points up lag in recovery

BLS also reported that the number of so-called discouraged workers—those who want to work but are not looking for jobs because they believe none is to be found—was 1,764,000 at the end of the first quarter of 1983. Although dropping from the fourth-quarter 1982 total of 1,849,000, the number was more than a half-million higher than a year earlier.

These workers are not counted as unemployed by the government. If they were, along with one-half of those Americans working only part-time because they cannot find full-time work, "true" joblessness would amount to 14.6 percent of the work force with 16.3 million people out of work, the AFL-CIO figures.

Insignificant drop

The drop of one-tenth of 1 percent in the official unemployment rate last month, to 10.3 percent, was insignificant, BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood said at a news conference. She said it takes a change of at least a two-tenths of 1 percent to indicate a trend.

Encouraging signs in the March report included a pickup in the number of payroll jobs, particularly in manufacturing, a slight decline in unemployment among adult men, and an increase in the length of the average factory workweek.

But, the AFL-CIO pointed out, these improvements were offset by deterioration in other areas such as the excessively high number of discouraged workers and the continuing high number of new claims for unemployment insurance benefits. Initial claims for jobless benefits totaled 484,000 for the week ended Mar. 19.

Manufacturing up

Norwood said the number of manufacturing jobs has increased by 130,000 since December, with the jobless rate among factory workers dropping to 12.8 percent in March from 14.8 percent in December. Most of the improvement in this sector has occurred in durable goods industries, such as transportation and electrical equipment, fabricated metals and machinery, all of which have been hard hit by the Reagan Recession.

The jobless rate for adult men last month declined to 9.6 percent from 9.9 percent in February. The rate for adult women fell to 8.8 percent from 8.9 percent. For teenagers, the rate rose to 23.5 percent from 22.2 percent. The rate for whites dropped to 9 percent from 9.2 percent while rising to 19.9 percent for blacks, up from 19.7 percent.

Naming of fact-finding board sidetracks L.I. railroad strike

President Reagan blocked a scheduled strike by nine unions seeking an agreement with the Long Island Rail Road with the appointment of an emergency fact-finding board.

After more than one year of frustrating negotiations, the unions planned to strike the nation's largest commuter railroad Apr. 5. Reagan's signing of an Executive Order establishing the review board automatically imposed a 120-day "cooling-off" period. Under terms of railway labor law, the panel must receive the parties' final offers for settlement of the dispute within 30 days of its appointment.

Within the next 30 days, the board must submit its recommendations for settlement to the President. The parties then have another 60 days to study the recommendations as a possible basis for negotiating a new work agreement. No self-help action—a strike by workers or a lockout by management—can be taken during the 120-day period.

Board members

Named to the emergency board were three New York City arbitrators. Frederick R. Livingston, an attorney, was named chairman. Other panelists are Arthur Stark, an economist, and New York University law Prof. Thomas G. S. Christensen.

The dispute dates back to the end of 1981, when the old work agreement expired. Reagan appointed a similar fact-finding panel last November, and the White House said that several of the issues have been settled since. The new panel was requested by the New York Metropolitan Transportation Authority, which owns and operates the LIRR, because of the still-unresolved issues.

The major issue is MTA's insistence that it shall make the final determination on the crew size of conductors and trainmen. The United Transportation Union represents the 622 workers who handle those jobs, and wants the right to establish the makeup of each train crew in the new agreement.

Five settlements

Five unions with members working on the LIRR have settled and ratified new agreements. They are the Railway & Airline Clerks, Signalmen, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The nine unions still seeking a settlement are the UTU, the Supervisors division of BRAC, Machinists, Yardmasters, Sheet Metal Workers, Carmen, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers and Police Benevolent Association.

In other rail labor developments, New York Gov. Mario Cuomo asked Reagan to take action to end the five-week-old strike by UTU members on the Metro-North commuter railroad. Cuomo wants the President to submit to Congress a proposal to make binding the December recommendations of an emergency review board.

William A. Beebe, general chairman of the striking conductors unit at Metro-North, accused Cuomo and MTA Chairman Richard Ravitch of impeding progress in the negotiations by trying to involve the federal government.

The trainmen went on strike in early March. No further talks have been scheduled.

New Jersey contract

Meanwhile, New Jersey Transit conductors and trainmen ratified a new two-and-a-half-year contract, ending a strike that began on Mar. 1. The UTU group that accepted the pact represents 475 workers. A second group of 125 workers who did not strike rejected the agreement and talks continued.

The contract gives the workers who approved it a 6-percent raise over their current hourly pay of $11.66, retroactive to the beginning of January. On Jan. 1, 1984, they will receive a 5-percent raise, followed by a 6-percent hike on Jan. 1, 1985.

Management also accepted agreement calling for a basic crew size of one conductor and one brakeman. New Jersey Transit will be allowed to eliminate the brakeman position on two-car trains on an attrition basis, but all reductions have to be presented to a labor-management council first.

ITC ruling finds imports injuring specialty steels

The International Trade Commission ruled that the American specialty steel industry has been injured by rising imports. The ITC will later determine the specific relief it should recommend in its report to President Reagan.

The Steelworkers and the specialty steel industry filed for relief nearly 16 months ago under section 301 of the Trade Agreements Act of 1979. Since then, two specialty steel companies have filed for bankruptcy, Bethelem Steel Corp. ended its tool steel operations after 75 years, and Colt Industries closed its crucible mill at Midland, Pa., resulting in the loss of 7,500 jobs.

In finding imports were the "substantial cause" of hardship in the industry, the ITC noted the heavy layoffs. The decision covers stainless steel sheet, strip, plates, bar and rod, and alloy tool steels.

The ruling is expected to give the United States more bargaining power in talks with other steel producing nations, now in the preliminary stage, to develop better international rules for specialty steel trade.

Once Reagan receives the ITC report, due by May 6, he can accept, modify or reject it. If he accepts or modifies it, Congress has 90 days to overrule his decision.

The specialty steel industry is concentrated in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois where unemployment has been as high as 50 percent at some plants.

Duty-free products tied to erosion of jobs

The AFL-CIO renewed its call for repeal of the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), which authorizes the President to allow the duty-free import of some 3,000 products into the United States from developing countries.

"The program has not been working for the purposes and under the conditions Congress established," Research Director Rudy Oswald testified before the Trade Policy Staff Committee. The panel is a lower body, at the assistant secretary level, of the Trade Policy Committee. The full committee is made up of Cabinet-level officers of 15 Executive Branch agencies and departments.

Most of the items on the GSP list should not have been put there in the first place, Oswald said. Producers and workers in the United States must go to great lengths before the Administration decides whether to remove an item from the list because of import sensitivity.

It makes no sense to shift the burden entirely on the public, when the government should have a responsibility to assure its citizens that their jobs and production will not be destroyed by a special arrangement designed to help the poorer countries, Oswald said.

The GSP program, adopted as part of the 1974 Trade Act, will expire next year unless Congress renews it. The program was designed to help countries that could not get foreign exchange to develop their economies to enter the world trading system, and earn more exchange, Oswald noted.

"With imports from developing countries in 1982 at $122.4 billion, or 44.8-percent of total U.S. imports, that objective is not now a problem for most developing countries," he said.

Needed actions

Oswald cited AFL-CIO convention actions calling on Congress and the Administration to at least "remove import-sensitive products from the list, guarantee that only the neediest countries receive the benefits, and exclude Communist economies" from the program.

It is clear, he said, that the Administration is considering none of these options. Import-sensitive products are flooding the country from every part of the world even though the 1974 law says they should not be granted duty-free status. Such products include a wide variety of textiles and apparel, electronic devices, steel, footwear, glass, and other items that may be determined import-sensitive.

"This mandate has been ignored to such an extent that the import of steel for a whole building in Seattle may be entering at zero tariffs under GSP from South Korea, possibly the lowest-cost steel producer in the world," Oswald said.

With ironworkers and steelworkers at jobless levels not seen since Depression days, he said the GSP duty-free list should not still include such items as hangars and other buildings, bridges, telephone equipment and parts, electronic devices, buses, fire engines, aircraft parts, and a wide variety of machinery.

Some highly industrialized countries competent in world trade continue to receive GSP privileges, even though they export billions of dollars worth of products to the United States, he observed. These include Taiwan, South Korea, Mexico, Brazil, and Hong Kong.

The GSP program was designed as a "temporary, unilateral, nonreciprocal system of tariff preferences," Oswald noted. Extending the system after its 10 years of existence to certain countries because they have made some concessions to the United States makes the whole purpose of GSP unrealistic, he added.

Learning in Pittsburgh

IT'S NOT SURPRISING that President Reagan met with a cool reception when he carried his message of imminent economic recovery to Pittsburgh.

For nearly two years now, the White House has snatched at each statistical wiggle as proof positive that the promised upturn has begun. Meanwhile, in Pittsburgh and its now-smokeless environs, unemployment has climbed to nearly twice the national average. Hard times have become increasingly desperate times.

In places like Pittsburgh, President Reagan's "get the government off our backs" dogma isn't selling very well these days.

But the President was right to go to Pittsburgh, and it is too bad he couldn't stay longer because it could have been a valuable learning experience.

Some things just take a while to sink in. Last year, when the jobless lines were lengthening so rapidly, the President was saying that conditions weren't really as bad as they seemed because the newspapers were full of "help wanted" ads.

In Pittsburgh, Mr. Reagan apparently got around to reading the help wanted listings, and he recited one of them to make a point. The job was for "System programmer—large-scale IBM, VTAM, TSO/SPF, AFC, CICS, OS/MVS," the President quoted. He noted correctly that "you have to be a specialist to know what the ad is even about."

THE THRUST of the President's remarks was the importance of training, a truism that no one will dispute and certainly not the labor movement.

But the President's visit to a computer training class pointed up the limitations as well as the promise of such programs.

A select group of highly motivated unemployed, including a number with college educations and a background in responsible jobs, are taking part in an intensive, eight-month high-tech computer training program.

Mr. Reagan answered some questions from the trainees and when handed a resume by a student who said he'd been looking for a job for a year and hadn't found one, promised to study it "thoroughly" and follow through personally. "This is the kind of guy who deserves a job," the President said.

At latest report, the President's intervention brought results and with an assist from the Secretary of Labor and the governor of Pennsylvania, a job was found.

That leaves just 11,380,999 to go until full employment is achieved.

If the President had asked some questions of his own, as reporters covering his trip did, he would have found the select students more realistic than he about the limitations of such a program.

"We are a minority that have a chance," said one. "The majority of people are out there still hurting."

Another spoke of the long hours of unfamiliar poring over books and intricate data and his ambition to succeed, but also of the fear that a new flood of foreign imports could make his new skills worthless by the time he graduates.

And for those who aren't likely to become computer technicians, "you look at people in the unemployment line, and you look at some of their faces, and there is total despair."

THERE CAN, of course, be hope for the vast millions of unemployed, but it will require a commitment of government resources far greater than the President has given any sign of accepting.

Just the opposite. Even for the programs Mr. Reagan professes to admire, the Administration's budget request for employment and training is $5.4 billion for the new fiscal year, down $400 million from the current year and a full $3.8 billion less than in fiscal 1981. And as for rolling back some of the over-generous tax giveaways in order to fund needed programs, the President had a stern warning: "To those who would consider changing those tax laws, I'm sleeping with a pen under my pillow, ready for a veto."

Some people are just mighty slow learners.

Meager youth jobs plan far cry from FDR's effort

By Press Associates, Inc.

Trying to deal with the consequences of the worst recession since the Great Depression, Congress once again has drawn from the fountain of ideas that sprang from Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal.

In March, the House voted 301-87 to establish a program that would put unemployed needy youths to work in the nation's public forest, range and recreation areas, on erosion and flood control projects. The youths also would tackle energy conservation and urban revitalization projects.

Like Roosevelt's Civilian Conservation Corps after which it was patterned, the House bill is an attempt to reduce massive youth unemployment in a way that turns public expenditures into immediate public benefits.

When Roosevelt proposed the CCC 50 years ago, some 3.5 million young men were unemployed. In March 1983, the unemployment rate among those aged 16 to 24 was 18.1 percent, with about 4.4 million youths out of work.

But, while the youth unemployment problem is as great today as it was in 1933, the House plan is paltry compared to Roosevelt's.

New Deal action

On Mar. 31, 1933, Congress enacted the CCC. According to New Deal historians, the CCC was one of Roosevelt's most cherished projects—he had initiated a similar program while he was New York's governor. And he enthusiastically lit fires under the Departments of Labor, Army, Agriculture and Interior, which administered the program.

Consequently, the Labor Dept. drew up a recruitment organization in three days. By June, the Army Dept. had some 1,400 camps in operation and by July, nearly 300,000 unmarried men between 18 and 25 were making $30 a month working on projects organized by the Agriculture and Interior Departments.

The corpsmen planted 200 million trees, dug reservoirs, built bridges, dams and fire towers, fought forest fires, strung 12,000 miles of telephone line and created and improved recreation areas around the nation.

At its peak in 1935, the CCC had over 500,000 young men enrolled. And, before the program ended in 1942, more than 2.5 million youths passed through the CCC.

No concept of reality

In contrast, the House bill plans jobs for only 100,000 youths. But, if the House bill timidly lacks vision, the Reagan Administration lacks any concept of reality. Its idea of a way to solve the problem is a subminimum wage.

The Administration is complaining the House bill is too expensive and would provide only "makework" jobs. Both those who remember and participated in the CCC know better.

Rep. Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.), who grew up in east Los Angeles, joined the CCC in 1934 at age 18. He said it was either that or "starve," and he credits the program with saving him from the life of crime that many of his friends fell into.

Roybal said the CCC "not only provided employment, but developed character" through discipline. Corpsmen, who had to follow strict rules, rose at 5:30 a.m. and started work at 8 a.m.

Fortunately, Sen. Robert T. Stafford (R-Vt.) has introduced a bill that regains some of Roosevelt's vision. It would create 300,000 jobs a year for unemployed disadvantaged youth. It would equally divide some $3 million between two programs—one for forest, parks and wildlife conservation and the other for community projects.

Considering the size and seriousness of the youth unemployment problem today, it is to be hoped Congress will move in the direction of the Stafford bill.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Check Your Legislators on First Key Votes in the 98th Congress

Since the 98th Congress convened in January, it has moved extraordinarily fast, passing its first bill to mitigate the Reagan recession, approving Social Security amendments, and making progress on the new federal budget. The charts below show how your legislators voted on the issues of greatest concern to working people.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Next time you write your Representative or Senators, mention the votes described here. Thank them for favorable votes, and ask respectfully for improvement if their records so far are unfavorable.

KEY 1983 HOUSE VOTES

1. JOB-CREATION: During debate on the $4.9 billion jobs bill, Rep. Silvio Conte (R-MA) offered a motion to send the bill back to committee so he could offer his substitute, which would have slashed funding for construction projects and reduced the overall scope of the bill. The Conte motion was rejected 158-256 on March 3.

2. SOCIAL SECURITY I: Rep. J.J. Pickle (D-TX) offered an amendment which will raise the Social Security retirement age from 65 to 67, starting in the year 2009 and becoming fully phased in by 2027. Those who retire at age 62 will receive only 70 percent of full benefits, instead of the current 80 percent. This AFL-CIO-opposed measure was approved 228-202.

3. SOCIAL SECURITY II: Instead of the Pickle amendment, the AFL-CIO endorsed an alternative by Rep. Claude Pepper (D-FL) which would have stabilized Social Security funding by raising employer-employee payroll taxes 0.53 percent by the year 2010. The Pepper amendment was defeated 132-296 on March 9.

4. FEDERAL BUDGET: This year the House rejected the Reagan budget and passed its own alternative. It is not as comprehensive as what the AFL-CIO proposed, but it stops the slashing and begins to restore funds to programs that have been cut too deeply, including education and training. This budget includes funds for jobs, foreclosure relief, health care for the jobless, and extended unemployment benefits. The AFL-CIO-backed budget passed 229-196 on March 23.

KEY 1983 SENATE VOTES

1. JOB-CREATION: During debate on the jobs bill, Sen. Carl Levin (D-MI) offered an amendment to add funds for additional jobs as well as emergency food, shelter, and health care for the unemployed. The AFL-CIO endorsed this effort, but the GOP-controlled Senate rejected it 34-53 on March 11.

2. LOCAL GOVERNMENT JOBS AND SERVICES: Local governments have cut community services because of Reagan cuts in federal revenue sharing. During debate on the jobs bill, Sen. John Heinz (R-PA) offered an amendment to accelerate revenue sharing by three months, which in effect would add $1.2 billion to the program. Approved 73-21 on March 14.

3. SOCIAL SECURITY: When the Senate raised the retirement age for full Social Security benefits from 65 to 66, the AFL-CIO objected and noted that most who retire early do so for reasons of poor health or unemployment conditions. Sen. Bill Bradley (D-NJ) offered an amendment to address this concern by providing improved disability benefits for those who are unable to work until age 66. But the Bradley amendment was rejected 30-61 on March 21.

4. FAIRNESS IN TAXATION: Last year Congress approved a new tax compliance mechanism: withholding of taxes on savings interest and stock dividends. But Sen. John Melcher (D-MT) offered an amendment which would have paved the way to repeal this tax reform. Fortunately, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan's (D-NY) motion to table (kill) the Melcher amendment was approved 56-41 on March 22.

5. UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION: Under the Reagan "voucher" plan, the unemployed would receive vouchers instead of federal jobless benefits, which they would turn over to an employer in exchange for a job. But employers could replace current workers with new workers in order to take advantage of the vouchers, doing nothing to reduce unemployment. Sen. Dan Quayle (D-IN) offered the voucher scheme as an amendment to the Social Security bill. It was approved 53-40 on March 23, but then, fortunately, stricken from the bill in conference.

Congress balks at Reagan cuts

1 million auto jobs tied to domestic content bill

A labor-endorsed domestic content bill would salvage more than a million auto-related jobs and bolster the nation's import-weakened economy, the Auto Workers testified at House hearings.

The House passed a domestic content bill by a 215-188 vote last December, during the lame-duck session. But the measure died in the Senate with the adjournment of the 97th Congress a few days later.

The battle has now been renewed at hearings before a House Commerce subcommittee, with Administration witnesses arguing that the bill isn't needed and would cause the Japanese to "retaliate" against the United States.

But hundreds of UAW members filled the hearing room to capacity to back their union's position that local content legislation is both workable and desirable.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser warned that failure to act will mean a continued decline in U.S. auto employment, even if new car sales rebound. Testifying with him was UAW Vice President Owen Bieber, who is expected to succeed Fraser as UAW president at the union's convention next month.

The bill they supported, which carries a strong AFL-CIO endorsement, would apply to companies selling more than 100,000 cars a year in the U.S. market.

At the end of a four-year phase-in period, the domestic content requirement of parts and labor would be tied to sales volume. The range would be a 10 percent domestic content requirement at the lower level to a 90 percent requirement for companies with U.S. sales in excess of 900,000 a year.

Legislation needed

Fraser rejected the Administration's contention that voluntary action by Japan to limit auto exports to the United States and an improved economic outlook make the legislation unnecessary.

Even during the recession, Fraser said, Japan has increased its share of the U.S. car and truck market, with both government and private analysts predicting that the trend will continue.

"The rise in imports has not been confined to finished vehicles," the UAW

AFL-CIO offers alternative plan for Caribbean aid

The AFL-CIO has proposed to Congress an alternative to President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative that would help raise the region's living standards without undermining U.S. jobs.

Labor's plan would help the region's workers, strengthen human rights and improve working conditions, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan testified. By contrast, he told the Senate Finance Committee, the Administration proposal would chiefly benefit multinational corporations.

Koplan stressed the AFL-CIO's continued strong opposition to a provision of the Administration bill that would allow multinational firms to channel manufactured products into the United States through Caribbean ports without paying duty, even if most of the work on the product were done elsewhere.

As a minimum, he urged, there should be a stricter domestic content requirement than the Administration has proposed to assure that tariff-exempt products aren't manufactured in other coun-

President hurls new veto threat

President Reagan hurled veto threats at Democrats in the House and Republicans in the Senate as the Administration sought to keep Congress from changing the nation's economic course.

The White House had looked to the Republican-controlled Senate to counter what the President has called the "liberal Democratic budget" adopted by the House.

Instead, the Senate Budget Committee followed the lead of the House in rejecting most of the Administration's proposals to cut back domestic programs. It gave tentative approval to a series of spending add-ons and voted to hold the rise in defense spending to an after-inflation 5 percent—significantly closer to the 4 percent endorsed by the House than to the 10 percent sought by the President.

The add-ons for domestic programs were almost all lower than the House had approved. The Senate committee also went part way with the Administration in cutting programs such as Medicare and Medicaid.

It rejected the President's proposed cutbacks in welfare, subsidized housing and food stamps, however. Reagan had claimed that $1 billion could be saved from the food stamp program by eliminating "waste and corruption." But a study by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office concluded that such a cut would fall inevitably on the nation's poorest families.

Amendments allowed

Unlike the House, which considered its budget resolution under a no-amendment procedure, senators will be able to propose changes in all of the budget categories and the final version will be shaped on the Senate floor. It would then have to be reconciled in conference with the House-passed budget figures.

The committee had not yet dealt with the revenue side of the balance sheet when the AFL-CIO News went to press. But five moderate Republican senators defied the White House to join in a call for cancellation of the scheduled July 1 tax cut and repeal of the controversial "indexing" provisions that would hold down tax revenues in future years.

The following day, Reagan charged in a

Job hopes dashed at plant gates

Long before dawn, the roads to Hartville, Ohio, were clogged. The word had gone out that a company was hiring.

More than 12,000 job-seekers from a two-state area were competing for fewer than 100 jobs.

In Buffalo, there were 10,500 unemployed Americans in the lineup for 56 new jobs.

Across America, the recession continued unabated for more than a tenth of the nation's workforce for whom there were still no jobs.

Local 99 of the Rubber Workers, which represents workers at the Teledyne Monarch Rubber Co. in Hartville had 35 laid-off members recalled and the company notified the state employment service that it would be adding about another 75 workers to fill a new contract for auto parts.

The word spread like brushfire and job-seekers poured in from nearby counties and from West Virginia, creating a massive traffic tie-up on Route 43.

For the fortunate few, the jobs pay $8 to $9 an hour.

In Buffalo, the 56 job openings were at Anaconda's American Brass plant.

Steelworkers District 4 Rep. Sal Amarante said several hundred of the 10,500 applicants waited overnight in temperatures close to freezing only to be handed application forms that the company told them should be mailed back.

A year ago, in a comparable situation, the company had received 5,000 applications for 70 jobs.

Nearly 20,000 Steelworkers are still out of work in the Buffalo area, Amarante reported.

Auto content bill pressed to save jobs stressed. Over the last decade, Fraser said, the value of parts imported from countries other than Canada has grown at an annual rate of 24 percent.

By current projections, he warned, the use of imported parts would raise the imported content of vehicles assembled in the United States from a present level of under 5 percent to close to 40 percent by the end of the decade.

The decline in employment doesn't just hit auto manufacturing, Fraser pointed out. He reminded the panel that the auto industry uses 21 percent of U.S. steel production, 60 percent of synthetic rubber and high percentages of aluminum, zinc, copper and other supplier products.

Not transient

Fraser scoffed at the contention that changes in employment patterns are transient, "that if one job is destroyed, another pops up to take its place."

He reminded the committee that "in the real world" of a depressed American economy, 11.4 million people are looking for work and further undermining of the automobile industry will add to that number.

"The only jobs certain to be created" to replace auto industry employment, Fraser suggested, "will be serving food in soup kitchens and maintaining sanitation in the tent cities all across America."

Fraser noted that domestic content requirements imposed by other countries haven't had the feared result of keeping out competition and pushing up automobile prices.

"The evidence from other countries indicates that auto companies use every effort to maintain their market share," he testified.

Metal Trades win pay hike for 1,300 in air base accord

Tullahoma, Tenn.—Some 1,300 workers at Arnold Air Force Base won a series of wage gains in new three-year contracts negotiated by the Air Engineering Metal Trades Council.

Agreement with three of the four contracting firms involved in the negotiations came before a strike deadline set for late February, but employees of the fourth—Sverdrup Technology—had to strike for a week before reaching settlement.

The pacts cover workers represented by 11 AFL-CIO unions engaged in base support and fabrication of systems at the Air Force's research and development testing center here. The council is an affiliate of the Metal Trades Dept.

Annual increases

The contracts provide pay increases totaling $5,153 over the three-year period ending Feb. 28, 1986, the council reported. Craftsmen employed by Pan Am World Services will receive a 3-percent hike retroactive to Mar. 1, another 3-percent increase Nov. 1, and a final 4-percent increase in November 1984.

Workers employed by Sverdrup, Arvin-Calspan Field Services, and Computer Sciences will receive comparable increases with some slight variation but totaling the same amount as those at Pan Am.

Despite employer demands for major contract concessions, the MTC bargaining committees were generally successful in maintaining employee benefits. In addition, they added an 11th annual paid holiday to the contracts.

Craftsmen covered by the pacts are represented by the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Ironworkers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Operating Engineers, Laborers, Carpenters, Fire Fighters, Painters, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

All paid for

After 23 years of monthly installments, the Railway Labor Building in Washington is clear of debt. Burning the mortgage at a ceremony are Sec.-Treas. R. C. Howard, left, of Labor newspaper which has offices in the building, and Carmen President O. W. Jacobson, board chairman of the newspaper. Labor, with a circulation of 250,000, is published every third week. It is owned by 14 railway unions. The building is just off Capitol Hill, and houses the Washington offices of participating unions.

Congress urged to extend curb on Alaskan oil exports

Existing curbs on exporting Alaskan oil should be retained in the interests of the national economy and America's security, the AFL-CIO urged at congressional hearings.

Oil from Alaska's North Slope has moved the United States significantly closer to the goal of energy self-reliance, Associate Legislative Director Howard D. Marlowe testified at House and Senate hearings. Unless Congress acts, restrictions contained in the Export Administration Act will expire on Sept. 30, 1983.

Marlowe testified on behalf of the broad-based Coalition to Keep Alaska Oil. It includes consumer, farm and industry groups as well as the AFL-CIO and many of its affiliates.

National interest

Under the provision the AFL-CIO wants retained, oil from Alaska may not be exported unless the President certifies that such exports are in the national interest, will not diminish the supply or quality of crude oil available in the United States, will result in lower costs to refiners and will pass on at least 75 percent of any savings to consumers. Further, export contracts must be subject to termination if U.S. oil supplies are interrupted, threatened or diminished.

Marlowe termed the restrictions "eminently reasonable." The oil involved "is a vital American resource" that "should continue to be used to benefit our economy," he urged.

Use of American ships to transport oil from Alaska has strengthened the U.S. merchant marine and assured the availability of trained crews, Marlowe testified.

Provides jobs

"Alaska oil has also provided jobs in the steel and auto industry as well as many other sectors of the economy," he noted. And it has "helped to maintain the vitality of many U.S. ports and the economies of the communities and regions they serve."

At the same time, consumers have gained because the delivered price of Alaska oil is often below the level of comparable grades of oil from foreign sources. On the East Coast, Marlowe said, Alaska oil has been selling for about $3.80 a barrel less than imported oil.

The argument for dropping export restrictions is that the United States could sell oil from Alaska to Japan in exchange for Mexican oil and that this would also reduce the trade imbalance with Japan.

Marlowe suggested that removal of the restrictions would actually aggravate trade problems with Japan. "The export of oil, which is not labor-intensive, instead of the export of much more labor-intensive manufactured goods would be very costly to the United States in terms of jobs," he stressed. Further, "the likely higher price of imported oil, coupled with payments for the use of foreign ships and the heavy cost of discontinuing use of U.S. ships would hurt our overall balance of payments."

While the recession has "temporarily eased" the price squeeze from the OPEC cartel, "the need to reduce U.S. dependence on imported oil must remain a vital concern of our national policy," Marlowe urged.

Jobless rates up over year in most states

Nearly every state experienced an increase in unemployment between February 1982 and February 1983, with joblessness particularly widespread in metropolitan areas, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Only in Arkansas, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Massachusetts and Hawaii did state jobless rates decline over the period, BLS said. In 18 states, unemployment rates jumped 2 percentage points or more from February to February. Increases of 4 percentage points or more over the year were recorded for three states—Oklahoma, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

Meanwhile, first-time claims for unemployment benefits rose in the week ended Mar. 26, the Labor Dept. reported. New jobless claims increased 14,000 over the previous week to 498,000.

Over 20% jobless

The BLS report on state and metropolitan area employment noted that seven major urban areas recorded unemployment levels greater than 20 percent in February. Johnstown, Pa., had the highest, 25.9 percent. The city's rate in January was 24.5 percent. In February 1982, the rate was 16.3 percent.

Also on the high end of the scale were Modesto, Calif., 23.8 percent; Duluth-Superior, Minn., 22.2 percent; Sharon, Pa., 21.9 percent; Kankakee, Ill., 21.4 percent; Stockton, Calif., 20.4 percent; and Youngstown-Warren, Ohio, 20.1 percent. The figures are not seasonally adjusted.

The national rate for all civilian workers increased from 9.6 to 11.3 percent between February 1982 and February 1983, BLS said. During the reporting period, nonfarm payroll employment fell in 42 states.

Unemployment rates were at or above the unadjusted national rate of 11.3 percent in 22 states in February 1983, BLS said. West Virginia, 21 percent, Michigan, 16.5 percent, and Alabama, 16.1 percent, continued to report the highest rates.

Thirty states and the District of Columbia reported jobless rates of 10 percent or more in February 1983, compared with 21 states and the District of Columbia a year earlier, and 10 states in February 1981.

Bay State Democratic poll shows labor solid for 'jobs'

Springfield, Mass. — Labor delegates to the state Democratic Party convention here gave an impressive demonstration of trade union solidarity in the presidential straw poll and spoke with a single strong voice in favor of "jobs."

"We have accomplished everything we wanted to do, and we have not injured any candidate," State AFL-CIO President Arthur Osborn said.

The vote for "jobs" rather than one of the candidates in the poll drew 884 votes or 25.6 percent of the total. Osborn said the nearly 700 representatives of AFL-CIO unions among the 3,830 delegates to the convention were joined by some 200 unaffiliated teachers and nuclear freeze advocates.

Split avoided

Thus, the trade union delegates avoided either a pre-mature commitment on a public split over support for specific candidates before the AFL-CIO General Board reaches a decision next December on a pre-primary endorsement by the federation.

Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale led the presidential preference poll, collecting 1,013 votes, 29.3 percent of the total. He was followed by Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.) with 16.9 percent (582 votes), Sen. John Glenn (Ohio) with 15.3 percent (528 votes), Sen. Gary Hart (Colo.) with 10.5 percent (362 votes), "no preference" 1.4 percent (50 votes), Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (S.C.) with 0.5 percent (17 votes), and former Florida governor Reubin Askew with 0.3 percent (12 votes).

All six candidates addressed the delegates and attached varying degrees of significance to the results of the straw poll.

Issue-oriented

Osborn said that when the call first went out for what was planned as an "issues" convention of the Massachusetts Democratic Party, the State AFL-CIO sought to have the strongest possible union representation among the delegates to press for inclusion of the federation's national economic policy as a plank in the statewide platform.

Shortly before the convention, party leaders announced that a presidential straw poll would also be conducted. At that point, the state labor federation developed the strategy of urging unionists to vote for "jobs".

"We wanted to show that labor can unite to deliver a powerful and disciplined vote," Osborn said. "We didn't try to win; we just tried to make sure that our people spoke with one strong voice."

He stressed that the vote for "jobs" also called dramatic attention to the 237,000 workers unemployed in Massachusetts and the more than 11.3 million jobless across the nation.

From now on, Osborn said, when the Democratic candidates "fly across this great land of our . . . their copilot is going to be 'jobs.' "

Labor played key role in turning out victory margin for Washington

Chicago — Rep. Harold Washington's election as mayor of Chicago gave fresh evidence that the historic coalition of minorities, workers and the poor continues as a strong political force in the nation.

Washington sought to expand that coalition as a means of reunifying the city following the bitter and divisive campaign that ended in his election as the first black mayor in Chicago's history. He received 51.5 percent of the record number of ballots cast to 48.5 percent for his Republican opponent, Bernard Epton.

"Our most important concern at this moment is unity," Washington said. He pledged that his administration would reach out to include "more people and more kinds of people" than any previous government of the city.

Chicago's organized labor movement played an active part in getting out the vote for Washington. Following his victory in the Democratic primary over incumbent Mayor Jane Byrne and Cook County State's Atty. Richard M. Daley, Washington won the unanimous endorsement of the Chicago AFL-CIO executive board.

Federation President Lane Kirkland told audiences at AFL-CIO regional conferences this week in Albuquerque and Los Angeles that an early analysis "indicates that the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement—our Hispanic support group—played a critical role in the results as did our other Chicago brothers and sisters."

A stronger than expected showing in wards with heavy concentrations of Hispanic voters was a key element in Washington's victory. He also did well in the predominantly white lakefront wards, regarded as generally liberal.

Fund raising

Two weeks before the election, the All-Chicago Labor Committee for Washington, made up of the city AFL-CIO central body along with unaffiliated unions, raised $25,000 for the candidate at a luncheon. Individual unions also contributed funds to Washington's campaign.

In the week before the election, Kirkland and Chicago AFL-CIO President William A. Lee sent a joint letter to union members in the city urging them to vote for Washington as a "proven friend" of working people. The letter cited Washington's strongly pro-labor voting record during his three terms as a member of Congress and his service in the state legislature.

In a congratulatory message, Lee expressed labor's particular thanks for Washington's repeated expressions of support during the campaign for collective bargaining rights for public employees and for payment of prevailing wages on public contracts.

Racial prejudice and fear were the acknowledged central factors in the election campaign. Although Epton disowned and deplored the anti-Washington hate literature that spread through the city, the contest was close only because of the defection of white Democrats to the Republican side. The city has not had a Republican mayor in 52 years.

Much to lose

Kirkland met the racial issue head on during a campaign rally for Washington at the Chicago campus of the University of Illinois. He warned that "if the working people of Chicago are divided along racial lines, the only beneficiaries will be the Reaganites," and the losers will be "not only the people of Chicago, but also the unemployed, the weak and the needy and all Americans who look to their government to promote social and economic justice and equal rights."

Urging Chicagoans to vote for Washington, Kirkland predicted that the results of the mayoral race would foreshadow the 1984 presidential election.

A "unity" luncheon on the day after the convention brought Washington together with his Democratic primary opponents, Mayor Byrne and Daley, the son of the late Mayor Richard J. Daley. Epton's brother Saul represented the defeated Republican candidate, and leading members of the city's clergy and civic leaders also were present.

"We strive for unity," Washington told a news conference following the luncheon. "As the mayor of this great city, it will be my responsibility to reach out to every neighborhood. Over the next four years, there will be total and complete outreach into every area of this city."

No cheers for Reagan

Steelworkers whose jobs have been wiped out in the Reagan recession demonstrate in Pittsburgh upon the President's arrival to address a conference on displaced workers. Unemployment in the Pittsburgh area has been running close to double the national average.

13-union coalition negotiates new Kennecott copper pact

Phoenix—A 13-union coordinated bargaining alliance reached tentative agreement with Kennecott Copper Corp. The contract is expected to set a pattern for the copper industry.

The agreement involves 57 separate contracts, and must be approved by the unions' National Nonferrous Industry Conference before it takes effect. The settlement followed five weeks of intensive negotiations here.

Cass Alvin of the Steelworkers, who serves as a coordinator for the unions, said the agreement was unanimously approved by the 82-member Kennecott bargaining committee, which also recommended its ratification. Details of the agreement were not disclosed pending its approval.

The agreement covers some 4,000 Kennecott employees in Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico and Maryland. If its terms are extended to the rest of the industry, it would cover another 20,000 workers.

The copper industry, the largest nonferrous metal segment, has been hard hit by the recession that began in July 1981. Alvin said that nearly half of the workers in the highly organized copper industry currently are unemployed.

The Kennecott agreement would replace one set to expire June 30. Alvin said that union negotiators took a strong position against any contract concessions. Agreement was reached on major economic provisions, he said, leaving only local issues yet to be resolved.

One immediate result of the settlement, he said, would be to accelerate bargaining with other copper companies. The unions are now meeting with Magma Copper, Anaconda Mining, White Pine, and U.S. Metals.

Talks are slated to get under way soon with ASARCO, Phelps-Dodge, Inspiration Consolidated, and a number of smaller companies.

Unions in the agreement with Kennecott are the Steelworkers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Machinists, Laborers, United Transportation Union, Operating Engineers, Carpenters, Railway & Airline Clerks, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Carmen, Office & Professional Employees, and Painters.

Labor blasts move to kill usury laws

A proposal in Congress to abolish state usury laws limiting interest rates on many types of loans would severely hurt American consumers, particularly those on fixed incomes, and lead to weaker state protection against abusive lender practices, the AFL-CIO warned.

Testifying against the proposed Credit Deregulation & Availability Act of 1983, Director Henry B. Schechter of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy told the Senate Banking Committee, "Consumers bear the brunt of upward interest rate volatility, as does the entire economy, and that will be a more frequent problem in the wake of recent financial deregulation and household investor behavior.

"A tool is needed to deal with that problem for the sake of the consumer and the economy, rather than more deregulation."

Authorize controls

Schechter called for the restoration of credit control authority for the Federal Reserve Board as a tool to achieve steadier growth without great volatility of interest rates and related prolonged periods of high unemployment.

Schechter joined other witnesses representing workers and consumer groups testifying against the measure.

The bill is cosponsored in the Senate by Banking Committee Chairman Jake Garn (R-Utah), and Senators Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) and William Proxmire (D-Wis.).

"This bill would legalize loan sharking and invite a new era of consumer abuses," said Ellen Broadman, government affairs counsel for Consumers Union.

Glenn Nishimura, legislative representative of Consumer Federation of America, said the bill "would cost borrowers billions in additional finance charges and allow lenders to impose a variety of extra fees that would make comparison shopping for loans difficult, if not impossible."

Abolishing limits

The measure would abolish the interest rate ceilings 41 states now impose on consumer, business, and farm loans. Under its terms, a state could legislate new ceilings for itself within three years of enactment. Its backers say the bill is needed to insure the availability of credit during periods of high interest rates, which opponents strongly dispute.

"Usury laws provide affirmative help to persons of limited financial means who need a small extension of affordable credit for an emergency," Schechter stressed. He noted that opponents of usury ceilings argue that high-risk loans to needy borrowers call for higher interest rates. But, Schechter pointed out, the higher interest rates in themselves increase the risk of default.

Interest rate ceilings also are needed to protect unsophisticated borrowers who may not be able to benefit from truth-in-lending laws, laws on unconscionable contracts, and rules governing fraud, he said.

Such rules have not prevented unwary home owners in Arizona, for example, from taking second mortgages with interest rates in excess of 50 percent. Nor have they prevented District of Columbia homeowners from being induced to sign second mortgages with excessive broker fees and effective interest rates in excess of 80 percent.

Instead of adding to the financial anarchy that has developed with more and more financial deregulation, as would happen with enactment of the Garn-Proxmire-Lugar bill, there should be a return to laws governing financing that will help in achieving growth and stability in the economy, Schechter said.

Reasonable ceilings

To deal with problems caused by differences in usury ceilings between states, Schechter called for establishment of reasonable federal usury ceilings "within which there might be state variations."

He reminded the panel that the Carter Administration's brief use of credit controls in 1980 quickly brought down interest rates and restored economic growth. Restoration of the authority in the since-expired 1969 Credit Control Act would be of much greater help to consumers and the economy than the bill now before the Banking Committee, he said.

OPEIU elects Corbeil as secretary-treasurer

Romeo Corbeil has been elected by the executive board of the Office & Professional Employees to serve out the term of Sec.-Treas. William A. Lowe, who will retire May 1.

Corbeil, an OPEIU vice president, has been the union's Canadian director since 1974. He will serve in the new post until the triennial convention in Hollywood, Fla., June 6-10.

Lowe has been with the union since 1955, when he aided in the affiliation with OPEIU of the British Columbia Electric Employees Association he headed. He served as an international representative and regional director, and in 1973, was elected secretary-treasurer.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland calls for political action on unfair foreign competition at the Utility Workers convention. UWUA President James Joy, Jr., center, and Sec.-Treas. Marshall M. Hicks voiced their agreement.

Utility Workers approve dues plan tied to pay gains

Hollywood, Fla.—The Utility Workers moved to strengthen the union's financial position by approving a $2 increase in monthly membership dues and a plan to key future dues increases to negotiated wage gains.

The nearly 500 delegates to the union's 22nd convention overwhelmingly approved the dues increase and the allotment of half the rise to the per capita tax paid by locals to the national union.

When the new funding plan takes effect next Oct. 1, the base average local dues will rise from $14.20 to $16.20 a month of which $4.48 will be turned over to the national.

The new base will then serve as a starting point for calculating the annual mandatory dues increase as a percentage of the annual negotiated wage increase. Thirty percent of each dues adjustment will go to the national as per capita tax.

To keep pace

Utility Workers Sec.-Treas. Marshall M. Hicks said the increase is needed to keep pace with rising expenses and to offset a deficit in the general fund created under a system set up in 1971.

In a report to the delegates, President James Joy, Jr., warned that the American utility worker is on the "endangered species" list as a result of the rising import of foreign electric power.

With the Northeast importing 30 percent of its power needs from Canada and the rest of the country about 7 percent, Joy said, the United States is fast becoming dependent on foreign power.

"Unlike other imports such as textiles, steel, televisions, shoes, and radios," he told delegaes, "foreign powers doesn't have, and is not required to carry, a 'country of origin' label. You merely throw a switch, and you are using a foreign import."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates that "jobs are being exported every day to other lands, and the resulting floods of imports are wiping out still more jobs."

Survival threatened

"As you know only too well, those imports threaten not only the survival of domestic industries engaged in the manufacture of goods, but of many others that had not in the past been regarded as vulnerable to unfair foreign competition, such as electric power production," he said.

"More and more of your members are finding themselves in the same boat as their brothers and sisters who make garments and steel."

Eighteen resolutions were adopted during the three-day convention in charting the union's course for the next four years. The measures call for strong opposition to the importation of electrical energy from Canada, establishing effective safety and health standards for utility workers, setting up a national union safety resource center on toxic substances, support for the development of nuclear energy and the Clinch River breeder reactor, and reducing radiation exposure on the job.

Delegates unanimously re-elected Joy, Hicks, and national Vice President C. Joseph Luciano. They also chose Francis Owens, former business manager of New York Local 1-2, to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Valentine P. Murphy as executive vice president.

Stepped-up monitoring

Closer watch urged on IMF operations

Congress has a responsibility to examine more closely the type of lending that goes on through the International Monetary Fund, the AFL-CIO told a Senate subcommittee considering a request for an added $3.5 billion American contribution to the IMF.

"There should be procedures adopted to assure that the (private) banks that have made loans to countries which then become financially troubled and cannot pay as scheduled will absorb part of any losses," said Director Henry B. Schechter of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy.

"Furthermore, the banks should not be permited to profit by charging high fees for the refinancing on the loans when they are rescheduled under IMF intervention."

Schechter cited a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council recognizing the need for IMF action to help debtor nations out of their precarious positions. It also recognized, however, the huge cost in dollars to U.S. taxpayers and in jobs to U.S. workers.

Changes needed

The council called for a number of legislative and U.S. policy changes as part of the package authorizing the additional $8.5-billion U.S. participation in the IMF.

Several of the legislative proposals would expand the monitoring function by the Federal Reserve Board. The central bank would be required to increase its surveillance of foreign lending by U.S. banks and to restrict such lending depending on its impact on credit availability and the cost to the U.S. economy as well as the debtor nation's capability of repayment.

The FRB also would be directed to require special bank reserves to cover part of future U.S. contributions to IMF expansion.

Finally, the Federal Reserve Board would be required to report to Congress regularly on the volume, terms, and quality of foreign credit extension by U.S. banks and its effect on the U.S. economy with respect to international trade positions and the availability and cost of credit in the domestic economy.

"The requirements proposed by the AFL-CIO would go far beyond the requirements that the Administration and financial regulators recommend for a strengthened examinations program to advise bank management when loans are too risky and to have more disclosure for the benefit of investors and depositors."

The IMF is supported by quota subscriptions of its member countries. The United States has the largest quota subscription, about 21 percent. At the end of 1982, this had accounted for a net addition to the U.S. Treasury debt of $5.1 billion, plus an additional $1.2 billion resulting from U.S. loans to the IMF's General Agreements to Borrow and Supplementary Financing facility, Schechter noted.

Under recent agreements among IMF members calling for increases in the national quota and in the General Agreements to Borrow fund, the United States would be obligated for another $8.5 billion, of which 25 percent would be paid immediately and the rest drawn as needed.

U.S. obligation

"Given recent trends of calls from the IMF and the tremendous amount of debt rescheduling being required by developing countries and some Eastern bloc countries," Schechter said, "there is a good likelihood that the entire $8.5 billion would be required before long. That would bring the U.S. Treasury cumulative debt increase related to IMF operations to about $15 billion.

With this much of a U.S. investment, the AFL-CIO stressed, Congress has a direct dollar interest in the international lending operations of the banks, should be informed about such operations much more fully and frequently than until now, and should establish additional necessary safeguards to govern such operations.

Private banks in the United States as well as in other countries that engage in international lending are the beneficiaries of the IMF expanding operation funded through a significant degree with U.S. Treasury money, Schechter said.

Labor educators study techniques to assist workers

Nashville, Tenn.—Techniques to help labor educators respond to the needs of workers in difficult economic times were the focus of the annual AFL-CIO Education Conference.

The four-day session, which drew some 125 union and university labor educators, was held jointly with the University & College Labor Educators Association. AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields co-chaired the conference with UCLEA President Richard Hindle.

In the first part of the conference, participants assessed major problems facing workers and their unions, including plant closings, high unemployment, technological displacement, and foreign competition. The AFL-CIO's proposals for jobs creation programs was also examined.

New technology

A major goal of the meeting was an exploration of new communications technology and its uses for labor educators in all areas of trade union activity.

A presentation on effective use of communication's technology by educators was made by Nick DeMartino, associate director of AFL-CIO's Labor Institute of Public Affairs. Staff members of seven AFL-CIO affiliates provided information on several demonstration projects utilizing new technology, including satellite communications, video tape, cable television programming and computer training.

Among the workshops demonstrating innovative labor education programs were video tape and slide shows on such topics as combating union-busters and promoting union benefits.

Ellen Wernick, education and research director of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, detailed CLUW training programs used in its Empowerment of Union Women Project, which is designed to encourage women to participate more fully in their unions and to sharpen their leadership skills.

The conference also heard trade unionists from Austria and Britain discuss labor education programs in their countries.

tries and just put through a final assembly process in a nation with duty-free privileges.

The AFL-CIO plan would limit duty-free concessions to a maximum of six years, instead of the 12 years proposed by the Administration. It would add to the list of import-sensitive exclusion from the duty-free list various steel products, watches, electronic articles and glass products. Also barred would be products subject to voluntary export restraints by other U.S. trading partners.

Phaseout urged

Koplan urged that expansion of trade preferences for Caribbean and Central American nations be coupled with the phaseout of duty-free privileges for industrial nations that no longer can be considered underdeveloped.

The AFL-CIO testimony urged that economic preferences be used as leverage to improve conditions of the people of the countries and to further programs such as land reform. Labor's proposals, he said, were shaped by the AFL-CIO after consultation with unions in many of the countries involved and with members of Congress.

Koplan urged congressional oversight over any special trade advantages to a country such as Suriname, where citizens opposed to the ruling dictatorship have been arrested, tortured and murdered.

Eligibility for duty-free access to U.S. markets should carry with it a commitment to "basic human rights, safety in the workplace, and the right to organize and bargain collectively," Koplan urged.

A Caribbean Basin bill, he said, should also include provisions in other U.S. trade legislation barring concessions to countries that fail to cooperate with the United States to stop drug smuggling or that give sanctuary to international terrorists.

Under the existing Generalized System of Preferences, most of the duty-free imports into the United States have come from Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong, Mexico and Brazil, Koplan reminded the committee.

It's time to "graduate" the industrialized nations that have "monopolized the benefits derived from duty-free treatment," Koplan urged. That would give the Caribbean Basin countries a better opportunity to compete for the benefits of preferential trade with the United States.

Three-part plan

In early 1982, President Reagan proposed a three-part Caribbean Basin program of economic aid, trade preferences and tax incentives for investment in the Caribbean and Central American nations.

Congress approved economic assistance, which the AFL-CIO generally supported, sidetracked the tax preferences and deadlocked over the trade provisions. In the lame-duck session last December, the House passed an amended version of the Administration plan but the Senate did not act on it before adjournment of the 97th Congress.

BLS challenged on new productivity measure

The Bureau of Labor Statistics' new multifactor productivity series distorts the common understanding of productivity, uses faulty methodology and is less comprehensive than the traditional measure of worker output per hour, the AFL-CIO charged.

Federation Economist William J. Cunningham, chairman of the productivity subcommittee of BLS's Labor Research Advisory Committee, said the AFL-CIO registered strong protests against issuance of the new measure before its initial release on Apr. 6.

BLS said the new multifactor productivity series is designed to show the changes in the amount of labor and capital used in production.

"As such, it reflects the joint effect of many influences, including changes in technology, the level of output, utilization of capacity, the organization of production, managerial skills, as well as changes in the characteristics and efforts of the workforce," a BLS announcement said.

But, in fact, Cunningham pointed out, the new multifactor measure leaves out the contribution of investment in new plant and equipment in measuring productivity.

"When we want to talk about the contribution of productivity toward a higher standard of living," he said, "we are interested in the overall productivity increase, including the contribution of new plant and equipment.

"The output-per-worker-hour productivity measure is still the best measure of overall productivity because it includes the contribution of all factors relating to productivity, including capital investment."

Annual update

The initial report in the multifactor series provides data covering 1948 to 1981. The series will be updated every September. BLS said the new measure will supplement the existing measure, which measures the output of all persons.

"Basically," says Cunningham, "the multifactor measure is arrived at by removing the contribution of capital investment to overall productivity. The resulting figure has little apparent application except to tell us the effect of a variety of sometimes offsetting factors.

"For example, while a better-educated, better-trained workforce and new technology may have contributed greatly to productivity growth, that contribution has been offset by the lower productivity caused by the recession, unemployment, idle plant and equipment and the damage done by high interest rates and the rapid influx of imports."

The measure contains no information about these factors, he said.

The new measure shows that the nation's productivity rose by an annual average of only one-tenth of 1 percent from 1973 through 1981. The traditional measure of output per hour during the same period showed a rise of eight-tenths of 1 percent a year. Therefore, the growth in business capital per hour, according to the new BLS measure, contributed seven-tenths of 1 percent per year to the growth in output per year.

The new series does indicate that inadequate investment was not a major factor in the sharp decline in the growth of productivity in the 1970s. It gives support to those who argued over the past several years that special tax breaks for investments that were part of the Reagan tax policy program were unnecessary.

Cunningham said the accuracy of the new measure is clouded by dubious methods used to estimate capital stock and the erroneous use of the profit rate to calculate the contribution of capital stock to productivity.

Accuracy questioned

"BLS does not have the tools to accurately measure multifactor productivity or to measure the contributions of other factors such as education and new technology," he said.

"The process of measuring these factors is still in an experimental stage and a subject of study by academicians. It is not really appropriate for BLS to publish a statistical measure which still belongs in the realm of experimentation."

Seafarers upheld in NLRB charges against barge line

Louisville, Ky.—A National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge has found American Commercial Barge Lines guilty of numerous unfair labor practice charges and has ordered the Jeffersonville, Ind., company to bargain in good faith with the Seafarers.

Judge Thomas D. Johnston also ruled in a 180-page decision that the company had discharged SIU members for union activities; refused to use the SIU hiring hall as required in the contract; unilaterally instituted a new pension and welfare plan; unilaterally and unlawfully refused to contribute to various SIU programs and trust fund, and repeatedly refused union representatives access to ACBL vessels.

Besides ordering the company to begin bargaining on a new contract, the decision requires the company to rescind its pension and welfare plans and make contributions to the union's plans retroactive to April 1980; offer employment to the illegally discharged workers with full back pay and interest; use the union hiring hall, and allow SIU representatives access to ACBL vessels.

Costly tactics

SIU President Frank Drozak said, "ACBL's union-busting tactics have not only failed to accomplish destruction of this union, but will result in great expense to ACBL in terms of lost time, manpower and monies."

The SIU is seeking a new agreement for the nearly 400 members on ACBL vessels to replace a contract that expired in December 1979.

In another contract dispute, 200 SIU members went on strike against Dixie Carriers, Inc., of Houston after its three-year contract expired Mar. 31.

Drozak charged that Dixie Carriers has "made clear its intention to effectively reverse many time-honored contract provisions by seeking to abolish the hiring hall, mandating a probation period, gutting seniority, hospitalization and pension, and eliminating the subcontracting clause."

He said the company attempted to divide SIU's membership between the licensed and unlicensed crew—tactics that fit a pattern used by giant corporations.

For maritime jobs

Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.) tells a Maritime Trades Dept. seminar that legislation to revitalize the nation's merchant fleet would create as many as 112,000 new jobs. The bill is designed to reverse the serious decline in the U.S. bulk cargo fleet while strengthening national security. MTD President Frank Drozak is at right. Some 300 maritime, shipping, government, and labor representatives attended the conference at the Seafarers' headquarters in Camp Springs, Md.

Quick notice asked of ban on social security pullouts

The Service Employees called for "quick action" by the Internal Revenue Service to advise non-profit employers they can no longer withdraw from the social security system.

Since Congress closed the withdrawal loophole for non-profit employers with the 1983 amendments to the Social Security Act, SEIU President John J. Sweeney said in a letter to IRS Commissioner Roscoe Egger, the SEIU wants to "make sure the problem is put to rest as quickly as possible."

"Unless action is taken immediately," Sweeney said, numerous non-profit employers whose withdrawals from social security were scheduled to take effect Mar. 31 could stop deducting social security taxes.

"At the very least, this will confuse employees of those institutions," Sweeney said. "At the worst, it could make them liable for significant back taxes once the true situation is revealed to them and their employers."

Sweeney said the 1983 amendments, which require mandatory participation by all non-profit employers in the system as of Jan. 1, 1984, will stop "the hemorrhaging of the social security system due to withdrawals."

Sweeney told Egger that "considerable confusion surrounds the current situation. Misled by hard-sell campaigns from insurance brokers, hospitals are continuing to file withdrawal notices."

"He said workers are still being told of "the allegedly rosy future of being out of the social security system and away from unwelcome government regulations."

Wave of withdrawals

The SEIU, which includes representation of health care and public workers, has fought a wave of social security withdrawals by hospitals and local government employers for the past year and a half. More than 1,000 non-profit employers have filed two-year withdrawal notices since 1980.

The union had won a partial victory in federal court with a ruling that the IRS must make a limited disclosure of the names of employers filing withdrawal notices. Under previous law, employers were not required to notify employees that they had filed for withdrawal.

Reagan battles Congress over economic course nationwide radio speech that repeal of tax-bracket indexing "would wreck the progress we have made" and said he would veto any such action. The tax cuts, which have gone mostly to those with the highest incomes, are needed to stop "creeping socialism," the President insisted.

The House, meanwhile, prepared to take up a recession-relief measure the Administration opposes and labor supports.

It would set up a loan fund to enable jobless homeowners who have fallen behind on mortgage payments avoid foreclosure.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged that it be strengthened with an amendment that would provide comparable assistance to recession victims facing eviction from rented apartments.

On deck is a second-phase jobs bill approved by a House Education & Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), who was co-author with the late Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of the long-neglected Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act.

It would provide direct grants to local governments to allow them to hire long-term unemployed persons to restore, rehabilitate and maintain public facilities.

$5 billion to start

As approved by the subcommittee, the bill would authorize $5 billion for the remainder of this fiscal year and then authorize funds for future years that would rise or fall with the level of unemployment. The target would be to provide public service jobs for 20 percent of the nation's long-term unemployed.

The full Education & Labor Committee had been scheduled to mark up the bill on Apr. 13 but action was postponed to let the subcommittee consider language to tighten guarantees that local governments would not lay off regular workers and replace them with persons hired with the federal funds.

The Administration opposes the bill and President Reagan has attacked public service employment as what he calls "make-work" jobs.

Rep. Burton mourned as labor's ally

The trade union movement lost a staunch and effective ally through the death of Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.), a key strategist for liberal causes during his 18 years in Congress.

Burton, 56, was stricken by a heart ailment in his San Francisco congressional district. He had been chairman of the Labor-Management Relations subcommittee of the House Education & Labor Committee and had a career COPE record of 226 "right" and only 15 "wrong" votes.

Burton is a former chairman of the Democratic Study Group, the liberal caucus in the House, and in 1976 came within one vote of election of House majority leader. He was the author of the congressional redistricting plan adopted by the California legislature last year which was a contributing factor in a six-seat Democratic pickup in last November's election. Republicans had targeted his seat for a major retaliatory effort but Burton won easy re-election to a 10th term.

David Taylor appointed deputy director of ILO

Geneva—David P. Taylor has been appointed to a five-year term as a deputy director general of the International Labor Organization, ILO Director General Francis Blanchard announced.

The 1983 Union-Industries Show drew record crowds during its six-day run in St. Louis. The free public show featured 300 exhibits by AFL-CIO unions, employers, government agencies and community service organizations.

It was produced and managed by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., which stages the show in a different major city every year to combine entertainment with an educational message about workers and their unions. Popular events at the show were the many live craft and skill demonstrations by union members. Some let show visitors try their own hands at jobs; others provided a close-up view of jobs and skills.

More than $100,000 worth of prizes, free samples and valuable products were given away. The show stressed the role of unions in advancing and protecting the interests and rights of workers, as well as the positive role the labor movement plays throughout American life.

20 Years Apart

THIS IS A tale of two presidential administrations, exactly 20 years apart.

Go back to April of 1963, early in the third year of John F. Kennedy's presidency. The Labor Dept. has just announced a drop in the unemployment rate from 6.1 percent to 5.6 percent.

That was substantially less than when President Kennedy took office, but the Administration was not sending up any cheers.

W. Willard Wirtz was Secretary of Labor at the time, and the AFL-CIO News for Apr. 6, 1963, recorded his reaction.

It's not good enough, Wirtz told reporters. "My feeling is about what it would be if somebody's temperature dropped from 104 degrees to 103 degrees."

The 5 million persons still unemployed, and those others who weren't counted because they had given up the job search, represent "human waste, human tragedy, a problem that this nation has to face."

Wirtz called for passage of the Kennedy Administration's Youth Employment Opportunities bill to give job experience and training to tens of thousands of out-of-school, out-of-work youngsters.

He urged putting people to work building schools, highways, hospitals and water projects, called for improvement of unemployment benefits, and urged a cooperative effort by government, labor and management to provide jobs for workers displaced by automation.

BUT THIS, of course, is April of 1983, and there is a different Administration in office.

It is the third year of the Reagan presidency, and unemployment is substantially higher than it was when Mr. Reagan took office. But the unemployment rate has just slipped from 10.4 percent to 10.3 percent, and the White House is jubilant.

Larry Speakes, the deputy press secretary, cites the "extremely encouraging" news as evidence of continued progress.

The Republican national chairman, Frank Fahrenkopf, is even more euphoric. He tells reporters that now even President Reagan's critics would have to admit that he is "getting the job done."

President Reagan, meanwhile, threatens to veto "make-work" bills and seeks to curtail eligibility for unemployment compensation.

And just by coincidence, this Administration also has a "youth opportunities" bill it wants Congress to enact. It calls for fighting unemployment by lowering the minimum wage.

Turning the clock back may not be such a bad idea, after all. Say about 20 years.

Polish Ploys

POLAND'S RULERS continue to harass Lech Walesa because he refuses to renounce the goals of the free trade union movement he helped build.

They drag him away for police questioning, eventually release him unharmed except for the slander of a government statement implying that he was being released because he had "cooperated" with the authorities.

In fact, an angry Walesa made clear, he had refused to answer any questions about his meetings with Solidarnosc underground leaders. But that's an old trick totalitarian regimes regularly use.

The next day, his wife is called in for questioning, body-searched, and detained for three hours.

On an earlier occasion, Walesa had been bundled into a police car and driven on an all-day trip to nowhere to keep him from making a scheduled speech.

The reminder, all too vividly, is that 1984 is just a year away.

But it is not Walesa the man who represents the danger to the repressive regime, but the spirit that he and his co-workers at the Gdansk shipyard unleashed by their successful strike. It spread to every corner of the nation, and there is no way it can be bottled up again.

Freedom is just too contagious.

Decontrol to relight fuse on gas price skyrocket

By Press Associates, Inc.

Spring is here, flowers are budding and utility cutoffs are sweeping the nation.

It was bad enough that hundreds of thousands of gas-heated households were discontinued during the winter because people could not pay soaring gas bills. But now, with warmer weather, state moratoriums on cutoffs are expiring and those who cannot pay their energy bills will do without.

The consumer may learn more about this national scandal as the multi-billion dollar battle over natural gas decontrol heats up in Congress.

"The stakes are enormous," declares the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition (CLEC).

The coalition points out that natural gas prices have risen by a national average of 215 percent since passage of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978.

Under current law, the major oil companies which produce gas will increase the amount they extract from consumers by $135 billion over the next four years. Under accelerated decontrol sought by President Reagan, the increases would total $185 billion.

To check runaway gas prices, bipartisan support is mobilizing in Congress behind the Natural Gas Consumers Relief Act.

Legislative price lid

Some 84 House members led by Representatives Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) and Dan Glickman (D-Kan.) support a bill which would curb price increases under current law as well as the "backdoor decontrol" permitted by the government. A coalition in the Senate led by Senators Nancy Kassebaum (R-Kan.) and Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.) is pushing similar legislation.

The Consumers Relief bill would limit the rising costs to an estimated $64 billion, compared to the $185 billion hike sought by Reagan.

The Reagan proposal to decontrol all gas by Jan. 1, 1986, would double wellhead gas prices, increase residential gas bills by 67 percent and increase the nation's gas bill by $50 billion more than under current law, according to CLEC, and oil companies would be the main beneficiaries of skyrocketing prices.

Under current law, so-called "new gas" drilled after February 1977 would be decontrolled by Jan. 1, 1985, while price controls on "old gas" drilled before February 1977 would continue indefinitely. "New gas" prices have been allowed to rise in stages under the 1978 law.

Rollback and extension

The Consumers Relief bill would roll back gas prices to 1982 levels, extend controls on "new gas" until Jan. 1, 1987, and maintain controls on "old gas." It also would reform "take-or-pay" contracts that force pipeline companies to buy more expensive gas from producers even when cheaper gas is available.

The AFL-CIO recently told the Senate Energy Committee that without price controls, "American consumers are at the mercy of the monopoly power of natural gas producers and pipelines."

Those dependent on unemployment benefits, the coalition said, had less than $75 left over each week for food, housing and other expense after paying excessive home heating bills this past winter.

The coalition said natural gas prices have risen much faster than Congress anticipated when it passed the 1978 decontrol law. "This is in large part due to actions taken by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) to raise prices," it said.

Especially under its Reagan-appointed chairman, C. M. Butler III, FERC has been engaging in "backdoor" administrative decontrol, the coalition charged. Butler was formerly an oil company lawyer.

MEMO FROM COPE

ODDS 'n ENDS

CAMPAIGN CASH now so abundant — due to huge number of political action committees (PACs) —that U.S. House members have big bundle left over after paying all 1982 campaign expenses. New York Times reports 57 members have cash on hand upwards of $100,000 each (not too long ago you could run an entire congressional campaign for that) and that 17 of these had over $200,000. Another 66 were in the $50-$100,000 surplus range. Total left over among all House members $19.9 million—two-thirds of total public funding that went to Ronald Reagan and Jimmy Carter in 1980.

GREAT RECOVERY we're having, Reagan Administration informs us. Try telling that to the 6,564 businesses that went down the drain between January 1 and March 17, 2,000 more than preceded them in the same period in 1982, which was a record post-Depression year. Per-week average of failed businesses so far this year is 599. Last year, 486.

TELLING THE JOBLESS, too, about fantastic recovery isn't selling in Peoria, or anywhere else. Nearly two million more unemployed as of this February than a year before, in large measure because another indicator—factory utilization—was down to 68.5 percent from 72.2 in February of 1982. Unemployed gave Reagan an earful when he went to Pittsburgh recently to laud the marvels of high-tech, showing no recognition that revitalization of hard-hit basic industries is essential to a healthy American economy and promising American future.

'ADEQUATE LEVEL' of health care available to all citizens is an "ethical obligation" of our society, a presidential ethics commission insists. The 11-member panel, eight of whom are Reagan appointees, charged our government falls far short of this goal—at least by implication criticising Administration's deep cutbacks in federally-aided health care programs. The panel said: "Inequities still exist in the financial protection people have against the cost of (health) care, in the availability of health facilities and professionals, in the use of services and in the quality of care received." It said hardest hit are "working families of modest income, the very poor, members of racial and ethnic minorities and people who live in very rural and inner-city communities." That's a whole lot of people. It could add to that list the recently-unemployed, millions of whom lost health coverage.

IF FOR NO OTHER REASON, Ronald Reagan should run for re-election in 1984 to save the Republican Party from a gut-busting internal battle. That's the thrust of a warning issued by Rep. Guy Vander Jagt (Mich.), chairman of GOP Congressional Campaign Committee. He was even more blunt about it. "The Republican Party will tear itself apart" if Reagan does not run, he said, because the "pent-up frustration" of the GOP's right wing would be aimed at anyone trying to succeed Reagan. Many of the right-wingers already are ticked off at the President because he hasn't put through their entire agenda. They'd be even less willing to follow the banner of a less conservative candidate. Fact is, Reagan has done pretty nicely by them, but they're 100 percenters: To the truly pure, you are with us 100 percent, or you are not with us, period.

REAGAN HOLDS FIRM on third stage of tax cut, still hasn't caught on to what first two did to swell deficit. He repeats threat to veto any attempt to repeal final stage, due in July. Some members of his own party are poised to jump ship if repeal reaches debate and vote stage.

THOSE TAX CUTS, actually, are very deceptive. What they've done—combined with Reagan withdrawal of large chunks of aid to the states—is force states and localities to increase their taxes. End result is going to be gross redistribution of wealth in an upward direction—to the rich. Some economists predict by 1984 lowest 60 percent of nation's wage-earners will pay more in taxes than they did in 1980; next 20 percent in $20-$30,000 income range will pay slightly reduced taxes; the less than one percent making more than $100,000 will reap from $4,000 to $20,000 a year.

WHY THE BREAD LINES this recession when they didn't appear in other slumps since World War II? Brookings Institution says major reason is federal government provides far less help for jobless in this one. In 1976, for example, during another GOP recession, two-thirds of jobless got regular or extended unemployment benefits in an average week. In Reagan recession, only slightly more than one-third get that help. In addition, there's been simultaneous cutback in other forms of federal assistance that can help jobless. Reagan "voluntarism" just won't do what has to be done.

WATT DOESN'T SHINE in big PR campaign to persuade Americans he's best Interior Secretary since forests were invented. He turns up on any talk show that will have him, claims his conservation-environment policies "have the full support of the Congress on all issues" and that "The governors of the west fully support everything we're doing." The facts are he has as many critics in Congress as Anne Gorsuch-Burford and the western governors have given him unshirted hell on more than one occasion. One, Toney Anaya (D-N.M.) has called for Watt's resignation.

States Blaze Trail in Public Financing of Elections

Public financing of presidential campaigns works. The approach was used first in 1976 and again in 1980, when both Ronald Reagan and Jimmy Carter received $30 million for their campaigns from funds checked off by taxpayers on their federal tax forms.

The 1980 experience was skewed somewhat, however, by independent expenditures of more than $10 million spent by ad hoc committees on behalf of the Reagan candidacy. (About $1 million was used for Carter in the same way.) With both Carter and Reagan using public funds, therefore ruling out independent contributions directly to their campaigns, the independent expenditures route by non-candidate, non-party committees enabled private givers to funnel money into the presidential race.

Despite this, the process wins wide approval, and few would argue that the independent expenditures of 1980, at least, contributed substantially to the final result. Maybe in a later campaign they will.

If not overwhelming, citizen acceptance has been encouraging. Last year, 27 percent of all taxpayers checked off for the public campaign fund on their tax forms. The fund is expected to reach nearly $200 million when this year's tax season ends (it totalled $188 million for the 1980 campaign), enough to finance primary candidates who want to go the public funding path and, ultimately, the '84 finalists.

Which brings us to extending the public financing concept to U.S. House and Senate campaigns. The notion has been around a while. Proposals have been introduced in the past several Congresses, and again in the present one. Gradually, public and congressional interest increases, spurred now by the burgeoning of political action committees (PACs)—there are 3,400 of them—and growing public concern about their influence on election results.

But, realistically, public financing of U.S. House and Senate elections doesn't seem to be in the cards for the near term. Which is a pity, because the practice brackets congressional races. That is, it's used for presidential campaigns and — more and more—at the state election level.

In fact, the states are becoming trail-blazers in public financing. In the past 10 years, according to the Citizens Research Foundation, 17 states have adopted some form of public funding and there is a move toward it now on in at least 10 states. Like fingerprints, no two are exactly alike.

For example, in 12 states there is a citizen tax check-off arrangement on state tax forms similar to the federal check-off, in which the contribution comes out of what the citizen pays in taxes. In five, the state tax form provides a space in which citizens can designate they are willing to kick in a little extra of their own to finance state campaigns.

In some states, the funding is earmarked only for gubernatorial candidates. In others, certain other statewide officers. Some include state legislative candidacies. In some, candidates draw from public funding on matching basis with small private sums.

But, whatever form public funding takes, in the states where it's in practice it gets good reviews from both politicians and citizen groups, and reasonably good taxpayer willingness to contribute. Maybe Congress will join the pack some day.

* * * * * *

Meanwhile, interim steps keep popping up in Congress. Recently, a bipartisan group of 50 House members introduced a bill to limit to $90,000 the amount that any House candidate may receive in aggregate from PACs in a two-year election period. And the proposal would put a $200,000 spending lid on candidates in general elections for the House. It would provide, too, for partial public financing on a voluntary basis by candidates, with extra public money given to candidates whose opponents ignore spending limits.

Building trades leaders press for action on jobs

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland addresses building trades conference.

Conference seeks spur to recovery

By David L. Perlman

More than 3,000 local leaders of America's building trades unions proposed a top-priority "jobs agenda" to Congress and to the Administration, seeking bipartisan support for its enactment.

They pressed for firm commitments to a package of construction programs designed to fuel economic recovery while leaving a tangible legacy of housing, roads, new energy sources, industrial modernization and public facilities.

They heard pledges of strong support from leading Democrats who spoke to them, encouragement from Republicans seeking to change their party's course—and friendly words from Administration officials. But the keynote from President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. stressed that words are not enough.

"Neither Congress nor the Administration is doing all that it can or should do," Georgine declared. "America has waited too long to go back to work."

The grim backdrop to the department's three-day national conference was continued Depression-level joblessness.

One in four

The unemployment epidemic, now in its second year, has struck down one out of four members of the 15 affiliated construction crafts—1,072,000 out of 4,100,000 members.

"That makes 1,072,000 reasons why the principal item on our agenda must be jobs," Georgine said.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the delegates that their agenda is a central part of the AFL-CIO's comprehensive economic recovery program.

He scored the paradox of high unemployment among experienced construction workers while "millions of Americans cannot find reasonably priced housing. And

Senate stalls withholding of tax on interest

A labor-supported effort to prevent abandonment of a scheduled withholding tax on dividend and interest income shifted to the House after the Senate caved in to pressure generated by the nation's banks.

At stake is an estimated $4 billion a year in revenue needed to pay for essential programs and hold down the budget deficit. That's what the government loses because many taxpayers—especially those in higher income brackets—don't list their income from stocks and bank deposits.

By contrast, wages and salaries have long been subject to withholding and are fully taxed.

The Senate stopped short of outright repeal of the 10 percent withholding requirement that is scheduled to go into effect on July 1. Instead, it voted 91-5 for a so-called "compromise" that would delay withholding at least four years.

The controversy split party lines. In the first stages, when the issue was outright repeal, President Reagan said he would veto any repeal bill. Other foes of repeal included, in addition to the AFL-CIO, the Republican leadership in the Senate and the Democratic leadership in the House.

GOP divided

The Senate battle began with Sen. Bob Kasten (R-Wis.) leading the fight for repeal and Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.) the chief opponent.

When it became obvious that the repeal forces had the votes to win, Dole and Kasten agreed on a compromise that was widely viewed as a face-saver to avoid an embarrassing defeat for the President and get him off the hook on his promise to veto a repeal bill.

The first step was a 55-40 vote to table a motion for outright repeal of the withholding tax. This paved the way for adoption of the compromise which most observers consider tantamount to repeal.

The action was taken as an amendment to a Senate-initiated reciprocal trade bill, which was then passed and sent to the House by voice vote. But that could add a new dimension to the legislative battle still ahead.

Under the Constitution, revenue measures are required to originate in the House. And while there are numerous gray areas of interpretation, the House has historically resisted any erosion of its prerogatives. A point of order would almost certainly be raised against taking up the Senate-initiated measure.

Petition filed

A discharge petition to force the Ways & Means Committee to bring a bill to repeal the withholding requirement to the House floor was filed earlier this year but has failed to get the needed 218 signatures.

A letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urging House members not to sign the discharge petition attacked the "misleading lobbying campaign of the banks" and emphasized that the withholding requirement does not represent a new tax but a "long overdue" improvement in tax collection.

Denison noted that the law provides for exemption of lower-income persons, especially the elderly, from the withholding requirement.

Security, jobs at stake

New approach sought to revitalize industry

America's crumbling industrial base must be rebuilt in order to sustain a full employment economy and preserve the United States as a world power, labor witnesses insisted at House hearings.

In joint testimony, the AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept. stressed labor's concern at the wipeout of manufacturing jobs and the lack of any "coherent national policy" to reverse the trend.

Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor, testifying for the AFL-CIO, and Brian Turner, the IUD's legislative and economic policy director, pressed for both government and private-sector commitment to reindustrialization.

Joint commitment

"Success in rebuilding American industry will require a new kind of social contract among business, labor and government," they told a House Banking subcommittee. The panel, headed by Rep. Joseph G. Minish (D-N.J.), is holding hearings on a national industrial policy.

Another union witness, Auto Workers Research Director Sheldon Friedman testified on the specifics of the automobile industry's importance to the U.S. economy.

The AFL-CIO and IUD statement warned that the United States can't become a viable service economy with a handful of workers in "high-tech" jobs and the less skilled dead-ended in fast-food establishments.

Closing of plants and overseas production of goods also affects the service sector, the labor witnesses noted. "A weakened industrial sector therefore means fewer service jobs."

Cantor, who presented the joint testimony, stressed that the central issue is "jobs and incomes for Americans."

If the nation's industrial base is eroded, he asked, "where will the millions of workers in these industries find decent jobs at decent pay?" And "what will become of our great cities when their industrial infrastructure and public facilities crumble?"

Kirkland backs MX panel on missile deployment plan

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, acting on the advice of the Executive Council's Defense Committee, endorsed a presidential advisory commission's recommendations that the United States deploy 100 MX missiles in existing Minuteman silos. The council panel described the commission's plan as "thoughtful, balanced and feasible."

"In its key elements," Kirkland said, "the commission's report is consonant with the views expressed by the AFL-CIO Defense Committee in its interim report to the Executive Council last February."

Under the plan drawn up by the President's Commission on Strategic Forces, the MX missiles, each armed with 10 warheads, would be placed in silos in southeastern Wyoming and southwestern Nebraska that now house Minuteman III missiles.

At the same time, the council committee—headed by Vice President John H. Lyons—expressed support for the commission's proposal that the nation "begin designing a new, small single-warhead missile which could be deployed in several basing modes—e.g., in hardened silos and hardened mobile launchers."

The commission, chaired by retired Air Force Gen. Brent Scowcroft, issued its recommendations on Apr. 11. President Reagan formally adopted the package on Apr. 19. The commission was appointed in January to help the Administration break a long political deadlock over a way to reduce the potential vulnerability of

The play's the union thing

Lineman and Sweet Lightnin', a labor play commissioned by the Communications Workers, will have its premiere performance Apr. 29 at the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington.

The new theatrical production was written by Jehane Dyllan, an actor and playwright whose company, Union Sister Productions, Inc., is co-producing the play with the union.

CWA President Glenn Watts called the drama an "organizing play," intended to show that the union understands "the complexities of the modern workplace.

He termed it a "bold response to criticisms that unions are out of touch with their members."

Using the theatrical medium, he observed, demonstrates that unions "are prepared to use new tools to bring the stories of workers to life for the public, our members and potential members."

The story, set at a "composite" telecommunications plant in Memphis, Tenn., dramatizes the feelings of workers during an organizing campaign and traces their growing unity and determination during bargaining for a first contact against tough management opposition.

The play stars Dyllan as Lightnin,' an in-plant leader, and Paul Meacham as Lineman, a CWA organizer and field representative. Meacham has appeared on stage and in feature films and network television programs.

Dyllan also wrote, produced and acted in "Silkwood," a play based on the life of Karen Silkwood, a nuclear plant worker who was killed in a car crash on the way to a meeting with a reporter to talk about safety problems at the plant.

Meacham and Dyllan as Lineman and Sweet Lightnin'.

Following the Kennedy Center preview, the play will be staged at CWA's convention in Los Angeles in June and begin a national tour. Booking information is available from the CWA Organizing Dept., 1925 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006, 202-728-2370.

The play is directed by Bobbi Ausubel, chairperson of the theater division of the Boston Conservatory, and includes music by the Grammy Award-winning composer, Bill Danoff. The production design by Gail Van Voorhis incorporates photography by Earl Dotter and watercolor art by Susan Moeller.

UAW voting on Caterpillar strike accord

Detroit—The Auto Workers announced tentative agreement with the Caterpillar Tractor Co. on a new three-year contract to end the union's longest national strike against a multi-plant employer.

Details of the accord were not disclosed pending ratification of the agreement. Voting by 10 UAW locals in six states is expected to be completed no later than Apr. 24.

The strike protesting the firm's demands for wage and benefit concessions began last Oct. 1, when the previous three-year agreement expired. The longest previous strike by the union was against International Harvester in 1979-80, and lasted 172 days.

Some 21,000 active UAW members, plus 15,000 on layoff, would be covered by the new contract. The workers are situated in Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Colorado.

Sought concessions

Caterpillar, based in Peoria, Ill., manufactures earth-moving equipment and diesel engines. It sought contract concessions after reporting a 29 percent drop in 1982 sales, its first in half a century.

Hard hit by the recession, the company laid off thousands of workers, most of them UAW members. The firm went $172 million into the red for the first quarter of 1983, nearly equaling the $189-million net loss posted for all of last year.

Earlier this month, UAW President Douglas Fraser and Caterpillar Chairman Lee Morgan met in an effort to reconcile the parties' differences over economic issues and end the long and bitter dispute.

Program backed to foster democracy abroad

By James M. Shevis

Creation of a federally funded, privately run National Endowment for Democracy to foster and strengthen democratic values and institutions abroad "is long overdue," the AFL-CIO declared, as it pledged strong support for the proposed agency.

"This proposal could not come at a more important time," Federation President Lane Kirkland told members of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on international operations chaired by Rep. Dante Fascell (D-Fla.).

"We feel the pressures constantly from those needing help," he said. "At the same time, we see enemies of free trade unions and democracy pouring millions into efforts to defeat us."

Kirkland appeared before the House panel with the chairmen of the Republican and Democratic National Committees, Frank J. Fahrenkopf, Jr., and Charles T. Manatt, respectively. Fascell has proposed federal funding of the endowment, which was started with private contributions to the American Political Foundation from the two political parties, the AFL-CIO, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The foundation, established in 1979, is guided by a board of directors made up of Democrats, Republicans, independents, liberals, conservatives, labor and business representatives. Its Democracy Program has been studying the feasibility of establishing the democracy endowment since the spring of 1982.

Kirkland is a member of the Democracy Program's executive board, which is chaired by William E. Brock III. In submitting the study project's interim report to the Fascell subcommittee, Brock said:

Opportunity

"The moment is at hand in this country to invest the bipartisan tradition with new meaning through congressional adoption of our major recommendations and support for our package of new initiatives."

He said the series of non-governmental activities abroad is designed to expand the involvement of the two major political parties, labor, business, and other private sector institutions in the United States in the process of international political exchange and democratic assistance.

"There is a hunger for this project everywhere we've been," said Brock, noting that planners have been to a number of countries in the course of preparing the report. "People want it."

Fascell, who is steering the legislation to set up the endowment, said his panel will begin drafting a bill on Apr. 25. Its backers seek an initial two-year authorization with annual funding beginning in the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

While not an agency of the U.S. government, the endowment would be subject to congressional oversight procedures. Once in operation, it would disburse funds to instrumentalities created by the two American political parties, the American labor movement, business and other organizations, all of which would conduct international programs tied to the endowment's primary function of increasing the U.S. private sector's international involvement.

"We have spent lots of time in this country considering sanctions, military aid cutoffs, public outrage, and loan denials" to oppressive regimes, Kirkland said in his testimony. "But we have largely ignored the other side of the coin. We have failed to help those domestic groups who would use and protect these rights develop the ability to do just that."

As called for in the interim report, each of the two political parties would immediately create foundations, or institutes that would engage in exchanges with kindred parties and other groupings both in the industrialized democracies and the Third World developing nations.

The AFL-CIO would conduct its programs through its newly activated Free Trade Union Institute, while American business interests would set up a new Center for International Private Enterprise to carry out its aims.

The Free Trade Union Institute, originally formed in 1978 to conduct exchanges with unionists in Spain and Portugal, became inactive in 1981 but was revived in January to perform research and prepare publications in the area of international trade unionism.

History of helping

Kirkland noted that for several decades, the AFL-CIO has materially aided union development in Asia, Africa, and Latin America through its regional institutes.

"But there is something quite new and different about what we are suggesting here," he said. "First, the organization we hope to create will give us all an opportunity to share perceptions and wisdom. Naturally, given the long and durable experience of the AFL-CIO in this kind of work, I hope our successes and mistakes will be of some use to others.

"It also gives us in the labor movement the control and autonomy we must have to make our own decisions about what we think is right."

Kirkland said American labor would strive especially to help unionists abroad develop and participate in democratic electoral processes, offer new unions and those suffering repression at the hands of governments basic administrative support, and do more to publicize their plight and dramatize their needs.

Louisiana labor maps drive for heavy election turnout

Baton Rouge, La.—The Louisiana AFL-CIO's 28th convention focused on next fall's state elections and efforts to counter setbacks to workers in the recent special session of the state legislature.

Two workshops helped acquaint the convention's 605 delegates with changes made in the state's unemployment insurance and workers' compensation laws. Delegates approved two resolutions condemning Gov. David C. Treen (R) for calling the special session in January to push through changes in those laws.

State legislators for the first time capped unemployment benefits that had been tied to the average weekly wage. Stricter qualification rules were included in the changes.

Changes in workers' compensation included a reduced appeal time and stiffer requirements on qualifying for benefits.

Former Gov. Edwin W. Edwards, a convention speaker, called the changes in the two laws "cruel and inhumane" in that they add to the burden borne by workers for on-the-job injuries and unemployment.

In other resolutions the delegates supported passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, joint labor-management programs on alcohol and drug abuse, and purchase of union goods and services. Another resolution expressed strong opposition to natural gas deregulation.

The convention approved plans for the organization of phone banks in the upcoming elections to assure access to every union member in the state. The phone banks will be set up in New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Lake Charles, Lafayette, Alexandria, Monroe and Shreveport.

An updating of mailing and phone lists of union members will be combined with a voter registration drive this summer.

The state's primary will be held Oct. 22, with the general election runoff on Nov. 19.

Among other speakers were former COPE Director Al Barkan, Lt. Gov. Robert L. Freeman and Atty. Gen. William Guste.

The state federation's top officers were unopposed for re-election to new one-year terms. They are President Victor Bussie, Sec.-Treas. K. Gordon Flory and 1st Vice President Robert A. Quinn.

Steel import scheme draws sharp attack

U.S. Steel Corp.'s plan to import raw steel slabs from the government-supported British Steel Corp. has drawn the ire of members of the congressional steel caucus and a demand by the Steelworkers for Commerce Dept. action.

USWA President Lloyd McBride urged Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige to convene an "immediate consultation" on the intent of American steel companies to import semi-finished steel.

"There is no doubt we are faced with the importation of subsidized steel slabs," McBride said, referring to the import scheme which would cost thousands of jobs at U.S. Steel's production facilities in Fairless, Pa.

Intent flouted

McBride, concerned about the possibility of a U.S. Steel-British Steel deal, said importation of steel slabs may be a "subversion of the intent of the quota arrangements" set last fall in an agreement between the United States and the European Economic Community.

He expressed the union's "shock" that importation of subsidized steel slabs might be allowable "despite the heralded quantitative arrangement" negotiated last year.

Pennsylvania's two Republican senators, John Heinz and Arlen Specter, also wrote Baldrige to find out why steel slab was excluded from the international agreement and to learn if the department plans to restrict the entry of steel slabs.

Meanwhile, U.S. Steel Chairman David M. Roderick outlined the import scheme for the congressional steel caucus, insisting that it would save 5,000 jobs at the Fairless plant. He described two alternatives, one to keep the plant as it is and the other to invest $1.9 billion to update the facility.

Roderick said the first alternative would require the closing of the plant by 1990, and the other would be unprofitable, even though the company has the money to invest.

Loss of jobs

Under the plan Roderick favors, British Steel would cease its production of finished steel, concentrating on steel slab production, while the reverse would be true at the Fairless works. The Steelworkers would lose 1,800 members at Fairless if the raw-steel producing facilities were closed. There are about 6,000 employees at Fairless now.

The Commerce Dept. determined last year that the British government subsidized about 20 percent of British Steel's cost of producing steel plate, a product rolled from steel slab.

Roderick, however, indicated British Steel is in the process of restructuring and might not be subject to U.S. restrictions on the import of subsidized foreign steel.

'We're with you!'

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland tells more than 4,000 Orange County, Calif., building trades workers and their families that they have the federation's full support in their fight against increasing numbers of "double breasted" contractors setting up scab shops in the county. Kirkland attended the rally at the Anaheim Convention Center during the AFL-CIO Regional Conference held in Los Angeles, the third in this year's series.

he urged employment and training programs for young people, including expansion of the Job Corps and establishment of a new Youth Conservation Corps.

Kirkland urged the building trades locals to join with other unions in their communities for the Labor Day "marches, demonstrations and rallies" that will mark Solidarity Day III.

The delegates gave warm, applause-punctuated welcomes to the two Democratic presidential candidates who addressed the conference—former Vice President Walter F. Mondale and Sen. Alan Cranston.

Mondale several times brought the delegates to their feet with a slashing attack on what he termed "the most anti-labor Administration in modern times," a pledge to name a Secretary of Labor who "wants to work with organized labor" and to "enforce both the letter and spirit of the Davis-Bacon Act."

Cranston said that as President, he would submit a full employment program to Congress in the first 60 days of his Administration and "use the immense powers of the presidency to build a national coalition to support the plan." Never again, he said, should Americans "accept unemployment as a cure for inflation."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. linked the duration and severity of the recession to President Reagan's belief that "government is the problem." Democrats, he said, "believe government has to be an active participant in the rehabilitation of our economy."

O'Neill cited bipartisan cooperation in Congress on an assortment of major bills and said he has "no doubt" that there can be similar cooperation on shaping a budget that will include economic recovery measures. But "will the President work with us?" O'Neill asked. "He holds the key."

The theme of bipartisan efforts for at least segments of labor's program was sounded also by two moderate Republicans, Sen. John Heinz (Pa.) and Sen. Bob Packwood (Ore.) Packwood told the conference that he is prepared to lead a fight in the Senate against the Administration bill to make workers pay income taxes on any portion of health insurance premiums paid by employers that exceeds specified limits.

Workshop panels

The late Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) had been scheduled to address the conference, and his close friend and colleague on the House Education & Labor Committee, Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), spoke in his place. A number of other House members took part in workshop sessions on topics ranging from pension legislation to politics.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, who spoke on the conference's final day, proposed reconstruction of American industry along lines that have been urged by the AFL-CIO.

President Reagan, who had addressed the past two annual conferences, invited about 100 national officers and state council presidents to a White House reception, which Vice President Bush also attended. And two of his Cabinet members—Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan and Transportation Sec. Elizabeth Dole—addressed the conference.

Dole got a friendly reception when she was introduced and a few jeers when she spoke of "the tremendous job" that President Reagan has done.

Donovan earned some sprinkles of applause with affirmations of support for the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and his expressions of concurrence in the building trades theme that America can build its way out of recession.

Cites deficit

The nation is on the edge of "the longest, most sustained recovery in our lifetime," Donovan insisted. But only, he added, if "looming deficits" in the budget are "brought under control."

Jobs were the dominant, but not the only issue addressed by the conference participants.

Kirkland spoke of the AFL-CIO's experiment in seeking a pre-convention consensus for the endorsement of a presidential candidate so that labor's influence is not "divided and fragmented."

There's "an element of risk" in such an effort, Kirkland acknowledged. But he quoted an adage of the sea, "A ship in harbor is safe, but that is not what ships were built for."

America's workers, he suggested, "cannot wait six years for a new economic policy based on fairness."

Stay competitive

Georgine, in his opening address, voiced the determination of the construction unions to "go to the mat" with the proliferation of non-union and "double-breasted" contractors.

"We must examine anything and everything that prevents us from competing" with non-union bidders for available work, he urged, including such matters as work rules and manning requirements.

At the same time, he said, the unions will be pressing Congress to insist that the National Labor Relations Board follow the intent of existing labor law and stop allowing building trades employers to "walk away from their collective bargaining obligations."

1st quarter economic growth 'disappointing'

Housing activity tapered off in March, with starts of new homes down 9.2 percent, but other economic reports from the government were generally positive and signaled recovery from the long Reagan Recession may be at hand.

Nevertheless, the Commerce Dept.'s announcement that "real" gross national product grew at a 3.1-percent annual rate from January through March was a disappointment even to the Administration. Real GNP is the value of the total output of goods and services adjusted for the impact of inflation.

Other positive reports showed a 1.1-percent rise in factory production, an increase in factory use, a drop in wholesale prices, and a jump in personal income.

Yet millions of Americans remain out of work, with the official government jobless rate at 10.3 percent of the workforce. The 3.1-percent increase in first-quarter GNP was below even the modest forecast of White House economists and just within the accepted 3- to 5-percent range needed to reduce unemployment.

Along with the GNP report, the Commerce Dept. reported that inflation throughout the economy, as measured by what it calls the "implicit price deflator," rose to a 5.8-percent rate over the first three months of 1983, the highest since the fourth quarter of 1981 and well above other government inflation measures.

Energy prices down

The Labor Dept. reported that wholesale prices in March fell by one-tenth of 1 percent as energy prices dropped sharply for the third month in a row. For the last 12 months, wholesale prices are up by only 2.2 percent.

In an earlier report on production, the Federal Reserve Board said output of the nation's factories and mines was up 1.1 percent in March. Industrial production has now risen for four consecutive months, including a 1.5-percent increase in January and a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in February.

The March rise was mostly the result of a strong increase in the manufacture of construction materials to supply the housing market. That more than offset a decline in automobile production.

In a separate report, the FRB said manufacturers stepped up their pace of capacity utilization last month, reflecting gains across several industries.

The Fed said factory use rose seven-tenths of a percentage point, to 69.4 percent of capacity, after hitting 68.7 percent in February and 68.4 percent in January. Within the manufacturing sector, the FRB reported that the iron and steel industry "continued to reactivate capacity at a fast pace — its operating rate has risen from 35.5 percent last December to almost 52 percent in March.

UAW's Fraser to teach at University of Michigan

Detroit—Douglas A. Fraser, who will retire as president of the Auto Workers in May, has accepted a teaching appointment at the University of Michigan. He will serve as a visiting professor in the university's College of Literature, Science & Arts.

Fraser also has agreed to accept renomination to the Chrysler board of directors for a one-year term. He will continue representing the union position and sharing board information and decisions with the union.

Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell, right, meets with reporters.

Carpenters' new chief calls recovery talk misleading

By Arlee C. Green

As Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell sees it, the recovery from the Reagan Recession has been "microscopic."

"Our members are hurting" and need jobs, Campbell told a press conference. Over the past few years, the union's membership has declined from 850,000 to 700,000 with some 200,000 unemployed.

The Carpenters' recently-installed president faulted the Administration's refereeing of the economy, Reagan's refusal for a year and a half to admit a recession existed, and then his declaration in "about one and one-half minutes" that it was just about over.

"Talk of economic recovery is premature, misleading and a cruel joke on millions of unemployed," Campbell said. While recovery has benefitted "chiefly stock market speculators and a few mathematical geniuses who design microchips, the vast majority of solid citizens who work for a living or would like to if a job were available, have seen precious little sign of recovery."

The construction industry, Campbell said, has gotten little encouragement from the drop in interest rates and the cost of living, as unemployment remains heavy in most areas. He cited only Boston, New York City and Philadelphia as areas of strong employment for the Carpenters.

The Carpenters' leader charged anti-union forces are using this recession to "enlarge their beachhead in industry." He pointed to their "unremitting and heavily financed" efforts to persuade Congress to repeal the Davis-Bacon Act. He said the construction unions will fight this repeal move "all the way," as repeal of the prevailing wage law would wipe out "the hard-won gains of our unions during a half-century."

To combat the anti-union forces in the workplace, Campbell urged "every effort to provide a favorable work climate for union contractors" to assure that a fair employer "won't be penalized for signing a union contract." It is in the members' interest that union contractors "be able to function efficiently and to compete effectively," Campbell said.

He criticized the Labor Dept. for what he described as encouraging its field offices to "look with suspicion on the labor movement."

Staying competitive

Campbell commented on the successful program used in California and other states of providing union contractors with finance money from pension funds at near-market rates as a way of maintaining jobs and noted the importance of reinvesting in an industry to keep it competitive. He pointed to autos and steel as examples of industries where a lack of reinvestment has cost thousands of jobs.

Campbell declined to comment on a reporter's question on whether his union would help "roust Republicans from office" in 1984. He said the Carpenters will look at whom the AFL-CIO endorses in the presidential race in late 1983. Campbell, a federation vice president who will vote on the endorsement, said his vote will reflect the feelings of his members.

Kirkland supports MX missile plan

American land-based, intercontinental ballistic missile forces.

The bipartisan panel urged the Administration to reassess its current strategic arms proposal to focus primarily on limiting the total numbers of warheads on land-based missiles and to permit a larger number of missile launchers.

"Inasmuch as the commission's recommendation would steer arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union toward limiting warheads rather than launchers," the AFL-CIO Defense Committee observed, "it also reflects the position of the AFL-CIO Executive Council."

At the same time, the committee reiterated the council's position last February that increases in defense spending in the coming years can and should be held within a 5-7 percent range in "real," or inflation-adjusted, terms each year without jeopardizing national security.

AFL-CIO Vice Presidents who serve with Lyons on the committee are Kenneth Blaylock of the Government Employees, William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, Douglas A. Fraser of the Auto Workers, Frank Drozak of the Seafarers, Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Albert Shanker of the Teachers, Vincent Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers, and John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots.

Covers 35 ports

Early ILA pact brings pay gains for 50,000

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Longshoremen reached tentative agreement on a new three-year master contract with seven employer groups in the shipping industry covering nearly 50,000 dock workers at 35 Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports.

The proposed settlement was wrapped up five and one-half months before the current contract is due to expire, Sept. 30. Negotiators took only four days of direct talks to agree on wage and benefit increases.

Under the agreement, which must be ratified by the ILA general membership, workers will receive a pay raise of $1 per hour each year for the term of the contract. The straight-time hourly rate is now $14.

Employers also agreed to increase their contributions to the union's welfare and pension plans.

ILA President Thomas Gleason said he was pleased that the agreement contains no "give-backs," but in fact provides union members with improved pay and benefits.

Aside from wages and benefit contributions, the only contract change was an agreement to establish a standard for each port to determine when funds from the Job Security Program can be tapped to help finance guaranteed income, pension, and health benefits.

Job security funds

The standard will be either number of manhours worked or tonnage of cargo for the year ended Sept. 30, 1983. If manhours or tonnage subsequently drop below that level, program funds can be used. The program is a type of insurance plan built up through contributions by ocean carriers.

The parties compromised on employment levels by maintaining the status quo. Employers had sought to decrease the number of workers in container gangs from 18 to 14, while the ILA wanted minimum coastwide hiring levels for checkers and clerks.

Employer contributions to the ILA pension fund will go up 25 cents an hour each year, from the current $3 to $3.75, while contributions to the union's health and welfare fund will rise by 17 cents in the first and second years and 16 cents in the third year, an increase from $2 to $2.50 over term.

Shipping groups

The new agreement was negotiated with individual shipping associations from New York, Mobile, Ala., and New Orleans; the Council of North Atlantic Shipping Associations, representing Providence, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Hampton Roads, Va.; the Southeast Florida Employers Association covering Miami and Fort Lauderdale, and the West Gulf Maritime Association covering 10 ports in Louisiana and Texas.

Only one Atlantic port—Boston—abstained from the talks. The Boston Shipping Association withdrew from the Council of North Atlantic Shipping Associations last year.

Negotiations were simplified by a National Labor Relations Board decision in February upholding the legality of contract containerization rules, which preserve for ILA members the stuffing and stripping of containers within 50 miles of a port. The rules had been the subject of legal challenge for a decade.

Beginning Apr. 18, the parties reinstituted the rules. A last-minute effort by the American Trucking Association to obtain an injunction was turned down. Had the containerization rules been declared unlawful, the ILA had said it would have insisted on a number of new job security provisions in the new contract.

'Phase Two' public works bill backed to create jobs quickly

The AFL-CIO testified in strong support of a $4 billion accelerated public works bill that would make an immediate dent in unemployment and shift the economy on a faster track to recovery.

In sharp contrast, the federation pointed to the $240 million employment bill proposed by the Reagan Administration which relies largely on tax subsidies to employers and lower wages for young workers.

Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor said the labor-backed bill "recognizes that a successful jobs creation program requires money." But it and other economic recovery measures can be financed "by restructuring this year's tax cut and closing some of the more inequitable tax loopholes," he told the subcommittee.

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), chairman of the Public Works subcommittee dealing with economic development, is the sponsor of the bill. It is part of the "Phase Two" economic recovery package being put together by the House Democratic leadership.

The Oberstar bill would authorize grants to local governments for repairs and improvements of public facilities, with allocations based on unemployment levels.

The standard would be projects that are needed, that can be quickly started and can be completed within one year. It includes labor standards, opportunities for minorities and "buy American" requirements.

Despite claims by the Administration that "the recession is already behind us," it remains "still very real" for the millions without jobs, Cantor stressed.

Two-fold purpose

The Oberstar bill, he said "addresses both the unemployment problem and the problem of the nation's decaying public facilities."

The AFL-CIO testimony pointed to the effectiveness of comparable local public works programs in helping the economy out of the 1974-75 recession.

At that time, Cantor said, a $6 billion program "generated 110,000 on-site jobs and 66,000 jobs in firms supplying building materials. The added income of these workers resulted in additional sales and production, and is estimated to have generated an additional 249,000 jobs throughout the economy."

Labor supports the legislation, Cantor stressed, because it will "help arrest the decay of our public facilities and put people to work."

Its "side effects," he said, "include an increased level of economic activity, high-savings, investment, productivity and increased tax receipts."

PBS stations alerted to anti-union film

The AFL-CIO has alerted Public Broadcasting Service affiliates that the National Right to Work Committee has dusted off its phony "documentary" film about alleged union violence and is planning to peddle it to PBS stations via satellite on Apr. 28.

In a letter to all PBS station program managers, AFL-CIO Information Director Murray Seeger stressed that the film, titled "The Scepter of Violence," has already been discredited and that the committee has already lost one libel suit over its false protrayal of an incident.

Should any station decide to show the film, the AFL-CIO will expect the channel to air the federation's own film answering the "Work" committee's allegations in the interest of fairness, Seeger said.

He also asked that stations planning to use the anti-union movie notify the AFL-CIO in advance of the date and time of showing "so that we can inform the union members in your community of the right to a timely response afforded by the Federal Communications Commission."

Seeger pointed out that the committee first produced and distributed its film in 1981 to stir up support for its own legislative goals to have anti-union amendments attached to the Hobbs Act. The move failed in the Senate that year, he said, but the committee is renewing its attempt to force the film on PBS stations to coincide with a revived effort in the Senate for the Hobbs Act amendments.

The committee wants the Hobbs Act, which makes extortion a federal crime, amended so that any incident of "picket line violence" would become a stiffly-punished federal crime—but only if committed by a union member.

OSHA pushed for emergency benzene limit

A coalition of labor and public health groups, including the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept., has petitioned the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue an emergency standard sharply reducing the worker exposure limit for benzene.

The coalition called for an emergency standard limiting exposure in the workplace to one part benzene per million parts of air—a tenth of the current standard, which was set in 1971.

Group members

Besides the federation and the IUD, the petitioners include the Public Citizen Health Research Group; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Allied Industrial Workers; Chemical Workers; Rubber Workers, and American Public Health Association.

Before the coalition's petition was filed, however, OSHA in early April formally announced an advance notice of proposed rulemaking on a benzene standard, the first step in the lengthy rulemaking process.

The petition criticizes OSHA's decision to start the full regulatory process over again. The agency had issued an emergency standard on benzene in May 1977 adopting the 1 ppm limit on exposure. But the standard failed to withstand a court challenge by the American Petroleum Institute and others. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, later upheld by the Supreme Court, faulted OSHA for not providing "an estimate of expected benefits for reducing the permissible exposure limit."

The coalition charged that the new rulemaking procedure launched by OSHA "in effect ignores the agency's six-year regulatory history with respect to benzene and is in no way consonant with the Supreme Court's decision."

It stressed that the Supreme Court "nowhere suggested that OSHA must set aside the product of so many years of rulemaking and start from scratch."

Existing foundation

The coalition said the work OSHA has already done on the standard provides a solid foundation for immediate regulatory action, "since the only data the Supreme Court found lacking in the record . . . are now available."

The petitioners charged that the threat of benzene to workers surpasses the agency's requirements for a finding of "significant risk," adding that it is hazardous enough to satisfy the definition of "grave danger" and to oblige the agency to regulate it on an emergency basis until a final standard is developed.

Benzene has been linked to leukemia and other blood disorders, chromosome damage, respiratory irritations and dermatitis. Recent scientific studies on animals have shown benzene to be carcinogenic.

The petition suggested a "regulatory alternative less attractive than an emergency standard" would be a limited expedited rulemaking process, such as the agency used in developing a standard for inorganic arsenic. This could trim up to a year from the rulemaking process.

Fighting for Suriname

Exiled Surinamese trade unionists Glen Tjonkgakiet, right, and Dr. Henk Chin-a-sen update AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland on their efforts to restore democratic freedoms to their South American homeland. The two men, former executive board members of Moederbond, Suriname's democratic trade union center, are members of the Council for the Liberation of Suriname based in Holland, where they now make their home. Moederbond's headquarters were burned to the ground, its leaders arrested and murdered, last December in a move by the Bouterse military dictatorship to eliminate opposition.

Trade panel urged to keep curb on unfair shoe imports

Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley urged the International Trade Commission to turn down requests from Brazil, India and Spain for revocation of countervailing duties on shoes they export to the U.S.

Finley linked Depression-era levels of joblessness in the U.S. non-rubber footwear industry to a flood of imported shoes. The testimony pointed out that all three countries have been found by the Commerce Dept. to be heavily subsidizing their non-rubber shoe exports.

He urged the ITC, which makes recommendations to the Administration on trade matters such as import restraints and duties, to find that the domestic industry would be "materially injured or threatened" if the duties are dropped.

Under U.S. trade law, countervailing duties can be levied on imports to compensate for the amount the manufacturer of the product is subsidized by the government of the exporting nation.

Subsidized exports

Because of such subsidies, Finley said, it is difficult to see how the shoe industry, or any other U.S. industry facing the same kind of import competition, can survive "under conditions where no matter how strong an effort it makes to lower its costs, foreign governments can distort international trade by subsidizing their exporters."

He said that while more than 200,000 people were employed in the industry in the early 1970s, by 1977 employment had dropped to about 157,000 workers. Findings by the ITC that the industry was threatened by imports—and subsequent restraints imposed during the Carter Administration—slowed the job loss slightly, Finley said. But when President Reagan allowed even those modest controls to expire in June 1981, the quantity of non-rubber imports and the rate of joblessness shot up, Finley pointed out.

Between 1981 and 1982, the average number of workers in the industry fell 10 percent, from 142,600 to 128,800, a record low and a loss of almost 14,000 jobs in a single year, Finley noted.

Unemployment leaped from 12.5 percent for the industry in 1981 to a "massive" 19.4 percent in 1982, while joblessness was at 12.1 percent for U.S. manufacturing as a whole, he pointed out.

The injury suffered by the industry and its workers "is readily apparent even to a casual observer," Finley said, and he reminded the commission that its own "exhaustive" studies in previous cases clearly prove the damage.

Finley was joined in his testimony by representatives of the Footwear Industry of America, Inc.

In a related action, the industry group also announced that it had filed a brief in the U.S. Court of International Trade supporting the position of the U.S. government against the Florsheim Shoe Co.

Florsheim is suing to prevent the Commerce Dept. from collecting additional countervailing duties on shoes the company imports from India.

Under current law, the Commerce Dept. estimates a countervailing duty on goods, and importers deposit that amount. The department later reviews the duty, and if subsidies are found to be higher than the amount deposited, an additional duty is charged.

In the Florsheim case, the government found that actual subsidies on leather footwear from India were 15.08 percent of the value compared to the earlier estimate of 4.24 percent.

Rail walkout ends in accord on arbitration

New York—Conductors on the Hudson and Harlem lines of the Metro-North commuter railroad agreed to submit their unresolved issues with management to binding arbitration, ending their six-week-old strike.

The striking members of the United Transportation Union voted 159 to 28 to accept arbitration of the remaining contract issues in the long-simmering dispute.

The major unresolved issue to be decided by a three-member arbitration panel is the question of crew complement. The union wants the contract to spell out how many conductors and assistant conductors are to be assigned. The Metropolitan Transportation Authority, parent of Metro-North, has insisted that crew size is a management decision and should not be limited by contract provisions.

Overtime pay

Another contentious issue is the union's request for an eight-hour day. The MTA wants to have conductors available for both morning and evening rush hours on 12-hour shifts. It proposed layovers of up to four hours within the 12 hours, with pay for the layover at half-time rates. The UTU is seeking eight-hour shifts, with time and a half pay after eight hours.

The arbitration agreement calls for one member of the panel to be selected by each side and a third neutral arbitrator to be picked by the other two. The partisan arbitrators are to be selected within 30 days and the neutral member 15 days after that. If the parties cannot agree in time, the governors of Connecticut and New York —states in which the railroad operates— would pick the third arbitrator.

The panel will have 10 days to hear proposals and arguments, and another 40 days to decide. Meanwhile, the striking UTU members have returned to their jobs.

Action pressed to revitalize U.S. industrial base

The industries and jobs that are being lost, he noted, are the source of funding for both private and public sector jobs, "from school teachers to chefs."

Reaganomics is not the answer, the labor testimony stressed. The 1981 tax cuts for business have gone largely to industries with little need for new investment and in some cases actually encourage runaway plants.

America's trade deficit has grown and "in the public sector, the nation's network of roads, bridges, sewers and rails is being pushed to the point of deterioration or collapse."

Tripartite board

The AFL-CIO and IUD testimony reiterated labor's proposal for a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board, with labor, business and government members. It would shape programs and target industries and regions in need of special assistance. The board's operating arm would be a Reconstruction Finance Corp. that would invest public and private funds in reindustrialization projects. It would resemble the RFC that functioned during the 1930s, through World War II and into the early post-war years.

A role for government in the shaping of American industry is hardly a new concept, Cantor and Turner noted.

"Public canals and roads, private railroads and airlines were built with government assistance," the statement said.

It urged the need for the United States to remain "a diversified industrial nation" and affirmed that "this can best be accomplished through the active participation of government, labor and industry in a major reindustrialization effort."

Union-sponsored billboard points up gap in Kansas City Star's coverage of issues in its long-running dispute with its employees.

Public Affairs Institute issues first edition of Video Bulletin

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs shipped the first edition of the Labor Video Bulletin this week to 160 subscribers, mostly state AFL-CIO central bodies and affiliated national and international unions.

The Bulletin, a bi-weekly videocassette service, is the first test of the institute's mandate to improve the internal communication capabilities of the labor movement through new media techniques.

Each edition features a video "table of contents" that lets users quickly find and screen the segments they most want to use. The first edition is introduced by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland who is chairman of LIPA, the federation's television production and planning arm. It contains four segments: a story about the UFCW/SEIU organizing drive at the Beverly Nursing Home chain, a report on the Community Services conference, a report about legislative issues in the Congress, and the LIPA spot campaign about unemployment.

Notice of stories scheduled for the Bulletin will appear regularly in the AFL-CIO News.

Initial distribution points for the videocassettes were determined from the results of a LIPA survey among AFL-CIO central bodies and affiliated unions to pinpoint those with access to video playback equipment. Additional sites are being added by many locals, internationals, federations and CLCs.

The Labor Video Bulletin distribution plan allows for one free video-cassette to each state federation and affiliated union in their choice of VHS, Beta, or ¾" U-Matic formats. Subscriptions are available to other authorized labor users at $500 per year for VHS or $650 per year for ¾" U-Matic. LIPA estimates that 18 Bulletins will be distributed in 1983.

Future offerings

If the Bulletin test is successful, LIPA hopes to expand such internal communication projects to other technologies, such as satellite distribution, live video teleconferences, computer conferences, and institutional cable television.

The Bulletin project operates under the direction of LIPA Associate Director Gwenn Kelly. Inquiries regarding subscriptions can be sent to her at LIPA, 815 16th Street, N.W., Room 406, Washington, D.C. 20006.

labor studies

The George Meany Center will offer five labor studies programs during May. The schedule:

Annual Labor Song Exchange, May 1-3—A short course for those who sing, write or perform for their unions giving them a chance to learn new songs and music from each other. The final session on May 3 at 8 p.m. will be a songfest for the public in the center's theater.

Stress as a Union Issue, May 8-11—A workshop on the causes of stress on the job, stress reduction techniques and related issues.

Advanced Techniques for Labor Education, May 8-13—A program for experienced staff members who teach and plan union education programs. It will explore the use of audio-visual technology and planning, recruiting for and conducting institutes, schools and conferences.

Advanced Grievance Arbitration, May 22-27—A training session for those experienced in arbitration to polish their techniques in presenting cases, cross examination of witnesses and preparation of briefs.

Occupational Health & Safety, May 22-27—An institute on chemical and physical hazards, on occupational diseases and worker and union rights under OSHA.

Two unions will use the Silver Spring, Md., campus during May for their own leadership training programs: Clothing & Textile Workers, May 1-6, and Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, May 22-27.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will hold classes all month for 40 union leaders from Latin American countries on collective bargaining and the labor's role in developing democracy.

Enrollment is open for three labor studies programs offered in June: The Automated Office, June 5-8; Organizing Techniques I, June 19-24, and Mini Computers for Local Unions, June 26-July 1.

More information on these or other labor study programs is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 1000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Corporate campaign

Anti-union publisher target of ITU drive

Union leaders and pension fund managers across the nation have been getting special messages telling them of newspaper union members publishing their own daily the last four and one-half years in the heart of Pennsylvania's coal country.

These same letters and mailgrams also tell of 140-plus newspaper workers on a major Midwest daily who haven't had a raise in nearly four years because they refuse to give up basic job security and pension rights.

A young executive type peers through a hole in a newspaper front page on billboards throughout the Kansas City area declaring, "You won't get the full story in the Star," and inviting viewers to make a phone call "for the facts."

A call to the number (area 816) is answered with, "Hi, I'm Ed Asner" (TV's Lou Grant and president of the Screen Actors). "Some newspapers think that if they're big they don't have to be fair. We don't agree. . . ."

It's all part of a campaign by the Typographical Union, endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, to try to make Capital Cities Communications, Inc., one of the largest and most profitable information-media conglomerates in the United States, "a responsible corporate citizen" in its labor relations policies.

Communications giant

The firm's properties include 10 dailies, two dozen weeklies, 16 broadcast stations, 51 cable systems, magazines, special-interest publications like Women's Wear Daily, and more.

The company made $96.3 million after taxes in 1982, up by 20 percent from 1981 and its 28th consecutive year of record financial performance. Its profit rate was 14.5 percent on revenue and 19.5 percent on stockholders' equity.

The letters and mailgrams are asking holders of its stock to vote for a shareholders' resolution at the firm's annual meeting, May 5 in Buffalo, that would require its officers to make a detailed written report on its "labor policies and practices."

The resolution was submitted by the League for Industrial Democracy, holder of one share.

Capital Cities tried, but failed, to get approval from the Securities & Exchange Commission to refuse to distribute the League's resolution to shareholders.

In a supporting statement the League points out that its aim is to "encourage our company to adopt measures to ensure good labor-management relations," noting that the firm "is currently suffering a loss at the Wilkes-Barre Times Leader."

Competition

Members of The Newspaper Guild, Typographical, Pressmen's and Stereotypers locals there have been publishing a competing daily, the Citizens' Voice, since shortly after striking the Times Leader in October of 1978.

"To avoid further losses, the company should seek to achieve good labor relations at all its properties," the League stresses, adding that "a necessary first step" is a study of its "labor policies and practices."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its winter meeting, asserted that Capital Cities is displaying a "corporate-wide pattern" in those policies which is "jeopardizing the rights and job security of its employees."

The council pointed to the firm's use of "a self-proclaimed 'union-busting' attorney" in bargaining with Typographical Union printers and mailers at the Kansas City Star and its use of strikebreakers from its other properties to continue publication during strikes at the Oakland (Mich.) Press and in Wilkes-Barre.

The council called on "all union members and pension funds which own Capital Cities stock" to assist the ITU in its effort to subject the company's labor-relations policies to stockholder scrutiny.

Company strategy

Capital Cities officers are urging stockholders to reject the League's resolution on grounds that the labor-policy report "would involve public dissemination of information" to its competitors and would require an "extraordinary expenditure of time and effort" and money.

In Kansas City, the focal point of the Typographical Union's campaign, printers and mailers have been working at the Star without contracts since 1980 in the face of company demands for elimination of job security bargained in 1974 and for switching from the ITU's portable pension plan to one managed by the company.

A support committee of national and area leaders of government, religious, civil rights and labor organizations had an advertisement in which they attempted to explain the issues in the contract dispute rejected by the Star. That rejection is one of the bases for the billboard message.

Members of the committee include: AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Asner, Msgr. George C. Higgins of Catholic University, former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., Georgia State Sen. Julian Bond, the mayor of Kansas City, Kan., and county legislators.

The ITU effort is being financed in part from its strike fund as an activity "in lieu of a strike," as authorized last year by the union's convention and membership in a referendum.

Ray Warwick dies, retired USWA publicist

Ray Warwick, a retired public relations representative of the Steelworkers, died in Washington, D.C., on Apr. 15 at the age of 72.

He was born in Atlanta, worked as a reporter for newspapers and both major wire services.

Warwick also helped establish the Newspaper Guild local at the Associated Press.

After service with the Southern Regional Council, he became southern public relations director of the Steelworkers and moved to the union's Washington office in 1954.

He retired in 1967 and is survived by his wife, Anna.

Arrest of African unionists protested

The AFL-CIO registered a vehement protest with the government of the Central African Republic over the arrest and detention of several trade unionists in that country.

In a cable to President Andre Kolingba, Federation President Lane Kirkland called for the immediate release of Sonny Cole, general secretary of the General Union of Central African Workers, and four other trade unionists imprisoned for their union activities since Feb. 1.

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO joins the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in seeking restoration of trade union freedoms.

Cole and his colleagues were being held for alleged incitement to strike. The union he heads, an affiliate of the ICFTU, was dissolved by decree in May 1981 after calling a general strike, but it has struggled to regain its former place.

Kolingba overthrew President David Dacko's regime in September 1981 and suspended all vestiges of trade union activity. Dacko, who ousted the ruthless Emperor Jean-Bedel Bokassa in September 1979, in a coup d'etat aided by the French government, had somewhat liberalized the restored republic, allowing a free trade union movement to exist. The General Union of Central African Workers held its first congress in May 1980.

The Roots of Freedom

THE UNITED STATES government can and should use its influence on other governments to advance and protect human rights. Often, in return for a trade concession or continuation of assistance, some gross injustice can be rectified or a particular oppression eased.

But having said this, it is important to say also that this is not enough.

History and bitter experience tell us that promises made by governments are easily withdrawn. Concessions made in response to world pressure are too often revoked when the spotlight of publicity and concern shifts to another part of the globe.

Human rights can be assured only when there are free institutions within a country to assert them. A free trade union movement has proved the most durable and dependable of democratic institutions.

No one can impose a democratic trade union movement on a country because the very nature of such a movement makes this impossible. And no trade union movement shaped by the dictates of even a well-meaning outside group can sink the deep roots it will need to survive.

But there is a role and an obligation that the AFL-CIO and its predecessor organizations have endeavored to carry out—assistance and encouragement to the cause of freedom and especially of free trade unions in every part of the world.

THE AFL-CIO and many of its affiliates have provided funds and staff to help to the limits of their resources the fledgling trade union movements of the underveloped nations and to fan the sparks of freedom that can never be totally suppressed even under the cruelest of dictatorships. Openly and aboveboard, labor has sought and obtained U.S. economic aid for some of its projects.

The resources have never been sufficient for the need, and that's a calamity because the enemies of freedom have unlimited purses when it comes to the battle for influence.

Labor isn't the only private organization concerned with human rights and especially freedom of association. Nor should it be. The trade union movement's experiences—both successes and failures—can certainly be put to practical use by other democratic organizations. And it makes equal sense that labor can profit from the experiences of other groups.

These are some of the concerns that motivated the establishment in 1979 of the very broad-based and bipartisan foundation which gave birth to the Democracy Program.

Out of this has come a proposal for federal funding without government control of private sector programs of assistance to democratic counterparts in other countries.

IN ONE OF the most unusual Capitol Hill presentations, the chairmen of the Democratic Party and the Republican Party, and the president of the AFL-CIO, testified together in favor of such a program.

Lane Kirkland opened the presentation with these words:

"We are here to give new and different attention to a simple idea all of us know and believe: protecting and creating democracy are more a matter of private relations—of unionist to unionist, of party member to party member—than of government to government discourse between diplomats, bureaucrats and transient political appointees. As the heads of both political parties who sit with me at this table know well, it is the sometime conflict and the sometime cooperation of groups like ours that shapes some sort of democratic outcome.

"Without us and our battles and agreements there would be no democratic process, no democratic government, no democracy. There are millions of others outside our borders who know this and want the same things for themselves. They know we are at least one example of how it can work."

The AFL-CIO's support for black trade unionists in South Africa, its assistance to victims of Chile's crackdowns against unions and its support for Solidarnosc "is work in behalf of both free trade unionism and democracy," Kirkland went on to testify.

"In our view, the two cannot be separated."

Fair Housing Act lacks real enforcement 'bite'

By Press Associates, Inc.

In 1968, the Fair Housing Act, signed into law as the last piece in a mosaic of civil rights laws enacted during the 1960s, pledged "to provide, within constitutional limitations, for fair housing throughout the United States."

While the laws against discrimination in public accommodations, higher education, employment, and voting rights brought lasting results, the same cannot be said of the fair housing law.

To explore the reasons for this failure and discuss what might be done was the purpose of a recent two-day conference of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing (NCDH). The committee was founded in 1950 at a time when segregated and unequal housing patterns were widely accepted.

NCDH President Robert C. Weaver, who served as Secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development under President Johnson, said "the fair housing law lacks bite," meaning an enforcement mechanism.

Two choices

Under the law, an individual who believes he or she has been discriminated against in the sale or rental of housing has two alternatives. One is to file suit in federal court, a lengthy, complicated, expensive process.

The other is to attempt conciliation with the alleged discriminator. But HUD lacks authority either to get the parties to conciliate or to enforce any agreement. Drafting administrative regulations is the usual first step in enforcing a new law.

Under President Carter, it took three years to get around to it, but those rules were quickly eliminated by President Reagan, whose Administration has backpedaled in most civil rights areas.

Conference participants, marking the 15th anniversary of the open housing law, noted that the question of fair housing hasn't received the high priority it deserves.

Also, "opponents of fair housing have an economic and emotional stake in the status quo," said Arthur S. Flemming, an Eisenhower Administration Cabinet officer whom Reagan dismissed as U.S. Civil Rights Commission chairman.

Obscure practices

Practices such as racial steering, redlining and misinformation are much more common and difficult to combat than outright refusal to sell or rent.

Although some find it convenient to ignore, "racial discrimination in housing remains a major persistent national problem," said Weaver, citing a HUD-sponsored study conducted by NCDH.

Fair housing, Weaver stressed, is not an issue limited in its importance to middle-class minorities, nor is it merely a desirable end in itself. It is an essential element in the effort to secure other basic rights such as equal job opportunities.

Bayard Rustin and other civil rights strategists pointed out that fair housing means little if there isn't enough housing to go around.

For this reason, the conference strongly criticized the Reagan Administration's phase-out of federally-subsidized housing. Congress was urged to reverse this trend in its budget actions.

Conference leaders also pressed Congress to write enforcement provisions into the fair housing law. In 1980, the House approved overwhelmingly such a bill, but it was snagged by a Senate filibuster.

A similar enforcement bill, to be introduced in the Senate by Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Charles Mathias (R-Md.), is a major legislative priority of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

Congress must redeem its longstanding promises to ensure the supply of housing open to all.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Senate Caves In to Bankers on Tax Withholding

The million-dollar lobbying and publicity campaign by bankers to repeal interest and dividend tax withholding appeared to pay off as the Senate approved a "compromise" amendment by Sen. Robert Kasten (R-WI) to delay withholding until July 1987. The tax compliance reform is scheduled to take effect July 1.

The focus now shifts to the House, where repeal efforts have stalled in the House Ways and Means Committee. The key vote may come on an effort to "discharge" the matter from that committee and bring it to the House floor.

The AFL-CIO is opposing the repeal of tax withholding. Taxes are withheld from workers' paychecks, so there is no reason they shouldn't also be withheld from savings interest and stock dividend payments.

If the bankers succeed in their drive to repeal this tax reform, Congress likely will be searching for ways to make up the lost revenue--and the result could be higher taxes for working people.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to oppose H.R. 500 or any other bill that would repeal or delay tax withholding from interest and dividend income. Also ask your Representative not to sign the petition to discharge H.R. 500 from committee.

Natural Gas Is Too Expensive; Act Now To Extend Price Controls

House and Senate energy committees already have begun consideration of natural gas legislation, and consumer interests could be buried under the pressure of oil company lobbying unless we begin to rally immediately.

TELL YOUR LEGISLATORS:
HOW MUCH ARE YOUR GAS BILLS?

U.S. Congress
Washington, DC
House: 20515 Senate: 20510

Dear Senator _____:

Dear Representative _____:

My natural gas bills have gone sky-high. Last month, I paid $_____ to the gas company. A year ago, my bills were $_____ a month.

Please cosponsor and support the Natural Gas Consumer Relief Act--H.R. 2154 and S. 996. This legislation will roll back gas price ceilings and extend government controls to 1987.

Sincerely,

The critical issue at this point is whether prices of "old" gas--gas discovered before 1978--should be decontrolled. Old gas, which accounts for more than half the gas now being sold in the interstate market, often costs virtually nothing to pump. It sells for as little as 20 cents per thousand cubic feet (mcf). The Senate Energy Committee already has voted to decontrol old gas, which would allow its price to soar as high as today's average price for all gas--$2.75 per mcf.

The result: another $40 billion windfall to the major oil companies, which own most of the nation's natural gas as well.

The oil giants claim they need these enormous profits to search for more oil and gas. But only 25 percent of the recent profits of the 16 biggest oil companies went to domestic exploration and production; a much larger share, 37 percent, went to acquisitions of competing energy companies and non-petroleum investments.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Let Congress know that you are angry about your soaring gas bills. Fill in the blanks in the sample postcard, left, and mail copies to your Senators and Representative.

Jobless Need Health Care Benefits Now

The AFL-CIO has testified before House and Senate committees urging speedy action on legislation to provide health care for the unemployed. Because the need among the long-term jobless is so great, Congress cannot afford to delay.

It appears likely that some health care program for the jobless will achieve passage. But the bills under consideration take widely varying approaches on such issues as level of benefits, means of financing, and choice of agency to administer the program.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your legislators to enact health care benefits for the unemployed.

In the House, H.R. 2552 deserves support. This bill could be improved by using Medicaid to help administer the program instead of state insurance pools. And the bill's grants to public hospitals should be strengthened.

In the Senate, S. 951 offers a good start. Ask your Senators to support amendments to increase its funding in order to expand coverage and benefits to all who need health care. And grants to the states should be made according to the states' total unemployment rates in order to allocate funds fairly.

Racked by imports

Empty garment racks at a New York rally of shipping clerks and other clothing workers underline the devastating impact of imports on jobs in the American apparel industry. The Ladies' Garment Workers demonstration was aimed at widening support for a congressional resolution calling on President Reagan to lower imports to 25 percent of the domestic market from the current 41-percent level. Congress pressed on health care aid for nation's jobless

By David L. Perlman

An emergency program of health insurance for America's unemployed drew the strong support of the AFL-CIO and vehement opposition from the Reagan Administration.

At House and Senate hearings, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison welcomed bipartisan sponsorship of health coverage legislation and called for quick action by Congress.

Millions of workers lost health insurance protection along with their jobs and the prolonged recession has left a large portion of them unable to meet medical expenses, he testified.

Then David A. Stockman, director of the Office of Management & Budget, went before the Senate Finance Committee to shatter illusions that the Administration would support such a move.

Any new federal entitlement program is "totally unacceptable," Stockman testified. "For all practical purposes, the federal government is insolvent," he insisted.

Stockman said the Administration was willing to require that employers give laid-off workers an opportunity to buy continuation of health insurance coverage at group rates for up to one year—with the cost paid by the unemployed worker. The only federal funds the Administration would consider, Stockman said, would be new revenue from taxing workers on the value of employer-paid health insurance even more stringently than the Administration has already proposed.

Political blunder

Stockman's testimony signalled that the hard-liners had won an internal Administration battle over the issue and Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) told the OMB director bluntly that the Administration was making a "terrible political and philosophical mistake."

The chairmen of both congressional panels holding hearings on the issue are among the sponsors of health coverage legislation. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of a House subcommittee on health, have introduced bills that differ in a number of details but include federal grants to states to meet a large share of the cost of a voluntary health insurance program for the unemployed.

States that participate could deduct up to 5 percent of unemployment payments in the Waxman bill and up to 8 percent in the Dole bill to help pay for the coverage cost for persons choosing to enroll in the program.

Similar measures

Other members of Congress have introduced legislation with similar intent.

At the House hearings, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser submitted a statement in "strong support" of the principal features of the Waxman bill. Fraser is chairman of the Health Security Action Council, the coalition that has pressed for comprehensive national health insurance.

Fraser cautioned that "health care protection for the unemployed will not be cheap. The problem cannot be papered

Contract bar proposed for scofflaw employers

Legislation to bar firms that defy federal labor law from getting government contracts was strongly supported at House hearings that focused on the union-busting tactics of Litton Industries.

Litton is a conglomerate whose subsidiaries do substantial business with the government despite multiple unfair labor practice offenses, unions that have dealt with the corporation testified.

The hearings by the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations were on the contract debarment bill introduced by Rep. Paul Simon (D-Ill.). It is based on a section of the labor law reform bill that passed the House during the Carter Administration but was blocked by a Senate filibuster.

Deterrent needed

Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel said legislation is needed because "slap-on-the-wrist" remedies don't deter employers from violating the National Labor Relations Act.

Employers have found it profitable to break the law, Samuel testified, and the occasional back-pay award to a fired union supporter "is just viewed as a reasonable cost of doing business."

Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), who has succeeded the late Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) as chairman of the subcommittee, said at the start of the hearings that it was "fundamentally illogical" for the government to reward employers who flout the law.

Since the focus of the hearings was on Litton's record, the company's executives had been invited to give their side of the case but had declined to testify, Clay said.

Machinists President William W. Winpisinger, whose union represents 2,200 Litton Industries workers in seven states, said most of the organized units were established before the companies were taken over by Litton Industries.

He cited a pattern of plant closings where unions get a foothold, the firing and harassment of union supporters, and refusal to bargain in good faith.

Other conglomerates are starting to copy the Litton pattern, Winpisinger warned.

Supreme Court upholds validity of pre-hire pact

A unanimous Supreme Court slapped down a construction industry employer who first sought the benefits of a pre-hire union agreement and then tried to evade its obligations.

The decision was in accord with the position taken by the AFL-CIO and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. in a joint brief to the Supreme Court. Labor's concern was that the legal arguments advanced by the employer in what appeared to be a simple case threatened the unique collective bargaining framework for the construction industry.

Trustees of a jointly administered health and welfare fund sued a California subcontractor who had failed to make fringe

'Do more' for jobless

Labor secretaries prod Reagan

Six former Secretaries of Labor, from both Democratic and Republican administrations, joined in urging President Reagan to "do more for the unemployed."

They called for a large-scale public service jobs program, for retraining with special emphasis on the plight of workers not likely to be rehired in industries where unemployment is shrinking, and for a nationwide extended unemployment benefits program that would continue until the jobless rate drops to "acceptable" levels.

The letter to Reagan, dated Apr. 8, was made public after weeks had passed without a response.

Its authors included three former Cabinet members who served under Republican presidents—John T. Dunlop, Peter J. Brennan and W. J. Usery, Jr. The three signers who headed the Labor Dept. under Democratic presidents were Arthur J. Goldberg, W. Willard Wirtz and F. Ray Marshall.

Their letter welcomed the jobs bill enacted earlier this year as a "first step," but noted that only a small portion of America's unemployed will find employment through its programs. The slow pace of recovery will leave unemployment at about 11 million a year from now, according to the government's estimates, they noted.

More needed now

The former Cabinet members urged hiring the unemployed for "useful and productive" public service jobs, and acknowledged that such a program will require "a large expenditure of public funds." But they insisted that "it is imperative to do more for the unemployed than present measures."

They expressed concern that "the loss of jobs very often is accompanied by the loss of health benefits," and at the stopgap extensions of unemployment benefits linked to state triggers. During periods of high unemployment, extended benefits should be available nationwide, they urged.

Even after economic recovery, "many workers will never be returned to their jobs," the letter noted, and "retraining is essential" to prepare them for jobs that will exist.

The six former Cabinet members wrote Reagan that they were submitting their suggestions "because of our common concern about the plight of the unemployed and because all Secretaries of Labor are mandated by law 'to foster, promote and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States to improve their working conditions and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment.' "

Zone proposal called no cure for jobless ills

The enterprise zone legislation sought by the Reagan Administration would sacrifice needed tax revenues in order to shift unemployment from one locality to another, the AFL-CIO charged at Senate hearings.

Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor said the AFL-CIO remains opposed to offering an array of special tax benefits and regulatory exemptions to firms that move into designated hardship areas, such as inner-city neighborhoods.

Government should launch programs to reduce unemployment, not just move it around, Cantor told the Senate Finance Committee. The "only certainty" of the Administration plan, he suggested, would be the loss of tax revenues and a new destructive competition among communities to attract "footloose businesses."

Inner cities are hurting from Administration cuts in federal services and grants more than they would be helped by the type of employer likely to be lured by tax breaks and low wages, he suggested.

By contrast, he cited the AFL-CIO proposals for expanded public services and local public works, for housing and other needed facilities.

Where assistance to employers is warranted, he suggested, it should be undertaken through a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board with labor, business and government representation.

"America must deal with the immediate needs of its 11 million jobless as well as the specific problems of particular groups of workers and distressed areas," Cantor insisted.

These needs, he stressed, "will not be served through proposals like enterprise zones which merely continue the myth that government is the source of our ills and that cutting taxes, lowering standards and reducing services are the cures."

Recession holds consumer prices to slight increase

Retail prices, as measured by the federal government's consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers, rose three-tenths of 1 percent in March, but most analysts believe higher prices are in the offing.

In the past 12 months, the CPI rose 3.7 cent and is up only three-tenths of 1 percent for the first quarter of 1983, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The sharp slowdown in inflation is largely a result of the deep recession that has held down wages and demand for goods and services. The CPI in March stood at 293.4 percent of its 1967 base.

Economists expect that higher energy and food costs will push up consumer prices in coming months. The nickle-a-gallon federal gasoline tax that went into effect in April, together with a halt to the decline in world oil prices, are expected to feed through to the consumer soon, analysts say.

Food prices already have begun to climb rapidly, with a 3.3-percent increase in fruit and vegetable prices last month "reflecting reduced supplies caused by the rainstorms in California and Florida," BLS said. Overall, food prices were up five-tenths of 1 percent in March, after several months of little or no increase.

Shelter costs up

Also responsible for the March acceleration in prices were a large increase in shelter costs and a slightly larger increase in apparel prices. The entertainment and other goods and services categories both registered increases, while medical care costs moderated.

Real, or inflation-adjusted, earnings, meanwhile, rose nine-tenths of 1 percent over the month and were a full one percent higher than a year earlier, BLS said

FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant tells Beverly Enterprises stockholders the nursing home operator is delinquent in its care of patients.

Proxy battle spurs unions in nursing home campaign

Pasadena, Calif.—Buoyed by its ability to persuade at least one large institutional investor to vote with labor in a proxy fight with Beverly Enterprises Inc., the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. said it would step up its corporate accountability campaign against the country's largest nursing home operator.

FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant said that Chase Manhattan Bank's vote of 482,000 shares in favor of the department's two resolutions seeking better patient care and against a management-sponsored resolution to increase stock options for officers and directors "clearly demonstrates that responsible institutional investors are becoming concerned with patient care as well as profitability."

The Chase vote at Beverly's annual meeting here so encouraged FBTD and its affiliates, Harbrant said, that "we plan to move forward with actions to hold other institutional stockholders accountable for Beverly's patient care."

Strongest showing

While the unions lost all three issues, their 1.3-million vote total—10 percent of the votes cast at the meeting—was believed to be one of the largest ever tallied by labor forces in such a confrontation with management.

The skirmishing followed a two-week proxy solicitation campaign among Beverly stockholders by the FBTD, whose two largest affiliates, the Service Employees and the Food & Commercial Workers, mounted a campaign of their own in January attacking the quality of care at Beverly nursing homes and seeking to organize employees.

"Because of our strength and our proxy count," said Jeff Fiedler, FBTD's director of corporate affairs, "we were able to negotiate a place on the agenda and to speak at length about the sorry state of patient care in the more than 600 Beverly homes across the country."

Third clash

It was the third year in a row that representatives of organized labor clashed with management at Beverly's annual meeting. In 1981 and 1982, FBTD candidates for the company's board of directors lost out to company-backed nominees.

SEIU and UFCW are now in a coordinated campaign to unionize the firm's 60,000 employees in 37 states and the District of Columbia and to reform patient care standards.

A minority shareholder in Beverly, FBTD opposed management's plan to increase the number of authorized shares under the stock plan, and sought the appointment of an independent panel of experts to study the quality of patient care at Beverly nursing homes and the establishment of search committee to recommend appointment of a long-term health care expert as a seventh member of the board.

At the meeting, Harbrant released the results of a new study based on questionnaires submitted to Beverly employees. The survey showed 80 percent of those who responded felt "low pay" was their biggest on-the-job problem, and 66 percent cited "lack of staff" as another major problem, Harbrant said.

Near minimum wage

Some 64 percent said they make less than $4.03 an hour.

"We received questionnaires back from employees at more than 160 different Beverly homes and the sample size is large enough to support our conclusions," Harbrant said.

"From our initial study and from the employee survey, we have learned that Beverly homes are chronically understaffed and that employees, among the lowest paid in the entire health care industry, simply don't have the time to properly care for their patients."

Bill to reduce manufacturer liability fought

Workers and consumers will be the losers if Congress limits the liability of manufacturers of defective or harmful products, the AFL-CIO contended at Senate hearings.

Special Counsel Laurence Gold expressed the AFL-CIO's "total opposition" to a product liability bill being pushed by the National Association of Manufacturers and other business groups. He protested that it would substitute limited federal product liability standards that are skewed to the interests of manufacturers for the right of injured parties to sue in state courts.

The bill's sponsor, Sen. Bob Kasten (R-Wis.), is chairman of the Senate Commerce subcommittee considering the measure. The full committee approved a similar bill in the last Congress, but it never reached the Senate floor.

Gold noted that the groups most actively pushing for federal legislation are usually trumpeting state jurisdiction on such matters as job safety.

Bad features

He listed as among the Kasten bill's "most objectionable features" provisions that would:

- Absolve a manufacturer of liability unless the firm "knew or should have known" of a dangerous defect and there was also a technologically feasible means of eliminating the danger. Gold viewed this as a retreat from present law which holds a manufacturer responsible for all defects that make a product unreasonably dangerous.
- Lessen the obligation of manufacturers to warn the ultimate user of his product of possible hazards.
- Exclude, in most cases, wholesalers or retailers from product liability suits. This would narrow the avenues of recovery of damages.
- Shift much of the burden of compensation for work-related injuries stemming from a defective product from the manufacturer to the workers' compensation system.

As labor sees the proposed legislation, Gold said, it amounts to yet another case of seeking "to take from those who need it most . . . in order to give to those who have the most."

Award cites union volunteers in aid to elderly, handicapped

A union-sponsored volunteer program providing aid to low-income senior and handicapped citizens in Seattle, was honored with one of eight 1983 President's Volunteer Action Awards.

The King County Labor Council's Union Retirees Resources Program for the elderly and the disabled was selected ahead of nearly 2,000 other volunteer programs nominated. Accepting the award at an Apr. 13 White House luncheon were George Petersen, 76, and Harry Doremus, 71, representing the program volunteers.

Sponsored by the King County AFL-CIO's community services agency, the union retirees resources program makes home repairs for persons who are 55 years or older or physically handicapped, and who have an income of less than $400 a month.

Retired members

Both award recipients are retired union members—Petersen, with Lumber & Sawmill Workers Local 2519, and Doremus of Carpenters Local 1289 in Seattle.

The union retirees are not paid for their work. They are reimbursed only for mileage. The project helps the elderly and the handicapped with minor home repair problems such as leaking faucets, and the like.

The program was the only union-sponsored project to receive the award. The President's Volunteer Action Awards were created in 1982 to focus public attention on the contributions made by volunteers.

The awards categories include the arts and humanities, education, environment, health, human services, international volunteering, jobs, material resources, public safety, and the workplace.

Two other union-sponsored volunteer projects were cited, one in Illinois and the other in Iowa.

Honorable mentions

Thirty-five unions, most of them in the building trades, received honorable mention for their joint effort in building a 700-acre community park in Alton, Ill. The work involved over 1,800 union volunteers who put in an estimated 80,000 hours from the start of the project in 1978 to the present.

The trade unionists built baseball diamonds, soccer and football fields, a playground, a nature trail for the handicapped, and a flower garden with signs in braille for the blind. Plans are proceeding for a golf course and a swimming pool.

In Waterloo, Ia., retirees from Auto Workers Local 838 and Packinghouse Workers Local 46 served as coordinators for the Agriculture Dept.'s surplus food program, distributing 351,850 pounds of cheese and 175,680 pounds of butter in Black Hawk County. Their other programs include work with juvenile delinquents and gardening projects for the elderly.

Financial snags resolved

Guild, ITU work out new merger accord

The executive board of the Newspaper Guild has unanimously approved terms of a new agreement with the Typographical Union that would lead to the merger of the two unions.

TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr. and ITU President Joe Bingel said the terms of the agreement are "greatly improved" over a previous merger proposal that was withdrawn from both unions' ratification processes last December after differences over its financial provisions could not be resolved.

Terms of the new pact were made final at talks between both unions' special committees held Apr. 7-9 at ITU headquarters in Colorado Springs, Colo. The committees, made up of international and local union officials, first met in 1977.

The amended merger terms will be submitted for approval to the Guild's convention which begins June 27 in Cleveland. The agreement also will be examined by delegates to the ITU's convention in San Francisco in August.

If the agreement is approved by the Guild delegates, the unions expect to submit the merger issue in September to simultaneous referendum votes by each union's membership.

Founding convention

If approved, the merger would become effective at the new union's founding convention, anticipated for early 1984 in Washington, D.C.

The merged union would be called the Media Workers International Union ITU/TNG, and would become the largest union of primarily newspaper employees in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico. The ITU currently has about 44,400 "at-trade" members, and the TNG has about 31,500 active members.

The principal changes in the new agreement are in the dues structure for the merged union and in the number of full- and part-time officers during its four-year transition period of shared leadership.

The agreement provides for the new union to be directed by a two-tier leadership structure between annual conventions: a full-time executive council and a governing board, which would meet at least twice between conventions as well as immediately before and after each of them.

Seven-member board

The executive council initially would have seven members, four ITU and three Guild, rather than nine. After the first four years, as originally, there would be five council members, elected without regard to membership in either predecessor union.

In addition, the governing board would be made up of 14 regional and 11 at-large representatives, the latter reduced from 15. Regional seats would be divided evenly between the predecessor unions, while the ITU would have one more at-large seat than the Guild. In the second two years, the at-large seats would be pared to seven, four for former ITU members.

Thereafter there would be seven at-large and seven regional seats, all filled without regard to the predecessor unions.

Dues structure changes would result in a lesser initial reduction in international dues for members of ITU locals than in the original document, with a new mechanism also provided for further reduction during the time it takes for international dues for former Guild members to catch up. Former Guild locals would continue to pay international dues on a per-capita basis in the same annually adjusted amounts as now until rates become the same.

Local mergers would be encouraged, but would be left to votes by majorities of each of the locals involved, as in the initial agreement.

Multi-union demonstration against Litton Industries' labor law violations.

Contract debarment sought for law-defying employers

If the trend continues, collective bargaining rights could be effectively repealed "but not by an act of Congress."

Union-busting "should not be sanctioned with the kind of juicy government contracts on which Litton has grown fat," Winpisinger said.

President William H. Bywater of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers urged Congress to "put some teeth into our labor laws" to bring pressure on employers such as Litton that engage in "flagrant and repetitive lawlessness."

Unfair practices

He cited a recent IUE campaign at Litton's Triad-Utrad plant in rural Indiana which resulted in complaints citing more than 50 separate unfair labor practices by the company.

Bywater termed Litton's conduct "a textbook study" of the ways in which the remedial provisions of federal labor law aren't working.

In other testimony at the House hearings:

- Vice President John M. Greer of the Graphic Arts International Union described tactics used by Litton Industries to undermine the union's majority in a decertification effort. He brought a GAIU international representative to testify to the actions of a business form manufacturing division of a Litton subsidiary because employees there were afraid of retaliation if they spoke up.
- A former supervisor at a Litton plant in Alabama, Andrew Kyle, testified that he had been dismissed in 1979 because he had refused to fire union supporters during an organizing drive by the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers.
- Auto Workers attorney Leonard Page noted that "just the threat of debarment" from contracts for civil rights violations "has transformed many recalcitrant employers into shining beacons of morality and legal obedience."

He termed it "hypocritical" for the federal government to grant lucrative contracts to firms that flagrantly defy labor laws.

- Hugh Harley, organizing director of the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers, said workers at Litton's microwave oven plant in Sioux Falls, S.D., are without a contract two and one-half years after voting for union representation. And a UE steward there said he expected disciplinary retaliation for coming to Washington to testify.

Others who appeared in support of the contract debarment bill included Cornell University Prof. Charles Craypo, who said Litton uses "cost-benefit" calculations in choosing to violate the law, and George Ogle, director of the United Methodist Church Dept. of Social & Economic Justice.

Washington rally

Later, unions cooperating in a campaign to spotlight Litton's unfair labor practices joined in a rally that was cosponsored by the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO.

Unlike most other employers that have achieved notoriety as union-busters, Litton-controlled enterprises cover an unrelated range of industries and many of its companies do not carry the Litton name.

The company claims that its 89 divisions, ranging from a shipbuilding subsidiary to an office equipment firm, set their own labor relations policies. But the unions dealing with Litton Industries firms charge a pervasive pattern of violations and have urged the NLRB to treat Litton and other conglomerates as a single employer in identifying patterns of violations.

IUD's Samuel noted in his testimony that the problem of persistent and deliberate violations of federal labor law by employers has been thoroughly documented over the years and past congressional committee reports are replete with examples.

Blacklist reprisal

The bill providing for debarment would be "a step in the right direction," he testified. "An employer who, for all practical purposes, blacklists employees for union activity should be blacklisted by government," Samuel urged.

Simon, the sponsor of the bill, said its intent is to assure "that federal money will not be used to help break federal law." He noted that Litton Industries is one of the nation's largest defense contractors, with total billings of nearly $1.5 billion.

Under present practices, Simon noted, law-abiding businesses are at a disadvantage "from the unfair competition of corporations not complying with the law."

At labor law hearings, Congressmen Simon and Clay with Machinists President Winpisinger and IUD's Samuel.

SIU charges Reagan budget spells death to U.S. shipyards

Seafarers President Frank Drozak told a Senate Merchant Marine panel the Reagan Administration's latest budget proposals "spell death" to the nation's commercial shipyards.

Drozak, who is president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., accused the Administration of seeking to "gut existing maritime programs in its 1984 budget."

He said the Administration has requested no funds for the construction differential subsidy (CDS) program and has indicated it will seek authority to allow subsidized U.S. operators to build overseas.

In addition, Drozak pointed out, the Administration has requested a $900 million cap on new loan guarantees under the federal ship financing fund, with $300 million of that amount to be used only if necessary for national security.

Underfunded plan

"The underfunding of CDS in recent years has led to the decrease in demand for American ship construction, not the other way around," Drozak said. He said the Administration's policy to let U.S. operators build and repair abroad has resulted in 36 ships being built and 13 ships being reconstructed in foreign yards.

If the Administration and Congress had approved adequate funding for CDS, Drozak said, these ships would have been built in U.S. yards, "employing thousands and thousands of U.S. workers."

Instead, Drozak said, 50,000 shipyard jobs were lost over the past seven years and last year, 25,446 American seamen were "on the beach" looking for jobs.

In examining only costs, Drozak said, the Administration has "lost sight" of the economic benefits of maritime programs. He pointed out that the $1.9 billion spent on operating subsidies between 1970 and 1978 generated $11.6 billion in output throughout the entire U.S. economy and provided 196,000 man-years of employment in the maritime industry alone. Similarly, $1.4 billion spent on the CDS program generated the construction of vessels and marine equipment valued at $4.2 billion and provided 136,000 man-years of shipyard employment, he said.

Drozak expressed support for legislation introduced in the House by Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.), which would authorize appropriations for the acquisition, construction or reconstruction of vessels in U.S. shipyards to encourage more bulk cargo to be carried in U.S. ships. A similar bill is pending in the Senate.

Covering COLA

Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough, center, explains a decision by the union's pension fund trustees to pay its 11,000 retirees an amount equal to the social security cost-of-living adjustment which was deferred six months until January 1984, while Cavett Snyder, a management trustee, signs the authorization which will cost the fund about $1.65 million. The retirees will receive a lump sum payment of about $150 each. "What we're doing with regard to social security COLAs is what government should be doing," Carlough said. "But if government in the Reagan era won't, we will." Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), left, said this action was an example other pension funds should follow.

UFCW fights scheme to scrap union contract under bankruptcy bid

The Food & Commercial Workers accused Wilson Foods Corp. of violating federal labor law by unilaterally voiding its current multi-plant bargaining agreement with the union.

The UFCW has already filed grievances at the 12 Wilson plants under union contracts and is studying other options to counter the company's move.

UFCW Vice President Lewie G. Anderson said that until a course of action is decided upon the union has advised its 6,200 members employed by Wilson to continue to work.

"We take the position that the contract is still in place since it has not been set aside by a court order," said Anderson, director of UFCW's Packinghouse Division. Wilson's actions also violate the National Labor Relations Act because they unilaterally change the terms and conditions of employment, he charged.

Bankruptcy action

The meatpacking firm, one of the largest in the industry, precipitated the legal turmoil Apr. 22 by filing for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the federal Bankruptcy Code. Under Chapter 11, a company seeks court protection from creditors while it works out arrangements to pay off debts.

Kenneth J. Griggy, Wilson's board chairman and chief executive officer, said the company does not expect to close any of its 12 plants or lay off workers, but will seek to reduce wages sharply. The reorganization petition was filed in Oklahoma City.

Anderson said the union was informed of Wilson's intentions only 45 minutes before the filing took place and received copies of the court papers four days later.

Wage drop predicted

If Wilson is allowed to put its wage cutbacks into effect, he said, "it may very well cut wages to the tune of $7-$9 an hour." He said the firm also wants to reduce future monthly pension benefits, eliminate two paid holidays, reduce night shift premium pay, dismantle the workers' health insurance plan, and change sick leave provisions. Base hourly wages have averaged $17.

UFCW negotiated an early settlement with Wilson and other major meatpackers in December 1981 freezing pay for 44 months and deferring cost-of-living adjustments until the end of 1983. In return, the companies agreed not to close any plants for 18 months.

Anderson said there are three options presently available to the union. "We could seek federal court action to have Wilson adhere to the contract, call a strike against the company, or file charges with the NLRB," he said.

Anderson traced the company's financial problems to poor management practices and heavy losses in commodity futures market speculations.

Disturbing trend

He said he was concerned over what he sees as a trend in American business to abuse the federal Bankruptcy Code, and warned that if Wilson is successful in this instance other companies might be encouraged to follow suit.

Whether Wilson will be allowed to change the contract terms could be determined by the U.S. Supreme Court, which has a similar case before it involving a New Jersey firm. The high court earlier this year agreed to review a case in which the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals allowed an employer undergoing reorganization under the Bankruptcy Code to reject the terms of a collective bargaining agreement without first complying with the requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Dennis confirmed by Senate to fill Labor Board vacancy

The Senate confirmed President Reagan's nomination of Patricia Diaz Dennis to fill the remaining vacancy on the National Labor Relations Board, while the board announced the appointment of Hugh Reilly to serve as the agency's solicitor.

Dennis will be the only Democrat on the five-member board. Chairman Donald Dotson and Members Robert Hunter and Howard Jenkins, Jr., are Republicans. Member Donald Zimmerman is an independent.

Reilly, formerly an attorney with the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, comes to the board from the Labor Dept., where he was executive assistant to the assistant secretary of labor-management relations and acting assistant director of the labor-management standards enforcement program.

Reilly had been with the right-to-work foundation from 1973 to 1981. As chief legal adviser to the board, Reilly replaces Berton B. Subrin, who had filled the position on an acting basis since Apr. 5, when the former solicitor, Willie Lee Clark, was named to the post of NLRB regional director in Winston-Salem, N.C.

The solicitor advises the board on a wide range of matters, including requests for interim injunctive relief under the Taft-Hartley Act and requests for Supreme Court review. He also drafts advisory opinions, and counsels members on the adoption of new rules and regulations.

Traditionally, the solicitor also handles congressional requests for the NLRB's position on legislative proposals.

Dennis, a 36-year-old management attorney with the American Broadcasting Co. in Los Angeles, is a graduate of the University of California at Los Angeles, and received her law degree from Loyola University of Los Angeles in 1973. She joined the legal staff at ABC in 1978.

The Senate approved her nomination Apr. 15.

Safety, Health Institute elects J. C. Turner

Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner has been elected chairman of the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health by the organization's board of trustees.

Turner replaces Warren J. Smith, former secretary-treasurer of the Ohio AFL-CIO, who has been appointed director of the Ohio Dept. of Transportation.

Other officers of the institute are AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel, vice chairman; National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman, treasurer; and Flint Glass Workers President George Parker, secretary.

'Scoop' White dies at 78, editor of ITU Review

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Ralph "Scoop" White, the founding editor of the Typographical Union's ITU Review, died here Apr. 24 after an apparent heart attack. He was 78.

White retired in 1973. As director of the ITU Union Label & Public Relations Bureau, he founded the ITU Review, a monthly newspaper, in 1958. He later compiled a three-volume history of the union.

Earlier, White was editor of the Monroe (La.) Daily News Digest, one of several newspapers formed by the ITU in several cities to combat unfair publishers. He also served as editor of Labor's Daily, a national daily labor newspaper published in the 1950s.

Funeral services were held here Apr. 27. Survivors include his wife Helen, a son, and three daughters.

J.P. Stevens master contract renewed

Roanoke Rapids, N.C. — The Clothing & Textile Workers signed a new 25-month master contract with J. P. Stevens & Co. covering 3,500 workers at nine southern plants.

It is the first negotiated agreement for these workers since the historic settlement, reached in October 1980, that ended a bitter 17-year struggle that was marked by litigation and a boycott. That agreement was signed seven years after the ACTWU won its first election here.

The new agreement will expire May 28, 1985, to coincide with the expiration date of a contract at Stevens's Wallace, N.C., plants, where the ACTWU represents 500 workers.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley termed the settlement "a maturing of the collective bargaining process in which both parties demonstrated a willingness to live with each other." He said that regular meetings with the company have kept the channels of communication open and led to a normalization of relations.

Stable relations

"The stability of these relations is reflected in the ability of the company to weather the current economic crisis and in the high percentage of union membership we have maintained in these right-to-work states," Finley said.

Bruce Raynor, ACTWU vice president and Deep South regional director, said the agreement, covering only non-economic items, strengthened seniority rights of workers in job bidding and shift preference, and improved the recall and "bumping" procedures in relation to layoffs.

Grievance and arbitration procedures, and shop stewards' rights and responsibilities were improved, the union reported.

Wages and fringes will be negotiated separately in an annual reopening of negotiations which occurs in late spring. ACTWU said it has negotiated wage increases in each year since the initial contract was signed and last year added a dental plan.

"What characterizes this contract," said Raynor, "is that there were no concessions on the part of the union. It is notable the workers made concrete gains and took no backward steps."

Clyde Bush, Roanoke Valley joint board manager, pointed out that employment at the Roanoke Rapids plants covered by the master contract has grown from about 2,400 in 1980 to over 3,000. The contract also covers about 150 workers at the High Point, N.C., plant and 150 at the Allendale, S.C., plant.

Finley said the company has invested in major remodeling and modernization at the Roanoke Rapids, High Point and Wallace plants.

Taylor, Jager retire from AFL-CIO

George H. R. Taylor, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health and federation Economist Elizabeth R. Jager retired in April.

Taylor, 71, who has headed the department since its inception in 1978, joined the AFL-CIO in 1959 as an economist dealing with natural resources, nuclear and energy issues before specializing in job safety and health.

Taylor also served as the secretary of the Executive Council's Standing Committee on Occupational Safety & Health.

Since 1972, he has chaired the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Technical Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health and is a member of both the Nation Advisory and Federal Advisory Committees on Occupational Safety & Health.

Jager, 57, joined the CIO Research & Education Dept. in 1950, and came to the federation in 1955 as a specialist in international trade and investment issues.

She is chairman of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Foreign Labor & Trade Committee of the Labor Research Advisory Council, and a member of State Dept. advisory committee on trade.

Jager retired Apr. 15; Taylor's retirement is effective Apr. 30.

'Savings' from robots carry high human price tag

People who design and use workplace robots have a responsibility to look at the social and economic consequences the new technology will have on human workers, according to Dennis Chamot of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees.

Putting the emphasis on increasing productivity through capital investment in machines rather than creating new jobs "almost guarantees elimination of current jobs or a reduction in future job growth," Chamot told the Baltimore-Washington chapter of the Robotics International Society of Manufacturing Engineers.

Chamot, DPE's assistant director, stressed that new technology should not be embraced "as a substitute for the current workforce." Instead, he suggested, employers have a responsibility to put back some of their gains from the introduction of machinery into employee protections and retraining.

Advances in robotics, the use of computers and other forms of automation are being felt throughout the economy in both blue- and white-collar jobs, and workplaces nationwide are facing extensive redesign, Chamot noted.

As part of the process of change, human and social concerns like workers' fears about job security and loss of income must be taken into consideration, he stressed.

Chamot urged employers planning to introduce new technology to involve union representatives "as early as possible" in the process.

Needed protections

He recommended the adoption of strong job security agreements, pay protections, retraining guarantees and related measures to offset "the potentially negative consequences of technological change."

Retraining programs, Chamot said, should include broad basic concepts as well as narrow, specific skills to help workers maintain a maximum of flexibility and utility on the job.

Where layoffs are unavoidable, people who are being displaced should be retrained for new jobs within the company, Chamot said, stressing that the full responsibility for this retraining rests with management as "a part of the normal expense of investment in new technology."

Chamot told the engineers that studies of union responses to the introduction of technological innovations show that the labor movement, instead of opposing change, has largely acknowledged the need to modernize many industries and has been willing to work with employers on easing the transition and its effects on workers.

But, Chamot pointed out, unions have voiced concerns that "poor management decisions in the past" have caused problems in today's economy that "are leading to changes being made which are too rapid to minimize dislocations."

He noted that some American industries have failed to remain flexible and innovative in dealing with marketplace problems, preferring to resort to crisis management, layoffs and plant shutdowns to make short-term budget gains, all of which have serious consequences for workers.

Some changes helpful

Chamot said robotics is changing the workplace in a number of positive ways including relieving humans of many dirty and dangerous jobs, and new jobs are being created in installation, maintenance and machine "supervision" as well as in "off the plant floor" jobs such as design, planning, administration, sales and purchasing.

Individuals and companies in the robotics industry should not be complacent about the pace or acceptance of change, or ignore the human concerns, Chamot urged.

Support for the robotics industry may dwindle, he warned, "if the public begins to question the social costs of technical advances."

ILG opens national campaign to reduce clothing imports

New York — The Ladies' Garment Workers launched a nationwide drive to roll back imports of cheap apparel from low-wage countries that have already cost its members thousands of jobs and threaten to make further inroads.

In rallies in garment-producing districts and a nationwide satellite transmission linking local unionists in 26 cities and towns, the union sent the message that the fragile state of the American garment industry is due to the flood of imports from Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, Japan, and other areas where labor costs are but a fraction of U.S. wage levels.

The ILGWU is seeking congressional support for an Executive Order to reduce imports to 25 percent of the domestic market from their current 41 percent.

An Apr. 23 satellite hookup from New York enabled ILG members across the country to hear first hand from ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, and House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill (D-Mass.) that continuing losses of U.S. jobs are directly attributable to rising imports.

Plight ignored

Chaikin told union members in their local communities the garment industry produces far more jobs than the other major import-plagued U.S. industries, yet the Reagan Administration has done little to help the industry get out of its rut.

The ILGWU reported that its membership has dropped from a peak of 457,000 in 1969 to the present 282,000 because of imports and the recession.

The industry's plight was dramatically highlighted the same day with protests by garment workers outside seven Manhattan department stores.

"We are willing to share our domestic market and support workers in developing nations overseas," Chaikin said. "But in the absence of fair trade agreements we are asking for the quota to keep the industry alive."

Vice President Jay Mazur said that the percentage of clothing imports has shot up from 3 percent in 1957 to the current 41 percent.

"Other industrialized countries like Japan, Britain, and France have quotas that protect their workers," he said. "We aren't looking for a ban on imports—just a fair deal for our workers." The union represents the overwhelming majority of workers who make women's and children's clothing.

On the same day, rallies were held in other garment-industry states, including New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and South Carolina.

Two days earlier, New York City shipping clerks in the garment industry hauled empty garment racks down Seventh Avenue to protest the clothing imports that are depriving them of jobs.

The ILGWU pointed out that unemployment among experienced apparel workers averaged 15.4 percent in 1982, compared with a jobless rate of 12.3 percent for all manufacturing industries, and a 9.7-percent average for the economy as a whole.

Even those workers who have jobs are experiencing hard times, with the average wage for garment workers in the United States only $4.94 an hour—well below the average of other occupations. Workers in places such as Hong Kong—the source of 20 percent of apparel imports — earn about one quarter the U.S. wage rate, the union said.

American quality

The loss of U.S. jobs is not the fault of the garment industry, the ILGWU statement declared. "The quality of American garments is superior," and the technology is far advanced compared with that used elsewhere, the union said.

The rallies drew support from employers and the municipal government here. President Eli Elias of the New York Skirt & Sportswear Association told a sidewalk news conference: "Let us not have free trade. Let us now insist on fair trade."

Herb Rickman, a special assistant to Mayor Edward Koch, who took part in the rally, said the apparel trade accounts for some 200,000 jobs in the city.

"We will not let the first industry of this city die," said Rickman.

ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin tells a New York rally import quotas on clothing are needed to keep the U.S. garment industry alive.

Health insurance pressed for America's unemployed

over with inexpensive or cosmetic measures."

Other unions submitting testimony included the Steelworkers and the State, County & Municipal Employees.

In House and Senate testimony, Denison urged these principles for incorporation into the final version of the legislation:

- A health insurance program "must not concentrate exclusively on catastrophic care" and should include preventive care and diagnostic services. "Prenatal and postpartum care are especially important."
- The program should include "cost-effective reimbursement mechanisms, such as negotiating per capita agreements with providers."
- Workers who have purchased unemployment compensation must be eligible for services and public employees should be covered on the same basis as other workers.
- Cost-sharing requirements should be no greater than the nominal amounts required under Medicaid.
- Health care providers who participate in the program must accept amounts provided under the coverage in full payment.
- A grant program should be established for public hospitals, which have been especially burdened by the large number of uninsured patients.
- Funding for the program should be adequately linked to unemployment levels.

Denison said the AFL-CIO has reservations about a proposal in several of the bills to require employers to maintain health insurance coverage for three months after layoff. Such a proposal needs greater study as to its economic effects and could delay action of the legislation, he said.

Shifting burden

He also expressed strong opposition to any plan that would seek to fund health care for the unemployed by taxing employed workers on the value of employer-paid health insurance premiums above a specified amount.

"These are two totally different issues that should not be joined," Denison insisted.

There is widespread support for health care for the unemployed and need for quick congressional action, he said. But "there is widespread opposition to placing an arbitrary limit on tax-free employer contributions for health insurance." Denison urged that Congress not derail health care for the unemployed "by holding it hostage to extracting approval of a tax on health care employer payments."

USFL players file for union certification

New York—The United States Football League Players Association capped a one-month organizing drive by seeking certification by the National Labor Relations Board as bargaining representative of the USFL players.

The union presented signed authorization cards for over 60 percent of the league's 600 players. A representation election is likely if the league's owners refuse to grant recognition.

The USFL's first season began on Mar. 6 with the league's 12 teams playing a spring and summer schedule that will culminate in a championship playoff game on July 15.

"We waited until a majority of the players in the USFL asked us to organize them, and then we filed for recognition," Ed Garvey, executive director of the National Football League Players Association, said. Along with the NFLPA, the new USFLPA will be part of the Federation of Professional Athletes, which is an AFL-CIO affiliate.

Garvey stressed that the new union for USFL players will have its own board of player representatives, officers and executive committee. It will share staff with the Professional Athletes, which is headquartered in Washington. The Professional Athletes also include the players unions in the North American Soccer League and the Major Indoor Soccer League.

The Athletes Federation and the NFLPA moved to organize the new league, Garvey said, because of the anticipated player movement between the two leagues. "More than 75 NFL players are now on USFL rosters, and it is expected there will be many players moving from one league to another in the future," Garvey said.

Tops in style

Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn presents the first prize trophy in the 1983 hair styling championships to UFCW Cleveland Local 880's Chaz Henline. The competition was held at the AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show in St. Louis. Henline's efforts aided his local's team in capturing the top prize in the team competition.

OSHA criticized on rule for ethylene oxide hazard

The State, County & Municipal Employees sharply attacked the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed rule for a tighter limit worker exposure to ethylene oxide as "inadequate" and "poorly thought out."

OSHA, in response to a court order, proposed an ethylene oxide exposure limit for an eight-hour workday of one part per million parts air, down from the current 50 ppm. Ethylene oxide is a cancer-causing chemical gas widely used in the health care industry as a sterilizing agent.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee, in a letter to OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter, said the proposed regulation "seemed poorly thought out and quickly pasted together to comply as simply as possible with the court order."

Protection lacking

He added, "We find the protections provided to workers so inadequate, and the proposal so deficient in content and scope, that AFSCME feels that it does not merit publication as written."

McEntee's letter detailed the main objections to the proposed rule, saying AFSCME found it lacking in a time limit for compliance after the rule is enacted, a ceiling limit on the amount of short-term, high-level exposure and a clause banning skin and eye contact with the gas. AFSCME also objected to allowing employer discretion in the use of engineering controls to limit exposure levels.

McEntee called the medical examination recommendations non-binding and unenforceable. He said the 1 ppm exposure level is still too high in light of recent studies showing the hazardous nature of ethylene oxide at that level.

Exposed workers

OSHA estimated the proposed regulation would affect 80,000 workers directly exposed to ethylene oxide on the job and another 144,000 indirectly exposed. Of the 80,000 workers, directly exposed, 62,000 are in health care facilities, 14,000 in the medical products industry and the remainder in various manufacturing processes.

AFSCME and the Public Citizen Health Research Group sued OSHA in August 1981 to issue an emergency standard. They were later joined in the suit by the Service Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Auchter was ordered by the U.S. Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to propose the tighter rule by mid-April and to develop a permanent standard within a year.

An agency spokesman said public hearings will begin on July 19 and a final standard is expected "within a year." OSHA said the total annual costs of the proposed standard will not have any major economic consequences on industries using the chemical.

The American Hospital Association, however, which includes over 6,300 health care facilities, said it might not be possible for many of its member hospitals to comply with the suggested standard.

OSHA estimated the "excess lifetime risk of cancer" is expected to be reduced from 634 cases per 10,000 workers exposed at 50 ppm to just 12 cases per 10,000 workers at 1 ppm. An action level of one-half part per million would be established at which monitoring and medical surveillance would begin.

In construction industry

Court upholds validity of pre-hire contracts

benefit payments required by the union contract. The subcontractor, Jim McNeff, Inc., had signed a pre-hire agreement with the Operating Engineers that allowed him to get a share of work on an all-union construction project.

After the work was completed, he reverted to a non-union operation. But he refused to make health and welfare payments for the period when his operations were covered by union contract.

McNeff claimed in his defense that the agreement wasn't judicially enforceable because the union hadn't established its majority status as representative of his employees. He further contended that the agreement couldn't be enforced because it was entered into under "duress."

Unique arrangement

Chief Justice Warren Burger, writing for the full court, noted that Congress authorized pre-hire agreements under the National Labor Relations Act because of the unique nature of the construction industry with frequently changing work sites and employment patterns.

These pre-hire provisions benefit employers as well as workers, and federal law allows either side to sue for enforcement of a union contract, the decision noted.

Burger went on to say that there was nothing to indicate "that Congress intended employers to obtain free the benefits of stable labor costs, labor peace and the use of the union hiring hall" without living up to a contractor's obligations under the pre-hire agreement.

The Supreme Court decision affirmed a ruling by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in support of the union position.

Judicial review

In an earlier action, the Supreme Court set the stage for another judicial review of an employee's dues obligations under a union shop or agency shop agreement.

It agreed to review a decision by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals that the Railway & Airline Clerks followed appropriate constitutional guidelines in making rebates to employees who objected to the purposes for which their dues are used.

The appeals court held that BRAC complied with its obligation by rebating on request the portion of dues or agency fee payments allocated to the union's political or ideological activities.

A group of employees has sought to persuade the courts to extend the rebate right to all union operating expenses not directly involving collective bargaining, including such costs as publications, conventions and organizing.

The appellate court rejected their claim, holding that all such activities were "germane to the work of the union in collective bargaining." The Supreme Court agreed to review that decision.

In another case, the Supreme Court declined to review and thus made final a decision by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit involving employer favoritism for workers who cross a picket line.

The appellate court agreed with the National Labor Relations Board that a Wisconsin printing firm had violated the law by granting preferential reinstatement and seniority rights to employees who abandoned a 1977 strike by a local of the Graphic Arts International Union.

Council endorses UFCW's boycott of Tyson Foods

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has endorsed a boycott of the products of Tyson Foods, Inc., of Springdale, Ark.

The council, in a telephone poll, voted the sanctions against the chicken and poultry products company at the request of the Food & Commercial Workers.

The union is asking consumers not to buy the company's products in an effort to win a decent contract for workers at two Tyson Foods plants in North Little Rock and Nashville, Ark., UFCW said.

Workers at both facilities voted to be represented by the UFCW a year ago but they have been unable to reach agreement with the company.

UFCW said it already represents workers at the company's plant in Springdale where a contract is in place. The report also pointed out that attempts have been made to decertify the union there.

The company markets poultry products under its own name and the Chicken-Quick brand, the union said. It also makes "Chicken McNuggets" for the McDonald's fast food chain in the West.

UAW's Caterpillar pact ends strike

Auto Workers employed by the Caterpillar Tractor Co., approved a new 37-month contract and returned to their jobs, ending a seven-month strike.

Following three days of voting by workers of 10 Caterpillar plants in six states, UAW President Stephen P. Yokich said the agreement was ratified by better than a 2-to-1 margin. The company, the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, reopened its plants in Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Colorado on Apr. 25.

The new agreement calls for a wage freeze over the term of the agreement, but the union fought off management attempts to do away with a quarterly cost-of-living adjustment, preserved seniority rights, and negotiated a profit-sharing plan. It guarantees workers a bonus in 1984 of at least 31 cents for each hour worked that year regardless of the firm's profits.

Extended formula

In other years, the formula will pay off when worldwide pretax earnings exceed 4.5 percent of return on average worldwide sales and net assets.

If the profit-sharing plan had been in effect in 1981, the UAW observed, it would have yielded 18 cents an hour.

The new agreement, ratified by a vote of 10,703 to 5,144 in voting on Apr. 21-23, cover some 21,000 active and 15,000 laid-off workers.

Caterpillar, which has been hard hit by the Reagan Recession, had sought a number of concessions—in 34 areas, by the UAW's count—to hold down labor costs. The company recently announced a $172-million loss for the first quarter as sales dropped 60 percent.

Under the terms of the new agreement, pay will remain at current levels. Base pay ranges from $9.18 to $12.16 an hour, and workers receive another $2.51 per hour in accumulated cost-of-living adjustments. While COL payments will continue on a quarterly basis on a formula of 1 cent for each rise of .26 in the federal government's consumer price index, there will be no roll-in of the adjustments for the life of the contract.

A COL adjustment of 11 cents an hour, which would have been paid if employees had not been on strike, will be diverted permanently toward employer contributions into the union's Supplemental Unemployment Benefits fund. Caterpillar also will immediately contribute $16 million to the fund to help pay partial benefits for those workers laid off since last August.

The agreement establishes a master recall list which will provide preferential hiring on a corporatewide basis. Advance notice will be required if the company decides to close all or part of a plant or to have work performed at a non-UAW plant.

Several provisions of the contract were negotiated to deal with the scheduled closing of the firm's Mentor, Ohio, plant as well as any other plant that might be closed during the life of the agreement. Workers aged 50 with at least 10 years of service would be eligible for early retirement, and those at least 40 years old with 10 years of service whose age plus years of service equaled 55 would be eligible for early retirement at age 55.

Shutdown benefits

An additional 26 weeks of SUB payments and a one-year extension of life and health insurance coverage for those with 10 years of service would be provided in event of a plant shutdown.

Life, accidental death and dismemberment, and permanent disability insurance will rise by $5,000 for most workers, and Medicare Part B premiums will rise from $9.70 to $13.70 over term. Other insurance and pension provisions were unchanged.

The union's bargaining in the farm equipment industry now turns to Deere & Co. where UAW members have been working under a contract extension since last Oct. 1.

The Wrong Message

HAS CONGRESS become so beguiled by a few small but welcome improvements in the economy that all urgency has gone out of efforts to get America back to work and ease the recession's hardships?

This is the same Congress that was elected last November with a clear mandate to change the course. Earlier this year, there seemed to be a clear bipartisan majority so committed.

But now, with unemployment still over the 11 million mark, job bills are sidetracked and even a modest measure to stave off foreclosures of homes and farms is pulled off the House calendar because its passage is uncertain.

Just a short time ago, the need for a health insurance safety net for jobless Americans seemed so self-evident that it was only the details of the legislative package that were in dispute.

Now, the anticipation of bipartisan support has been weakened by the Administration's hard-nosed opposition to any new federal expenditures for those without jobs. A Cabinet memo to President Reagan spells out the reasoning behind the Administration's decision.

The Cabinet memo worries that a temporary program would turn to a permanent program because, even if the economic recovery is sustained, "there will be 9 million unemployed as late as 1986."

To the Reagan Administration, this is good reason to hold up on emergency recession relief measures.

But it should carry an opposite message to Congress.

If there are still 9 million unemployed three years from now, this recession will never have ended. None of the wiggles of economic indicators or the fluctuations of the stock market spell recovery when so vast a number of Americans seek jobs and can't find them.

Another Coop for the Fox

HARASSMENT LAWSUITS against unions and deceptive fund-raising solicitations have been the stock in trade of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation.

There were some eyebrows raised when one of the right-to-work foundation's long-time attorneys, Hugh L. Reilly, was hired early in the Reagan Administration for a responsible post in the Labor Dept.

Clearly a fox in the chicken coop situation in a department charged with advancing the welfare of America's workers.

Now Mr. Reilly has been given a different chicken coop to guard, and a new title of solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board, the agency charged with enforcing the nation's basic labor law.

Despite its inability to get an anti-union management consultant confirmed as chairman of the NLRB, the Administration apparently hasn't run out of foxes.

Such appointments have become so common that eyebrows are hardly raised these days. And that's a pity.

Common Sense

A TEXAS LAWYER, interviewed recently by the Dallas Times Herald, explained why he regularly turns down cases "from people who believe they have been fired unjustly and want to take their case to court."

In Texas as in most states, he said, courts follow the common law doctrine that allows an employer to fire a worker at any time for any reason.

The only exception, he noted, is if the dismissal is for a reason that would violate civil rights laws, such as race or religion, or if it is prohibited by a written contract.

"So many workers are just not aware that in a state like Texas, it is so important to be covered by a union contract," he told the newspaper. Without a union contract, "the employer can do anything he wants."

That's as good free advice as anyone is likely to get from a lawyer.

White House twists facts in assault on food stamps

By Press Associates, Inc.

When President Reagan delivered his State of the Union address to Congress last January, he launched an unusual attack on "fraud and waste" in the food stamp program.

In 1982, he said, "we identified almost $1.1 billion in overpayments." The taxpayers are not the only victims, he continued. "The truly needy suffer as funds intended for them are taken not by the needy but by the greedy. For everyone's sake, we must put an end to such waste and corruption."

Well, Reagan's program to root out "fraud and waste" was sent to Congress and now the Administration itself stands charged with fraud, waste, deception and incompetence.

Testifying before a Senate nutrition panel in support of a proposal to cut food stamps by $1.1 billion, an Administration spokesman said:

"I think it's important to note that 80 percent of the savings will come about by reducing misexpenditures rather than recipients' benefits. This proposed budget was designed to minimize the reduction of any household's entitled benefits."

That claim was exposed by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) in an analysis requested by Rep. Leon Panetta (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Agricultural subcommittee on nutrition. Panetta and Rep. Jim Jeffords (R-Vt.) denounced the Reagan proposals at a press conference.

A mistake about errors

Instead of 80 percent of the $1 billion in cutbacks coming from "misexpenditures," only 3 percent would come from error reduction, the CBO study found.

According to CBO, Panetta and Jeffords said, 95 percent of the $1 billion cut would come from reducing benefits and shifting costs to the states. About half the cuts would be in benefits and half in cost-shifting. The CBO study showed that 62 percent of all food stamp households—nearly 5 million—would suffer cuts.

Of all households with gross incomes below 50 percent of the poverty line, most of whom have incomes under $3,800 a year, 79 percent or 2 million of them would lose an average of $100 a year.

Specific groups would be severely hurt. About 1 million elderly and disabled recipients would have an average of $250, or one-fourth of their entire benefits, taken away each year. Some 940,000 of the working poor would lose an average of $194 in benefits.

Numbers game

In a later hearing before Panetta's nutrition panel, the Administration's deceptions and numbers game were dissected by Robert Greenstein, director of the foundation-financed Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, who headed the Agriculture Dept.'s Food & Nutrition Service in the Carter Administration.

Greenstein said the Reagan Administration claims were nailed as "incorrect and misleading" even before the CBO study. He noted the Administration has "kept quiet" the fact that a six-month delay in food stamp cost-of-living increases doesn't have an impact until fiscal 1985 and later.

It may be that the American people have had enough of this grinding down of the poor. There is a rising consensus in Congress to stop the Administration's relentless drive to apply bookkeeping trickery to the problem of hunger in America.

Half the members of the Senate and about 188 Republicans and Democrats in the House are on record against any further cuts in federal nutrition programs. Indeed, labor and anti-hunger advocates are mounting a campaign to reverse the damage and restore funds to a wide range of nutrition programs.

Odds 'n Ends

WATT-WATCHING becomes favorite Washington hobby. Hard on heels of Watt-generated controversy over D.C. July 4 celebration, in which Interior Secretary labeled Beach Boys quartet a bit too groovy for family fare, comes report by House committee charging Watt with leasing federal coal reserves to industry at "fire sale" prices. Report claims private interests will reap "windfall profits" at expense of taxpayers. Over-all, report charges Watt's program of leasing billions of tons of coal is mismanaged and is pushing down price government can command for its resources. Amount lost to government so far on leased coal is put at $60 million. Watt next?

GUSHER OF OIL MONEY to Republican campaign committees hit new highs in 1981-82 cycle. Of $8.4 million in individual contributions of $500 to $20,000 collected in that period by the GOP, $2.2 million came from oilmen in only three states—Texas, Oklahoma and Louisiana. From same states, Democratic committees took in only $73,950. Washington Post details how independent oil firms and leaders used leverage gained through massive political contributions to plant $6.5 billion tax giveaway in Reagan tax program. Oil political money, the Post says, is so plentiful that the southwest has become a magnet for conservative GOP candidates. Among the first of them was then-Rep. Steve Symms (Idaho) who challenged incumbent Frank Church for the U.S. Senate in 1980. Symms trekked to Texas, returned home to Idaho with a campaign trove enriched by $150,000. Quick to catch on, other right wing GOP candidates followed suit and, says the Post, they were not disappointed.

WATCH OUT, WE VOTE could be political war-cry of unemployed Americans. Census Bureau study of voting patterns in 1982 elections shows sharpest percentage growth over 1978 of any voting group occurred among jobless—an increase of more than 25 percent. Among other groupings, there appeared to be little difference in percentage turn-out. Votes of unemployed were more than 2-1 Democratic, according to polls.

ANALYSIS by pollster William Hamilton shows decade-by-decade percentage of citizens identifying themselves as Republicans has undergone virtually no change since 1964. Democrats lost some to independent status in the 1964-75 period but have held steady over the long haul. In 1964, according to Hamilton, 25 percent of voters identified themselves as GOP. That slipped to 22 percent in 1975, was back up to 24 percent in January of this year. In 1964, 53 percent of voters claimed Democratic leanings. This dropped to 45 percent in 1975 and held level there through January 1983. In between times, there've been peaks and valleys for both parties, but the long view shows little change, suggesting GOP hopes for decades of majority party status—as envisioned after 1980 elections—are likely to be frustrated.

QUIETLY, children of working families are being squeezed out of opportunity for higher education. Figures show since Reagan tightened eligibility for student loan programs there's been a 4 percent drop in enrollment at private universities, following several years of growth. A more shocking figure: Enrollment of students from families with income up to $24,000 a year has plunged by 39 percent at private institutions. This has placed additional strain on public universities which have been obliged to toughen their admissions criteria and raise tuition, in some instances dramatically.

Court Opens Way For Independents

The Democratic presidential nomination field for 1984 is rounded out at six. No additional starters are expected.

While President Reagan has not formally announced for re-election, most speculation now—as well as White House leaks—points to a try for a second term. If he goes, no opposition is seen.

So, that just about fills it out, doesn't it? Nope.

A recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling opens the presidential field wide for independent candidates. The 5-4 decision specifically ruled on a case brought by former Rep. John Anderson (R-Ill.) who followed up an unsuccessful run for the GOP nomination in 1980 with an independent campaign.

The independent entry required enormous funding and effort under some tight state deadlines for filing of candidacy. It was these early deadlines that the Supreme Court aimed at in its 5-4 decision.

The case specifically involved Ohio, but it is expected to open a floodgate of challenges to complex filing requirements that any non-major-party candidate faces.

The Court majority ruled for what it called the rights of "independent-minded voters (to) diversity and competition" in presidential campaigns.

Anderson himself has floated trial balloons for another independent, or third-party, go in 1984. With the Court ruling as it did, he might not be the only serious independent or third-party candidate.

They Admit It...Cuts Hurt the Truly Needy

Finally, someone in the Reagan Administration—not the President himself, heaven forbid—admits the truly needy are getting shafted by Reagan program cuts.

John W. Bode, Agriculture deputy assistant, concedes new Administration proposals to slash food stamp benefits would affect millions of Americans who really need them. But, he says, the Administration is willing to pay that price (it seems the needy are paying it, not the Administration) to ferret out error and waste.

The Administration now wants to squeeze another $1.1 billion out of this "safety net" program (remember the safety net?). That's on top of $2 billion already gouged from the program in previous Reagan budgets.

Reagan spokesmen claim that food stamp rolls have grown and the average benefit has increased faster than inflation. They ignore the fact that growth is due to the substantially increased number of families living under the poverty line in the age of Reaganomics. And they ignore, as well, the fact that soaring unemployment and plummeting welfare benefits mean less income, and when income falls a beneficiary's food stamps are adjusted upward to offset part of the income loss.

The over-all result of Reagan food stamp cuts, welfare cuts and recession-bred unemployment is more persons with less food than before. (The average food stamp benefit is 47 cents a meal—try getting fat on that.)

A study by the Congressional Budget Office details the full impact of the Administration's latest proposed round of food stamp cutbacks. It said 62 percent of all food stamp households—4.9 million of them—would lose some benefits, and that among these the hardest hit would be those with elderly or disabled family members.

Reagan Sets All-Time Deficit Record for One Year....Takes Only Half-Year to Do It

Among other things the Reagan Administration will be remembered for is one of the great ironies of modern federal management.

That is, the highest budget deficits in history—piling up under the guidance of a President who in his political career swatted away at deficits more often than Hank Aaron swatted home runs.

Now comes the news that the Reagan Administration 1983 fiscal year deficit has hit a record high for a full year—and has done it in only six months.

At the mid-fiscal year mark, the deficit soared to $129.2 billion, eclipsing the $110.7 billion in the 1982 FY, which itself was an all-time record.

Estimates of the full 1983 FY deficit now go from a low of $210.2 billion (the Administration's) to somewhere beyond the visible fiscal universe.

All of which means President Reagan had better hurry up: One of his early presidential promises was to balance the budget by 1984. He promised this because he was horrendously offended by the Carter-years deficit in the $55 billion range, which he is now quadrupling.

IUD calls industrial policy vital

May Day standoff

Helmeted riot police block access to a workers' monument outside the Gdansk shipyards to prevent pro-Solidarity, anti-government demonstrators from holding a May Day rally. Tens of thousands of supporters of the Solidarity trade union turned out in 20 other Polish cities. The protests had been called by the labor federation's underground leaders to counter government May Day parades. Scores of persons were injured and at least one death was reported when police attacked demonstrators with armored vehicles, water cannons and tear gas. Several thousand union supporters staged follow-up protests on May 3. The government banned Solidarity 17 months ago.

Conference asks action to save jobs

By David L. Perlman

Industrial union delegates from unemployment-ravaged communities demanded action from their government to stop the exodus of jobs and factories that threatens to make recession permanent and drag down America's living standards.

The angry message from the two-day legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. was that the United States can't afford to lose its smokestack industries, and steps must be taken to keep them alive.

IUD President Howard Samuel told the 700 participants that the nation's economic problems are still "correctable," but time is running short. In the absence of a national industrial policy, he warned, the situation will get "worse, not better."

Delegates met with congressional delegations from major industrial states and turned out at two congressional hearings that were scheduled to mesh with the conference program.

The House Labor-Management Relations subcommittee convened hearings on plant closing legislation at a government building auditorium to accommodate the IUD delegates. And in a follow-up to the conference, a House Commerce subcommittee heard union testimony in support of auto domestic content legislation.

Speakers at the opening session stressed the IUD's "Rebuilding American Industry" theme.

Shifting production

Machinists President William W. Winpisinger jabbed at the shortsightedness of companies that shift production to low-wage countries but count on selling their products in the United States because the workers who produce the goods can't afford to buy them.

The "flaw" in that strategy, Winpisinger said, in that American workers left without jobs can't afford to buy the products either.

He contrasted the "golden parachutes" for corporate executives who lose their Family earnings decline by 2.8% under Reagan

While the government's index of leading economic indicators rose in March for the seventh month in a row, suggesting a recovery from the Reagan Recession, workers and their families continued to earn less.

Real, or inflation-adjusted, earnings of working families in the first quarter of 1983 were 1.2 percent below the average for the same period of 1982, the Labor Dept. reported. Between the first quarters of 1981 and 1982 real family earnings dropped 1.6 percent. Thus, real family earnings declined 2.8 percent in the first two years of the Reagan Administration.

Families with wage and salary workers averaged $456 per week in income during the first three months of this year in current dollars. While that was a 2.3-percent rise from the year earlier, it was not enough to keep up with inflation, which rose 3.5 percent as measured by the government's consumer price index.

Individual full-time workers fared slightly better than families. Their average salary rose to $319 a week, up 4.9 percent over the year, with a real earnings increase of 1.3 percent after adjusting for inflation.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said that of 40.1 million families whose earnings were derived solely from wages and salaries in the first three months of this year 5.5 million included an unemployed member. This is a rise of 680,000 families from a year ago.

The number of families with no earners, 12.9 million, rose by nearly 900,000 from the first quarter of 1982, BLS said.

Although the number of multi-worker married couples declined over the year, families with two or more workers continued to account for half of all families with wage and salary workers.

Sluggish per capita

In a related report, the Commerce Dept. said that per capita personal income last year rose at its slowest pace in over 16 years. Per capita income increased 5.3 percent in 1982 to $11,056 from $10,495 in 1981, when it rose 9.5 percent.

Last year's rise did not keep pace with the 5.9-percent inflation, as measured by the department's price index for personal consumption spending. In 1981, the rise in the department's index was 8.6 percent.

Among the states, personal income last year ranged from a $15,200 average in Alaska to $7,792 in Mississippi.

Separately, the Commerce Dept. reported a 1.5-percent rise in its March index of leading indicators, which is designed to forecast economic trends. The index rose 1.4 percent in February and 3.2 percent in January.

The rise in the index was spurred by jumps in three of its 11 available components: the stock market, the money supply, and the length of the average workweek. Other parts of the index contributing favorably to the March increase: companies receiving slower deliveries from vendors, net business formations, orders for plant and equipment, and prices of materials.

Four of the components declined, led by

Court urged to put Davis-Bacon change on hold

Building trades unions and the AFL-CIO will ask a federal judge to block the Labor Dept. from putting into effect a controversial change in Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage regulations before an appellate court has acted on the issue.

The development is the latest episode in a court battle stemming from Reagan Administration attempts to rewrite Davis-Bacon regulations that have been in effect for close to half a century.

Last December, U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene issued a permanent injunction blocking all but one of the rules changes announced by the Labor Dept. The injunction had been sought by the AFL-CIO and its Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The Labor Dept. pulled back its regula-

Salvador court denounced for dropping murder case

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO expressed dismay over an appeals court decision in San Salvador dismissing charges against three persons implicated in the 1981 murders of two American trade unionists and a Salvadoran union leader who headed a land redistribution program.

Charges against the trio—a politically influential lieutenant, an army captain, and a wealthy Salvadoran businessman—were dropped, the court said, because of insufficient evidence to warrant trial.

"We are dismayed that the appeals court upheld the lower court, and we are hoping that the Salvadoran supreme court will act favorably on bringing to justice those people who were implicated," the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development said in a statement.

"We want those three men prosecuted to determine their guilt or innocence.

"Until such time that they are brought to justice," AIFLD said, "we support a suspension of all U.S. military aid to El Salvador."

El Salvador's attorney general, Mario Adalberto Riviera, filed a writ May 3 saying he would appeal the mid-level court's ruling.

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO said it will continue to support the land reform movement in trouble-ridden El Salvador in cooperation with the country's campesino, or peasant, unions. It was the land reform effort that brought the two Americans working for AIFLD to El Salvador.

Chicago tea party

Steelworkers District 31 Director Jack Parton, right, holds a press conference before U.S. Steel's stockholders meeting in Chicago to spell out the union's opposition to company plans to import unfinished steel from Britain. Some 200 USWA members staged a "Chicago Tea Party" to protest the scheme.

Attacks on U.S. maritime pay denounced as shortsighted

American maritime wages and benefits must be viewed in a global perspective, Seafarers President Frank Drozak told a House Armed Services subcommittee studying merchant marine compensation.

"Foreign labor costs, especially in lesser developed countries, cannot be matched in this country," said Drozak, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

"Some western European nations offer their seamen income tax breaks, others provide cradle-to-grave medical care for seamen and their families. In the United States, the costs of most of these benefits are borne by the private sector and are reflected in higher labor costs."

Appearing before the Seapower & Strategic and Critical Materials subcommittee, Drozak told panel members that "critics of the U.S.-flag fleet have singled out one cost—shipboard labor—as being the reason for the decline of the U.S. fleet.

"If it were possible to adjust all cost components for a U.S.-flag vessel to meet our lowest foreign competitor, it is likely that these cost reductions would be undercut by the foreign-flag operator," he said. "All major maritime powers accept the need to actively support their merchant fleets for economic, political, and national security reasons."

Government protection

In addition, foreign countries provide further aid to their citizens and industries by protecting their flag fleets with cargo reservation laws and low-interest loans to their operators and builders, Drozak said.

He noted that the Liberian Shipowners Council recently began talks with the People's Republic of China for crews for its vessels.

"The level of wages for seamen that was announced as a result of these negotiations was $276 a month. How can a reasonable person expect any American worker to match that?" Drozak asked.

Joining Drozak in a sharp response to recent criticism of merchant marine compensation by Vice Adm. Kent J. Carroll, commander of the Navy's Military Sealift Command, President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers said that rather than focusing narrowly on pay and benefits for merchant marine officers, "the Navy would be well advised to study the facts about rising productivity in the merchant marine.

"Sharp increases in the lift capacity per ship in the dry cargo fleet and a decrease in manning per ship," he said, "have produced phenomenal gains in productivity—many times greater than those of any other aspect of transportation."

Furthermore, he said, maritime unions have not stood in the way of the introduction of more efficient ships, automation features, or of reduced manning scales to take full advantage of capital expenditures. Last year, for example, MEBA voluntarily agreed to roll back a 7.5-percent pay increase at the government's request, he said.

Polarizing charges

Calhoon charged Carroll with making "dishonorable" and "misleading" statements about labor costs of operating U.S.-flag merchant ships, calling his remarks a "polarizing attack" that could split officers from men, Navy from merchant marine. Carroll's criticisms occurred Apr. 5 in a subcommittee hearing in which he made assertions regarding merchant marine wage costs the Navy encountered in utilizing U.S.-flag vessels.

Drozak and Calhoon urged adoption of several recommendations for rebuilding the dwindling U.S. merchant marine, including legislation to encourage increased investment in the merchant marine, formulation of a national maritime policy, continuation of operating subsidies, and regulatory reform.

Steelworkers battle British import deal

By Susan Dunlop

In a series of demonstrations, speeches and congressional testimony, Steelworkers reacted angrily to U.S. Steel Corp.'s scheme to import steel from Britain and close some of its facilities here.

USWA President Lloyd McBride told the House "Steel Caucus" that the union intends to use "any legal means open to us" to block U.S. Steel's proposal to buy unfinished steel slabs from the government-subsidized British Steel Corp. and process them into finished products at the American company's Fairless Hills, Pa., works where about 1,800 jobs in the steelmaking operation could be lost.

Outside U.S. Steel's annual stockholders meeting in Chicago, some 200 Steelworkers staged a "Chicago Tea Party" to dramatize their concerns.

In Washington, McBride led a delegation of Fairless Hills workers to the White House to deliver 36,000 postcards from Steelworkers urging President Reagan to act to help solve the critical problems in the steel industry.

Endangers industry

McBride told House members from steel producing districts that the union is "adamantly opposed" to the proposed transaction between U.S. Steel and the state-owned British Steel because it is damaging to workers, to the union's relationship with the company, to the long-term interests of the domestic steel industry and to the nation's economy and security.

He called on Congress to investigate the proposed arrangement, including subpoenas for all documents and notes exchanged between the two companies and other relevant data.

USWA members, McBride said, feel "betrayed" by the firm's "double dealing."

He pointed out that the union, U.S. Steel and six other major steel companies negotiated a new contract in February that will yield about $3 billion in savings to the steel industry from temporary wage and benefit cuts agreed to by the workers.

Reinvestment requirement

"The only condition we attached—and it is a condition that was clearly understood by all parties—is that the savings be plowed back into existing facilities," particularly for modernization, McBride emphasized.

He warned that the USWA "intends to enforce our contract rights," and may file unfair labor practice charges, submit countervailing duty petitions and take other action to block the proposed move.

McBride said he had written to Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige charging that the proposed arrangement could violate the intent of an agreement between the U.S. and the European Economic Community setting limits on imports of subsidized steel.

The British steel involved in the proposed transaction "is subsidized beyond question," McBride asserted. He stressed the "irony" of the plan in the face of heavy damage to the growth of the domestic steel industry caused by imports which has helped create "serious cash flow problems" for American steelmakers "all but crippling" their ability to modernize to compete with the imports.

Faulty logic

McBride criticized the testimony of U.S. Steel Chairman David Roderick which implied that modernization of Fairless Hills would require a "staggering investment" and that "somehow importing steel will actually save jobs, not cost them."

He pointed out that U.S. Steel's own figures estimate that it would cost $1.5 billion to modernize the Fairless Hills plant and that jobs lost due to new technology would number about 700 compared to the 1,800 the proposed deal with British Steel will destroy.

He noted that U.S. Steel was able to purchase Marathon Oil for about $6.2 billion after promising that the acquisition would not "diminish U.S. Steel's commitment to the steel segment."

If U.S. Steel's plans go through, McBride cautioned, it will open the door to more imports by other steel companies.

Steel policy sought

After his testimony to the caucus, McBride joined over 100 workers from the Fairless Hills plant to deliver mail bags containing 36,000 postcards to President Reagan calling for development of a national steel policy, enforcement of fair trade policies, re-establishment of the Steel Tripartite Advisory Committee and emergency relief for jobless workers.

More than 60 percent of the cards were sent by unemployed members, many jobless for over a year.

USWA local union leaders from steel mills around the country joined the demonstration outside U.S. Steel's annual meeting in Chicago to urge stockholders to reject the proposed import deal.

The union dubbed the demonstration the Chicago Tea Party in a symbolic reference to the historic Boston Tea Party of 1773 which protested high taxes levied on the American colonists by the British government for imports.

In the meeting, District 31 director Jack Parton asked that the proposal be withdrawn and he told the stockholders that while many Steelworkers members have invested their own money in the company's stock, "all of them have made another, more important investment: their lives and their livelihood."

HRDI presses labor role in job training

The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute is urging state and local labor organizations to participate in the planning of programs now being funded under the Job Training Partnership Act.

The goal is "to assure a strong labor voice" in programs for jobless workers, HRDI Director Mike Arnold said in a letter to officers of national and local labor organizations. HRDI's resources are available to unions to help them in their participation, he stressed.

Organized labor's participation, he said, can help assure that JTPA funds allocated to states support retraining and other needed services for dislocated workers, and "respond to the needs of our unemployed brothers and sisters," Arnold noted.

HRDI, the federation's employment and training arm, has developed a plan of "comprehensive assistance" to help labor organizations in every state assume a role in planning and providing JTPA programs.

As part of the program, HRDI field representatives are working with union officers and staff to widen understanding of the new law.

He urged local organizations to work through AFL-CIO state federations whenever possible.

HRDI is available to help local groups survey the needs of laid-off workers in their areas, to identify occupations where jobs are available as an indicator of needed retraining, and to help unions develop their own assistance programs, Arnold

He pointed out that HRDI has developed a model program for responding to the needs of jobless workers which includes a "worker assistance workshop" and follow-up activities tailored to the needs of the workers and the community.

To date, HRDI has conducted 66 workshops for workers facing layoff or plant closing, many of which were planned and conducted in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, Arnold

The institute also makes available to unions information on the programs including a fact sheet on JTPA, a description of organized labor's role under the new law, listings of each state's allocation of funds and a brochure describing HRDI's assistance program. Unions can get copies from the HRDI National Office, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Regional heads Mann, Kurko retire

AFL-CIO Regional Directors Michael Mann and Nicholas Kurko have retired after long service to the union movement.

Mann was director of Region VII, comprising New York, New Jersey and Puerto Rico. Kurko headed Region IV, which covers Texas, New Mexico, Louisiana and Colorado.

Mann, who was born in Dublin, Ireland, began his union career in Chicago in the mid 1930s and helped organize Montgomery Ward for the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. He became CIO regional director for Illinois in 1939, later served as executive secretary of the Chicago Industrial Union Council, and was CIO regional director in New York at the time of the AFL-CIO merger.

After serving as assistant AFL-CIO regional director, Mann was appointed regional director in 1957.

Kurko, a native of Hartford, Conn., and a graduate of Antioch College, became an organizer for what is now the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers in Oak Ridge, Tenn., in 1946.

He was appointed director of what was then the AFL-CIO Texas region in 1966 and continued as director of the enlarged region when it was restructured in 1974.

Shanker asks conference on schools crisis

Teachers President Albert Shanker has called for a national conference of education, military, business, government and labor leaders to focus on the critical education problems facing the nation.

Responding to the recent report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education (NCEE), Shanker emphasized the need for a national forum, saying: "The future of America rests with our system of education. If it fails, we fail."

The NCEE report calls for major reforms in public education, including higher teacher salaries, longer school days, tougher curriculum requirements, improved discipline and more homework.

Shanker cited the "new" sources of support for education coming from business and industrial leaders who are committed to merging forces with the education community and who are offering constructive proposals for improving schools.

The present situation is an "opportunity that wasn't there before," he said, and it is up to the teachers unions "to rise to the challenge and talk with these people as equals. We can get billions more for education and improve our status as teachers."

Competitive factor

He added that business and industrial leaders are "worried the U.S. is losing out to foreign competition. They see that our schools are not providing the educated work force business needs to be competitive."

Over the next two decades, Shanker said, the biggest need will be training people for jobs that don't exist today. It will be up to unions to find out from business what kind of workers they will need and what kind of training programs should be provided to students and adults.

In noting the NCEE report, Shanker said while AFT may not agree with all the recommendations, "well thought-out proposals deserve our consideration. We ought to supply our experience in working out the answers because there is an emergency situation in education."

To meet the challenge, he urged:

- Teacher salaries should average $25,000, not $17,000, yearly.
- Teachers should get additional compensation for any lengthening of the school day or year.
- Teachers' abilities should be tested before they enter the classrooms.

AFSCME adds 1,100 in Missouri campaign

Jefferson City, Mo.—The State, County & Municipal Employees were overwhelmingly selected to represent more than 1,100 employees of the Missouri Dept. of Corrections in an election conducted by the State Board of Mediation.

AFSCME Missouri Council 72 President Bob Anderson hailed the victory, which resulted in 497 votes for AFSCME against 27 votes for no union.

jobs with the fate of workers who get "plant gates slammed in their face and walk to the end of a 4,000-mile unemployment line."

Georgetown University Law Prof. Eleanor Holmes Norton, who headed the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission during the Carter Administration, warned that the loss of decent-paying industrial jobs for blacks and Hispanics is threatening to wipe out a generation of economic gain.

Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall spoke of the enormous cost of unemployment and said full employment should be the "most important goal" of economic policy.

He and other speakers stressed that U.S. monetary policy that drives up the value of the dollar in relation to other world currencies amounts to subsidizing imports and overpricing America's exports.

His fellow panelists came from unions whose members have been among the heaviest hit by the loss of industrial jobs.

Once growing, now gone

President William H. Bywater of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers traced the IUE's drop over 20 years from 400,000 members to fewer than 200,000 and the virtual disappearance of the U.S. radio and television industry that was once the union's growth area of membership.

The highly touted "high-tech" industries won't provide jobs for workers from the factories and assembly lines, he warned, and in fact are themselves joining the exodus overseas.

"It's unfair to the workers of our country, and it has got to be stopped," Bywater insisted.

Auto Workers Vice President Don Ephlin noted that over 250,000 UAW members in the Big Three auto companies are still without jobs despite the pick-up in sales. Of six auto assembly plants in California, he said, only one will still be in operation after next month. And only the possibility of domestic content legislation keeps foreign manufacturers still interested in the establishment of production facilities in the United States, he suggested.

Steelworkers Sec. Lynn R. Williams questioned whether a few giant corporations and multinationals should have the unchecked power to destroy industries essential to the U.S. economy.

He spoke bitterly of U.S. Steel's announced plans to import steel slabs at the expense of U.S. production and warned that, as in other industries, one company starts and others follow suit.

President Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers noted in a prepared address to the conference that U.S. trade policy remains based on free trade concepts and competitive advantage assumptions that haven't reflected the reality of world conditions for 20 years.

American industries are "competing with foreign governments, not foreign workers," he stressed. Pillard was sidelined by illness and his administrative assistant, Anthony Salamone, represented him. IBEW delegates from industrial locals in 40 states took part in the IUD conference.

Delegates gave warm receptions to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and to four announced candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination. Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale spoke on the opening day luncheon program. Senators Gary Hart (Colo.), John Glenn (Ohio) and Alan Cranston (Calif.) were on the May 5 program.

Legislation on plant closings sought to protect workers

A parade of union witnesses, including workers who have experienced plant closings at first hand, testified to the need for legislation that would avoid plant shutdowns where possible and relieve hardships when jobs can't be saved.

No hearing room at the Capitol was large enough to accommodate the delegates to the Industrial Union Dept. legislative conference who wanted to attend, so Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) brought his Labor-Management Relations subcommittee to an auditorium in the Dept. of Health & Human Services building.

The hearings focused on the labor-backed bill introduced by Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), and Clay pledged every effort to move the measure through committee and to the floor of the House.

It would require firms to give workers, unions, communities and the federal government advance notice of intent to shut down or transfer operations and authorize the Secretary of Labor to explore measures to avoid a shutdown. If the closing takes place, the employer would be liable for income maintenance payments for up to a year, backed by the government. Workers would be entitled to transfer rights and training, while communities could receive grants to compensate for tax losses.

One of the witnesses brought by the IUD to testify on the measure was Herman Rebhan, general secretary of the Geneva-based International Metalworkers Federation, and he found nothing unusual in such legislation.

Worker safeguards

Nearly every country in Europe restricts mass layoffs and plant closings, he said, and in many cases the worker safeguards go beyond the terms of the legislation before the subcommittee.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel termed the increase in plant shutdowns "a national crisis" and noted that it is no longer a problem of the older industrial areas. "More than half of all closings in the last decade occurred in the South and the West," he testified.

Nor is it just older plants that are being closed, Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers told the subcommittee. He cited a study of 171 plants closed by major corporations that had a median age of only 15 years, with one-third no more than six years old.

"The United States simply cannot afford to have its relatively up-to-date manufacturing capacity run into the ground and its workers consigned to the discard heap," he said.

Business rationale

IUE President William Bywater noted that firms moving plants to low-wage countries typically defend their actions as "simply a matter of economics."

But it is the workers and the deserted communities that suffer the "devastating economic consequences of these company decisions," Bywater stressed.

"Should the law continue to protect only the stockholder? Or should it also protect the community, which is left to absorb the shock?"

Machinists President William W. Winpisinger proposed an arbitration system under which workers of the community could challenge a company's decision to shut down or move away its operations. If the panel found that a firm could profitably continue operations, it could recommend a federal court injunction to prevent the shutdown.

Prepared testimony by UAW Vice President Marc Stepp noted that two years after a shutdown of a Ford plant in New Jersey, half the workers were still unemployed.

IUE District 3 President Archie Cole spoke bitterly of half a million jobs lost in New York and New Jersey over the past 10 years and cited the example of the Otis Elevator Co. which was kept in business by government loans but then taken over by United Technologies. By the end of this month, he said, "the last 200 workers will be gone and United Technologies will sell the government-supported plant at a profit."

R-T-W bill bounced

Concord, N.H.—The New Hampshire senate rejected a "right-to-work" bill 14 to 9 in the first test of the union-busting proposal since the 1982 elections.

The bill, introduced early in the legislative session and brought quickly to the floor for a vote, had emerged from committee with a "do not pass" recommendation.

State AFL-CIO President Harland Eaton, who actively lobbied against passage, said the senate's speedy and decisive action was the fruit of much hard work by union members to show lawmakers how the measure would harm both the state's workers and its industries.

Eaton pointed out that the senate's action is the latest in a long line of defeats handed to "right-to-work" supporters in the state over the past 10 years.

Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, said that although the National Right to Work Committee has been pressing the legislation in New England state legislatures for a decade, every attempt in each state has been a failure.

Teachers 'reach out' for children of jobless

"I wondered to myself what the word unemployed meant. Unemployment must mean something awful—tears were in my dad's eyes. I had never seen him cry before. I was confused."

Reactions like this are not uncommon from school-age children whose parents are caught up in the frightening and often lengthy cycle of unemployment.

In an effort to help students understand this family crisis, the American Federation of Teachers launched a six-week pilot project in Youngstown, Ohio, where AFT members volunteer after school hours to counsel children from families affected by unemployment.

"Unemployment is a serious national problem, and in Youngstown the plight is even greater where the jobless rate is more than double the U.S. average," said AFT President Albert Shanker.

"With national unemployment remaining in double digits, we are getting feedback from AFT members who work as guidance counselors and teachers telling us the grades and behavior of many children are taking a sudden change for the worse because of one overriding problem—out-of-work parents," Shanker said.

He noted that a variety of government services are available to those directly affected by unemployment, but that when it comes to providing vital services to those people dependent on a mother or father working, no such program exists.

High jobless rate

The AFT selected Youngstown because unemployment there is above 20 percent, and the size of the school district's enrollment is a manageable one in which to conduct a pilot project.

Called "Project Reach Out," the program is designed to provide after-school counseling and discussion including simulation games for children in grades one through eight. Youngstown schools have about 8,700 children in the first eight grades.

If the Youngstown project is successful, Shanker said, it will be a model for a national AFT program starting this fall in other school districts. The AFT has nearly 600,000 members and represents teachers in nearly every major city.

Materials for the program, titled "My Dad Is Unemployed, but It's Not the End of the World," were developed by Artie Morris-Vann, an AFT member who works as a guidance counselor in Detroit.

Frank Kovach, a Youngstown high school history teacher, is coordinating the program with volunteer support from a dozen guidance counselors.

"Even with the spotty signs of national recovery, places like Youngstown will lag way behind the rest of the nation," Kovach observed, adding, "That's why we are teaming up to go after the special problems of the children of the unemployed."

The disruption of family lifestyles at times like these often leads to feelings of insecurity and fears about the future by children. These and other emotional disturbances may result in interference with learning in the school, Kovach said.

Group discussions

Kovach said the "Reach Out" team will work three days a week during after-school hours at various school sites where small group discussions will be held with participating children grouped by age. The sessions will be conducted by a qualified teacher who will strive to bring out the anxieties as well as build self-esteem and prevent the development of further, more serious psychological problems in the children.

a drop in credit outstanding, a new component. The rise in initial claims for unemployment insurance, which has a negative impact on the index, was another. The others were building permits and manufacturers' new orders for consumer goods.

The 12th component in the index, the change in inventories, is reported after a one-month lag.

Most economists expect recovery this year to be modest. That would mean that joblessness, at 10.3 percent in March, is likely to be near the 10 percent level by the end of the year.

Analysts also are concerned over government reports showing a 1.6-percent decline in construction spending in March, and a $3.63 billion widening in the nation's merchandise trade deficit during the month. Continuing weakness in new factory orders for consumer goods and in consumers' willingness to increase their debt added to doubts over the sustainability of the recovery.

The March trade deficit of $3.63 billion compared with February's $3.58 billion. The trade gap occurred despite a drop in the price of imported oil to the lowest level in three years.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige predicted that higher monthly deficits appear to be in store for the remainder of 1983, and that this year's total deficit is likely to exceed last year's record red ink total of $42.69 billion by $15 billion or more.

Rise in imports

Imports in March increased 2.4 percent to a seasonally adjusted $20.4 billion after falling in February to an adjusted $19.9 billion. Total merchandise exports over the month rose 2.6 percent to $16.75 billion.

Construction spending last month dropped 1.6 percent, reflecting weakness in both commercial and public housing. The March decline in building outlays, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $245.4 billion, followed a 2.6-percent drop in February, the Commerce Dept. said.

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that productivity, as measured by output per hour of all workers, increased during the first quarter of 1983 in all sectors of the economy. The business sector, the broadest measure, showed productivity rose at a 2.2-percent annual rate. Manufacturing productivity was up 7.1 percent.

Historic print

Remembrance of a dramatic moment in labor history, the jailing of Air Traffic Controller Steve Wallaert during the 1981 PATCO strike, is presented to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland by officers of the new United States Air Traffic Controllers Organization, President Gary Eads, left and Treasurer Michael Fermon, right. The limited edition lithograph was made from a charcoal drawing by former controller Wes Cloud of Fort Worth, Tex., and funds from sales of the prints have been used by USATCO for the legal defense of controllers still facing criminal charges stemming from the strike.

New air controllers group using donations for legal aid

Union members concerned about the plight of former professional air traffic controllers fired during the 1981 PATCO strike can assist them through the new organization formed to represent the controllers' interests.

Gary Eads, president of the United States Air Traffic Controllers Organization, said in a letter to editors of union publications that the organization needs contributions to its legal defense fund.

The USATCO fund, Eads said, is helping to process the claims of thousands of controllers who are appealing their firings by President Reagan. The fund is also aiding former PATCO local union officers still facing massive personal fines and criminal felony charges stemming from the strike.

Dismissals upheld

In late April, the full Merit Systems Protection Board decided seven cases involving 131 fired controllers, upholding the dismissals of all but three. The MSPB said the basis of the decisions in these cases will be used to decide nearly 5,000 pending appeals which board expects to act on by Sept. 30.

In denying the appeals of the 128 controllers, the MSPB rejected charges that the Federal Aviation Administration failed to clearly show strike participation before firing them.

The board held that the FAA had only to prove that a controller was absent without leave during the period of the strike, while the employee must prove he or she was absent with permission.

The board also held that public workers engaged in a strike in violation of a federal anti-strike law are not entitled to the protections against illegal lockouts under the Taft-Hartley Act. Controllers whose appeals are denied may petition the U.S. Court of Appeals for review.

Formed last year

USATCO was founded in July 1982 by former PATCO officers and members and with the help of a number of working controllers.

Eads said USATCO membership now totals 1,875, including both dismissed and working controllers. The organization maintains a seven-district national structure with the help of part-time directors and organizers. Membership is growing by about 75 controllers a month, he said.

Eads reported that USATCO is considering plans for a national meeting of air traffic controllers in Washington, D.C. later this year and is working on a union constitution.

Organizing efforts are under way at a number of Federal Aviation Administration facilities, he said. When the local organizations have a sufficient number of members, Eads said, USATCO will ask the government to recognize the organization as the controllers' exclusive union representative.

USATCO's Legal Defense Fund, and its fund to aid the families of local officers still facing jail terms, is situated at 210 7th St., S.E., C-26, Washington, D.C. 20003, telephone: 202-543-0772.

Salvador court hit for dropping murder charges

tle, as well as Jose Rodolfo Viera, 43, the director of the Salvadoran government's Institute for Agrarian Transformation, were shot to death by two former National Guard corporals on Jan. 3, 1981, in a hotel restaurant in San Salvador.

The gunmen, who have confessed to the killings, implicated the three well connected Salvadorans in the crime, but a Salvadoran judge ruled last October there was not enough evidence to take them to trial.

The State Dept. reacted to the dismissal of charges against the three implicated Salvadorans with concern, saying it was "disappointed" by the decision.

A key figure in the murders of Pearlman, Hammer, and Viera is National Guard Lt. Isidro Lopez Sibrian. The gunmen have testified Lopez ordered the murders of the three men.

Plot scenario

Court testimony and extrajudicial testimony turned up by AIFLD last fall produced this scenario of events leading to the quickly hatched plot to assassinate the labor leaders:

On the night of the murders, Lopez drove to the home of Salvadoran businessman Hans Christ and the two of them later got in touch with Army Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila, whose uncle is a ranking figure on the Salvadoran supreme court. Lopez was accompanied by his bodyguard, Corp. Jose Dimas Valle Acevedo, a National Guardsman.

Court testimony revealed that Lopez and Christ, their wives, and Avila went to the coffee shop at the Sheraton, where Viera, Hammer, and Pearlman later showed up. Because the coffee shop was crowded, the three labor officials took a waiter's advice to go instead to the hotel restaurant.

Avila told investigators Christ muttered a curse about Viera, got up and followed the three men into the restaurant to see where they were seated. Testimony revealed that, sometime after 11 p.m., Lopez, Avila, and Christ went into the hotel parking lot, where Lopez told Dimas: "You are going to kill them."

Lopez then ordered Corp. Santiago Gomez Gonzalez, the bodyguard of another National Guard officer, to help Dimas carry out the "job." When Gomez demurred, Lopez walked back into the hotel, and returned moments later to say that the officer, Maj. Mario Denis Moran, had said it was all right for Gomez to assist Dimas. Moran has denied giving such approval and has not been directly implicated in the murders.

Lopez gave a gun to Gomez, while Avila gave one to Dimas, testimony showed. The corporals told the court that Christ then led the two gunmen into the restaurant, and pointed out the victims.

In its Apr. 29 dismissal of the charges against Christ, Lopez and Avila, the appeals court ordered the two gunmen to stand trial.

Bargaining report

Drop in average pay reflects steel cutback

The impact of the battered economy on workers' pay was borne out in a Bureau of Labor Statistics report showing an average 1.4-percent wage decline in the first year of major collective bargaining agreements concluded in the first three months of 1983.

Over the life of the contracts, wage increases average only 2.2 percent annually, BLS said. Both figures were record lows.

The wage decrease in the initial year of the contracts is the first negative average adjustment since BLS began the series 15 years ago. About half of the 546,000 workers covered by the settlements had wage decreases, the government said.

"Most of these workers were in the steel industry," said BLS. "Another one-tenth of the workers were under contracts that specified no wage change. Contracts covering the remaining workers provided the smallest wage increases on record."

The data cover workers in private industry bargaining units of at least 1,000. Altogether, BLS keeps track of some 8.3-million workers in such units.

Previous gains

The last time the same parties bargained—two to three years ago in most cases—average wage increases were 7.3 percent in the first contract year and 5.4 percent a year over the life of the agreements, BLS said.

Wage decreases during the January-March quarter, averaging 6.4 percent in the first contract year, were mostly in contracts settled before the previous agreements expired, the agency observed. The most prominent of these was the basic steel settlement reached in February.

The steel industry agreement reduces wages in the first year, but restores virtually all of the cuts by the end of the 41-month agreement. The cost-of-living clause was retained, but no payment would be made until August 1984 at the earliest.

Some get raises

Among settlements containing wage increases in the first and subsequent years were those in the airlines, utilities, retail trade, and glass manufacturing industries. These averaged 6 percent the first year and 5.3 percent annually over the life of the agreement.

Contracts with no specified increases are in a variety of industries, including construction and can manufacturing, where an early settlement was concluded.

Two-thirds of the workers under the first-quarter settlements were covered by contracts with cost-of-living clauses, BLS said, adding that most workers under these contracts took wage cuts. In settlements with COL clauses, the average wage adjustment was a 4.3-percent decline in the first year, compared with a 4.4-percent increase in settlements without COL clauses.

In key contracts, those measuring wages and benefit costs in settlements covering at least 5,000 workers, total compensation adjustments declined an average 1.8 percent in the first year and rose an average 1.4 percent annually over the life of the contracts.

"The historically low settlements in the first three months of 1982 continue the moderation in the size of settlements that began in the first quarter of 1982," BLS said.

In the current April-June period, 369 major agreements covering 1,167,000 workers are due to expire or may be reopened for wage negotiations.

Institute assails Administration on rights failure

The Reagan Administration's lack of concern and enforcement of civil rights and women's rights was condemned by participants in the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Institute.

The weeklong conference at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies brought together representatives of labor, civil rights and educational groups who assailed the Reagan cutbacks in equal employment opportunity and affirmative action programs.

Panel discussions covered topics on equal job opportunities, youth employment, building coalitions, political action, legislative goals, working women, and union responsibility.

A number of speakers cited the mayoral election in Chicago and the gubernatorial election in California as reasons why minorities and women's groups must continue to work toward greater representation in politics at the local, state and national levels.

Guest speakers included Eleanor Holmes Norton, professor of law at Georgetown Law School; Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts; Wiley Branton, dean of the Howard University Law School; Floretta McKenzie, superintendent of the District of Columbia public schools: Dr. Bernard E. Enderson, director of Social Services Dept. of the Rockefeller Foundation; Henry Lacayo, Auto Workers' director of National Communications Action Program; and a number of other civil rights and women's rights leaders and AFL-CIO staff members.

AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal joined Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard in welcoming delegates.

ILO urges steps to increase construction jobs worldwide

Geneva—The International Labor Organization called on its 150 member states to undertake immediate efforts to increase the number of construction industry jobs.

Worker, employer and government delegates to a 29-nation session of the ILO's Building, Civil Engineering & Public Works Committee voiced deep concern at the grave consequences of the worldwide depression in the industry.

In calling for expanded construction and public works programs, the committee stressed the job-creating impact that increased activity in these sectors has throughout a nation's economy.

A unanimously approved resolution noted that such programs make a vital contribution in raising overall economic activity. This results not only from the increased employment and resulting higher output in the sectors directly concerned but also from the "production and employment they generate in other sectors," it stressed.

Accord welcomed

J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers, welcomed the accord registered by the tripartite committee on the need to create jobs for construction workers.

Commenting on the results of the 10-day session, Turner recalled with satisfaction that the committee had not confined itself to an appeal for the creation of jobs. It went on to outline the action needed to increase the employment of construction workers through such measures as the development of public works programs and the reduction and stabilizing of interest rates, he said.

Turner and President John T. Joyce of the Bricklayers formed the AFL-CIO worker team of the U.S. delegation.

During the committee's discussions, Joyce denounced Poland's flouting of the ILO commitment to include trade unionists on its delegations.

But at least this backsliding "avoids the hypocrisy of presenting fictitious worker representatives," Joyce said in an allusion to Warsaw's outlawing of the Solidarity free trade union federation.

As a member of the workers' group on the committee that examined the key issue of working conditions in the construction industry, Joyce noted what he termed "some hardening of attitudes" among employers.

Nevertheless, despite the different backgrounds and diverse interests of delegations draw from all parts of the world, communication was established, Joyce observed. "The general thrust was in the right direction," he said.

The conclusions approved unanimously for submission to governments declared that the protection of workers' health and safety should be assured by national law prepared in consultation with workers and employers.

Magic Chef pact with IAM shows split personality

Galesburg, Ill.—Machinists at the Magic Chef division of Admiral Co. here voted overwhelmingly to endorse a new three-year agreement that will provide wage increases and improved benefits to the more than 2,000 IAM Local 2063 members, who manufacture home refrigerators.

The new pact provides a 50-cent an hour raise immediately; 40 cents and 35 cents in the second and third years respectively. Cost-of-living adjustments will also be made in the second and third years, adjusted quarterly but capped at 10 cents over the year.

The base hourly rate at the plant is currently about $9 but wages range up to $11 an hour under a program of pay incentives, the union said.

Improvements were also made in pension, life insurance, sickness and accident benefits and major medical coverage, which was increased from $25,000 to $50,000 annual maximum.

Meanwhile, however, some 900 members of the Molders remain on strike at Magic Chef's plant in Cleveland, Tenn., where workers walked off the job Jan. 23 after negotiations broke down over management's demands for cutbacks that would "discriminate" against the Tennessee workers in comparison to contracts at the company's other plants. Among the company's demands was the elimination of union dues check-off.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has sanctioned a boycott against gas and electric kitchen ranges made at the Tennesesee facility.

Budget rule hamstrings Congress

Congress has tilted too far toward allowing budget-setting procedures to dictate its legislative agenda, the AFL-CIO told a House Rules Committee task force that is examining the budget process.

Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor expressed the federation's concern at the manner in which the budget mechanism has been manipulated in recent years to bypass the normal legislative procedure.

This year's approach has been more responsible, Taylor acknowledged. But she cautioned that nothing prevents the budget process from again being used "to railroad through Congress with minimal deliberation very substantial destructive changes in federal domestic programs."

Process problems

The complex budget procedure Congress adopted in a 1974 law has never worked in the fine-tuned manner its designers anticipated, Taylor said.

Congress is supposed to complete action on a first budget resolution by May 15. That resolution, based on recommendations of legislative committees and consideration of the President's budget proposals, sets broad spending and revenue targets.

The next step calls for a more detailed second resolution establishing binding spending ceilings, to be enacted by Sept. 15. That second resolution may include reconciliation instructions to the various congressional committees to reshape programs to comply with the final spending and revenue goals. The reconciliation measures are then combined into a single package for final congressional action by Sept. 25, five days before the start of the new fiscal year.

But under the Reagan Administration, Congress has in effect made the first resolution the binding spending ceiling and used reconciliation instructions to compel a major reshaping of government programs.

Taylor voiced a number of concerns over the distortion of the congressional function so that almost everything is subordinated to the budget process, which in turn is based largely on economic assumptions that often are faulty.

The estimates used in setting both revenue and outlay figures are "educated guesses, not truths," she stressed. But they have been used as the basis for drastic policy decisions.

Fundamental change

Taylor welcomed the panel's consideration of changes in the budget procedures that have been proposed by various members of Congress. But she urged the task force to go beyond proposals for "marginal" adjustments in the budget mechanism and "consider more fundamental change."

The budget procedure should not assume that Congress is incapable of legislating in the interests of the country "unless forced to by the budget resolution," Taylor urged.

Health care for jobless

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland discusses free medical services provided to long-term jobless workers and their families in the St. Paul, Minn., area under a 12-week demonstration project arranged by the Minnesota AFL-CIO with the SHARE Health Plan, a unionized health maintenance organization. Kirkland said the project is an "outstanding effort by the state labor movement to cope with an urgent problem. It sets a good example, both to the medical community and organized labor elsewhere in the country." From left: Renee Gustafson, SHARE Director Dr. Larry Kaplan, Kirkland and Joyce Jager. Gustafson and Jager are licensed practical nurses and stewards of Service Employees Local 113.

Union halls to form network of disaster relief centers

Tampa—The AFL-CIO and the American Red Cross have activated the first two union halls in a network of 37 such sites as disaster relief centers along the southeastern coast from Louisiana to Virginia. Inaugural ceremonies here brought on line the heaquarters buildings of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Locals 824 and 915.

A dozen AFL-CIO affiliates have contributed services, equipment and volunteer expertise toward the project. In addition to the IBEW, they are the Steelworkers, Longshoremen, Iron Workers, Government Employees, Woodworkers, Carpenters, Clothing & Textile Workers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Operating Engineers, Boilermakers and Communications Workers.

The project was conceived in 1981, when AFL-CIO and Red Cross officials, noting they shared a common centennial year, adopted a joint project which would provide a service of lasting value to the American public.

Logistics and details were ironed out with the assistance of the federation's Dept. of Community Services and agreements were made with 37 union locals from Lake Charles, La., to Norfolk, Va. Talks are continuing toward arranging other union hall locations along the densely populated coastline from Virginia to Maine.

$5-million effort

The total value of volunteered labor and equipment exceeds $5 million, and Red Cross officials estimate the unions' participation will save the agency millions of dollars more since the union halls are being provided free of charge.

The agreements signed by the participating unions specify the use of a large auditorium, restrooms, kitchen and parking lot.

Generators and communications equipment are being donated by telephone companies in the seven-state area, including Southern Bell, South Central Bell, General Telephone Exchange and United Telephone Service. Each headquarters will be pre-wired with 30 direct phone lines, which can be activated in 12 to 24 hours in an emergency. Other special equipment and personnel to ready the locations have been contributed by building trades union members and union contracting firms. Volunteers from the CWA and IBEW will be available around the clock to handle special problems.

As part of the ceremonies, electricity was shut off to the Local 824 building. Then, the emergency generators were turned on to provide electricity and the first "disaster center" phone call was made to Florida Gov. Robert Graham, alerting him to the activation of the center.

United assistance

IBEW President Charles H. Pillard said that "for years, organized labor has held the belief that if we are to be of real use to our members, we must assist whenever possible in helping their families and the members of their communities. This project is that type of result when unions and employers work together for a common good."

William J. Sande, Red Cross vice president for disasters, noted that when a major hurricane hits along the Gulf Coast, it is not unusual for the Red Cross to augment local volunteers and staff with as many as 500 workers from neighboring states and other regions. In the past, establishment of an emergency headquarters meant setting up phone service, finding a building and occasionally having to relocate at added expense.

A major component in the joint effort in Tampa was General Telephone Exchange, whose president, George Gage, noted the company's donation and that 7,400 of its employees are members of IBEW Local 824.

Methodist clerical staff picks UAW in election

New York—Clerical staff workers at the United Methodist Church Board of Global Ministries here voted 133 to 88 to be represented by Auto Workers District 65.

The election, which marked the first affiliation of any church employees with a major American union, covered secretaries and other clericals on the Methodists' support staff. Missionaries, clergy and other professionals will not be included in contract negotiations.

The first in a network of 37 union halls is "activated" as an American Red Cross disaster relief center.

Labor board upheld

'No-notice' shutdown draws backpay order

Boston—The 1st Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals ordered an employer who shut down a Maine paper mill with virtually no notice to make up back pay and put workers on a preferential hiring list in the event the company resumes operations.

In a unanimous decision, the court upheld a 1981 National Labor Relations Board finding that Penntech Papers, Inc., its wholly-owned subsidiary, T.P. Property Corp., and Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Co., had violated the Taft-Hartley Act by failing to bargain with Paperworkers Locals 36 and 73 on the effects of the mill closing on employees.

The case involves 348 workers let go when Kennebec ceased operations in Madison, Me., in 1977. Both the court and the NLRB ruled that Penntech, T.P. and Kennebec were a "single employer" under the law, even though Kennebec operated the mill on a daily basis.

Penntech, a Delaware corporation with headquarters in New York City, organized T.P. Property Corp. in 1975. T.P. performed no other corporate function until March 1976, when it purchased the outstanding capital stock in Kennebec, which had closed the mill in December 1975 because of declining profits. Kennebec had operated the plant since 1959.

With T.P.'s acquisition of the firm, and with several Penntech officers on the Kennebec board, the mill continued to lose money after operations resumed, losing some $3 million in 1976. Management decided to close the mill Mar. 29, 1977.

Union last to know

Until then, the companies never notified the Paperworkers, which had signed a collective bargaining agreement with Kennebec on Mar. 1, 1976, of its intention to discontinue operations. On the closing date, Kennebec's president met with union representatives at 1:30 p.m., and told them for the first time that the mill would be shut down and that workers should empty their lockers and remove their tools from the plant by 3 p.m. that day.

The union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB, alleging that all three companies violated the law by closing the mill without adequate notice and failing to bargain with the union over the effects of the plant closing on Kennebec employees. The union also sought arbitration of contract issues regarding Kennebec workers' right to vacations, pensions, and severance pay.

The Paperworkers initiated the action in behalf of Kennebec workers represented by Firemen & Oilers Local 270 and Machinists Local 599 and IAM District 99 as well as its Local 36 and 73 members.

Following lengthy litigation on the arbitration request, the 1st Circuit Court, on appeal from a dismissal of the union's action, ruled that since Penntech and T.P. never signed the collective bargaining agreement with the Paperworkers, they could not be compelled to arbitrate. The court rejected the union's argument that Penntech was the "alter ego" of Kennebec because of their interrelated operations.

In its latest ruling, however, the court held that its earlier decision does not prevent it from deciding that the three companies are a "single employer" for purposes of the Taft-Hartley Act. It agreed with the NLRB that there is "substantial evidence" to support the board's findings that the companies had interrelated operations, common management, centralized control of labor operations, and common ownership.

Inadequate notice

"It is clear that the notice to the union on Mar. 29, 1977, of the decision to terminate Kennebec's operations that very same day did not afford the union an adequate opportunity to bargain over the effects of that decision upon the employees."

The board remedy approved by the court awards back pay to Kennebec employees until Penntech reaches agreement with the union on the effects of the plant closing.

NLRB also ordered Penntech to establish a preferential hiring list of laid-off Kennebec workers, and hire from that list if it resumes operations in Madison.

Court urged to put Davis-Bacon change on hold

tions but appealed Judge Greene's decision. Union attorneys countered with an appeal of the one rules change that had not been barred—elimination of the so-called 30 percent rule.

Under that provision, the prevailing wage is set as the rate received by the largest number of workers in a job classification within the geographical area being surveyed, provided at least 30 percent of the workers in that classification receive the rate. Otherwise, a weighted average is used.

Non-union contractors had complained that this often resulted in the union scale being set as the prevailing rates and the Labor Dept. proposed to raise the 30 percent requirement to 50 percent.

'Helper' substitute barred

Other changes it sought, which Judge Greene barred as clearly contrary to the intent of Congress, included a rule that would have allowed contractors almost unlimited freedom to substitute semi-skilled "helpers" at lower pay for both skilled journeymen and apprentices.

In a surprise move, the Labor Dept. chose not to wait for the appellate court to act and announced that the abolition of the 30 percent rule would take effect June 28, following the required 60-day notice.

Labor Dept. officials indicated that the other rules changes would be reinstated if allowed by the appellate court and that an appeal would be pursued to the Supreme Court if the decision went against the government.

Plant Closing Styles

THIS IS an account of a plant closing, American style, as related by James Savoy of Chester, Mass., who was the last president of the Machinists local that represented workers at Courtland Grinding Wheels Co.

The formerly family-owned firm had been the town's largest employer. But after two sales to distant corporations, it ended its productive life as a tax writeoff for Dresser Industries, an enterprise that is no stranger to plant closings.

Dresser Industries is described by Savoy as "an almost nation-sized multinational corporate employer," which had more than $4 billion in sales last year. Its return to investors over a 10-year period had averaged 7.8 percent and it was 83rd in size among the Fortune 500 list of America's largest corporations.

There were signs of trouble, Savoy testified, and workers agreed to contract givebacks even though the average wage was only $6.50 an hour.

MANAGEMENT GAVE assurances that the plant would not close. But if it ever did, "we would be given plenty of advance notice."

Instead, last October, "we were told the plant was going to be shut down within three weeks." But the company was not entirely heartless. "They agreed to pay our Blue Cross from November to February—three months," Savoy testified.

The local government, shocked by the abrupt closing, sought out possible purchasers for the plant, to either buy it or convert it—and actually lined up several prospective buyers.

"But Dresser Industries won't sell," Savoy told the committee, "and won't even talk to the city officials about selling."

So the plant that was so important to the economy of Chester "just sits there idle," he testified.

His own guess, Savoy said, is that the parent corporation is "making money from it through tax writeoffs, probably more money than if it was operating or sold."

Meanwhile, "30 acres and a big plant is just wasting." And so are many of the people who used to work there.

CONTRAST THIS with the plant closing, European style, as related by Herman Rebhan, the general secretary of the International Metalworkers Federation.

Not just plant closings, but any significant layoffs, are covered by legislated safeguards in most Free World industrialized countries, he testified.

Typically, he related, employers "must give advance notice of layoff—from three months to a person with less than five years seniority to nine months for someone with more than 15 years on the job."

In Sweden, the employer "must show reasonable grounds" for a layoff, and if a large-scale relocation is unavoidable, the resources of government and the community are brought in "to put together some sort of a rational employment assistance plan."

Belgium and France have industrial redevelopment funds that provide low-interest loans to new enterprises locating in areas hit by plant closings.

Further, he added pointedly, "the notion of using the threat of closing a plant as a weapon in collective bargaining with a union is completely foreign in Europe and, indeed, in much of the rest of the world."

AMERICANS ARE accustomed to a leadership role in the world, and some may find it a culture shock to find the United States toward the bottom of the ladder in terms of legislated protections for its workers.

We don't always take kindly to outside advice. But it would be difficult for even the most hardened xenophobe to quarrel with the concluding paragraph of Brother Rebhan's testimony:

"America would go far toward a more secure, just and fair society if it were to initiate its own plant closing and layoff warning system."

Scofflaw firms rewarded with hefty U.S. contracts

By Press Associates, Inc.

During a period of fierce struggles by workers to assert their right to be organized, Congress in 1935 enacted the National Labor Relations Act to set ground rules for organizing and bargaining.

But in recent years the evidence has been piling up that employers increasingly have been flouting the NLRA in their determination to keep out or bust unions. Some of the worst labor law violators are giant conglomerates which profit from lucrative federal contracts.

At a recent hearing before the House Labor-Management subcommittee, labor leaders, workers and academic experts testified in favor of a bill to put teeth into the NLRA by denying federal contracts to the more flagrant violators.

As a prime example of the need for a meaningful legal deterrent, those at the hearing cited Litton Industries' 20-year history of illegal and unrestrained union-busting. The giant conglomerate is the nation's 11th largest defense contractor.

William H. Bywater, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, told the panel of his union's attempt to organize Litton's Triad-Utrad plant in Huntington, Ind., beginning in 1980.

Company campaign

Days after an IUE organizing committee was set up in the plant, Litton flew in a troubleshooter from its industrial relations division to begin "a massive campaign of coercion and intimidation."

Company illegalities included "widespread interrogation of employees concerning their union sympathies and activities; threats of discharge, physical violence and other reprisals; threats of plant closure, and interference with the distribution of union literature." Five union supporters were fired or harassed into quitting. The union filed complaints of over 50 NLRA violations.

A year later, hearings on the complaints began before the National Labor Relations Board. Litton, to avoid a "guilty" finding and penalties by the NLRB, offered to rehire the illegally discharged workers with full back pay.

To avoid a long and expensive legal battle as well as further hardship on the victimized employees, the union agreed. But by that time, the momentum of the organizing campaign had been lost and morale broken. The union pulled out.

Litton's strategy had worked—the same as it had in four previous organizing campaigns at the same plant, in 1964, 1969, 1975 and 1978.

Ohio target

Walter L. Martin, an international representative for the Graphic Arts International Union, described how Litton has tried to bust a long-established local at its McBee Systems subsidiary in Athens, Ohio.

Martin said the GAIU local is the only one left at the plant since Litton destroyed, one by one, four other unions after it bought the plant in 1965. The company's methods included instigation of decertification campaigns and large-scale transfers of work to open shop states.

Martin said none of "the besieged and frightened employees" targeted by the current decertification drive at the plant dared to come and testify at the hearing. He said they feared company reprisals despite NLRB protective orders.

The cynical, calculated way in which Litton and other companies abuse labor laws to thwart their employees' rights, chalking up the small penalties as just another cost of doing business, recently brought a strong reaction from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Calling federal labor laws "a set of shackles around us," Kirkland said, "I have slowly come to the conviction that we might be better off if we deregulated labor legislation—just simply did away with the NLRB, did away with the Taft-Hartley Act, did away with all of it."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Is Moving Fast on Key Labor Issues

NEW SENATE HEALTH CARE BILL

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-MA) and six other members of the Senate Labor Committee have introduced S. 1154 to provide health care for the unemployed. This bill is equivalent to H.R. 2552 by Rep. Henry Waxman (D-CA). Urge your Senators to cosponsor S. 1154, with improvements as outlined in the April 25 Alert!

BILL WOULD PROVIDE PLANT CLOSING PROTECTIONS

Maine and Wisconsin have passed legislation to require employers who plan to close plants to give advance notice to the workers. Rep. William Ford (D-MI) has introduced H.R. 2847 to provide such protections nationwide.

The bill also would require employers to provide transfer rights, relocation expenses, severance pay, and other protections to those laid off, and would improve training programs for displaced workers. The AFL-CIO testified in support of this kind of legislation.

Urge your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 2847.

REAGAN PUSHES TUITION TAX CREDITS

The "favor the rich" crowd is at it again with a new bill, S. 528, which would provide tax credits for those who send their children to private schools. The credit -- up to $300 per year --would cost the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars, increasing pressure to cut funding for public schools. And $300 per pupil is more than the federal government provides for public schools in 32 states.

Urge your Senators to oppose S. 528.

BANKRUPTCY BILLS CLEAR SENATE

The Senate approved legislation that could make it difficult for long-term jobless and others hard-pressed by the recession to declare bankruptcy.

The Senate Bill is somewhat less retrictive than the credit industry proposal; further improvement is necessary in the House. Urge your Representative to support H.R. 1147.

IMMIGRATION BILLS MOVING; SENATE BEGINS DEBATE

The Senate began debate on immigration reform legislation on April 28, to be resumed after completion of the budget. The House Judiciary Committee reported its bill May 5. Urge your Representative to approve improving amendments to H.R. 1510 as outlined in the March 14 issue of the Alert!

PUBLIC WORKS JOBS BILL MOVING

The AFL-CIO testified in support of H.R. 2544, which would provide $4 billion for public works repair. This bill would begin to rebuild our decaying highways, bridges, rail systems, urban transit systems, ports, inland waterways, and dams, and would restore hundreds of thousands of jobs. Urge your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 2544.

"ENTERPRISE ZONES" WOULD COST JOBS

The Reagan Administration's so-called enterprise zone legislation for depressed urban areas would not create additional jobs as claimed, but would create tax incentives to shut down or relocate plants, the AFL-CIO told the Senate Finance Committee. The way to revitalize distressed areas is through direct reindustrialization programs, not through ever-greater business tax cuts.

Urge your Senators to oppose S. 863 and any other so-called "enterprise zone" bills.

New Bill Would Save U.S. Jobs and Protect Caribbean Workers

For more than a year the AFL-CIO has fought against passage of the Reagan Caribbean Basin legislation, because it would cause the loss of tens of thousands of U.S. jobs and would encourage multinational corporations to exploit cheap Caribbean labor.

An alternative Caribbean Basin bill has been introduced in Congress by Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-MO). His bill, H.R. 2819, will provide stimulus to the economies of Caribbean nations, while American industries, already reeling from unrestrained imports, would be protected against new threats from the Caribbean. And the Caribbean nations would have to guarantee their workers basic human rights, workplace safety protections, and collective bargaining rights.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 2819. And ask your Representative and Senators to oppose the anti-worker Reagan CBI bill. Particularly important are members of the House Ways and Means Committee, listed at right.

Targeting benefits toward Caribbean nations	To ensure that Caribbean countries really benefit from this bill, strong, self-sufficient trading nations elsewhere in the world will be phased out from duty-free privileges they currently enjoy under other laws. Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong, Mexico, and Brazil in 1983; other countries later. This also helps to relieve pressure on U.S. markets.	No such provision. Competing nations that already are strong in world trade would continue to enjoy special duty-free U.S. trade privileges, diluting any benefit to Caribbean nations.
Eligibility requirements	(1) Eligible nations must guarantee human rights, including freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly. (2) Eligible nations must provide workplace safety and health standards, collective bargaining and organizing rights. (3) Eligible nations may not participate in OPEC-like cartels that disrupt the world economy. The President must receive majority votes in the House and Senate to waive the above requirements.	(1) No human rights standards (2) Weak, easily waived worker safety and collective bargaining standards. (3) No anti-cartel provision. President would have complete authority to provide trade privileges to any nation he chose; no Congressional oversight authority.
Other factors	(1) Eligible nations must work with the United States to prevent the export of narcotic drugs to the U.S. (2) Eligible nations must not aid, abet, or grant sancturary to international terrorists.	No such requirements.
Exempted import-sensitive products	Not duty-free are: (1) Textiles, apparel, footwear, luggage, petroleum products, tuna, (2) Import-sensitive manufactured products, including watches, electronics, certain types of steel and glass products, (3) Products already limited by bilateral agreements between the U.S. and other nations, and products found under U.S. trade laws to be suffering from unfair trade practices.	Only products listed under (1) are exempted. Other products would receive duty-free access to U.S.
Local content requirements	To prevent multinational corporations from funneling their products throught the Caribbean to take advantage of U.S. duty-free privileges, 35 percent of the value of the product must be produced in the Caribbean beneficiary country (50 percent after Sept. 30, 1985). This value must be produced in a single country, not any combination of 28 Caribbean nations, and U.S. materials do not count towards the 35 percent.	35 percent value produced in any combination of 28 Caribbean beneficiary nations. No upgrading to 50 percent. U.S. content may count 15 percent, leaving only 20 percent Caribbean content. Multinational corporations could derive all the benefits of duty-free access while Caribbean workers would do only 20 percent of the work.

Jailed for striking

Gary Greene, right, a former Air Traffic Controller, gets encouragement from a supporter outside the federal courthouse in Fort Worth, Tex., as he reports to begin a 90-day sentence on a felony conviction for the 1981 PATCO strike. The AFL-CIO condemned "the vindictiveness displayed by the jailing" of the local union leader "whose only 'crime' was being a leader of workers he represented." Former PATCO members have suffered enough, the federation said, calling for a time for "healing and compassion" and stressing that the "national conscience and the air-traveling public would be better served if these highly skilled professionals were permitted to return to work rather than sent to jail." Three other former PATCO members are also facing jail terms.

Labor Board votes to undercut power of general counsel

By David L. Perlman

The Republican majority on the National Labor Relations Board has voted to downgrade the responsibilities of the agency's independent general counsel and shift major enforcement powers to its new solicitor, an alumnus of the anti-union Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation.

The new policy, adopted by the NLRB at the urging of its chairman, Donald Dotson, substantially lessens the role of NLRB General Counsel William A. Lubbers, who is in the final year of his statutory four-year term. The general counsel is the only NLRB official other than the five board members who is appointed by the President and subject to confirmation by the Senate.

Under the new policy, the general counsel's long-established authority over enforcement litigation and over the staff of the enforcement division's appellate court branch is transferred to the solicitor.

Anti-labor background

Hugh Reilly, the recently appointed NLRB solicitor, came to the Reagan Administration from the staff of the right to work foundation, which specializes in harassment suits against unions and uses virulent anti-labor propaganda in its fund-raising. (See editorial, Page 15.)

Reilly went from the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation to the Labor Dept. when the Reagan administration took office. He served as executive assistant to Dotson, who was assistant secretary of labor for labor-management relations before being named NLRB chairman.

Dotson's own background has been as a management lawyer and, when he was appointed to head the NLRB, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed "grave reservations" about the choice of a management partisan to protect workers' rights.

In a letter to Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), Kirkland warned earlier this year that the Administration's policy of packing the NLRB on ideological lines raises doubts as to the labor board's concern for protecting the rights of workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

Another Reagan appointee to the NLRB, Robert Hunter, as a Senate staffer had been a strategist for the filibuster that blocked labor law reform, Kirkland noted. He described Reagan's choices for the NLRB as "rewards by the Administration to the reactionary businessmen and to the far right wing that the Administration delights to serve.".

Split vote

The NLRB vote to shift authority from the general counsel to the solicitor was reported as 3-1.

Voting with Dotson were Hunter and Howard Jenkins, a holdover Republican who is the senior member of the board. Voting against the move was Don A. Zimmerman, an independent appointed by President Carter after having served as counsel to Republican members of the Senate Labor Committee. The newest board member, Patricia Diaz Dennis, was not sworn in until the day after the vote.

The general counsel has statutory authority over issuance of unfair labor practice complaints and over NLRB field offices.

House approves aid plan for jobless homeowners

The House voted 216-196 approval of a labor-urged federal loan program to help unemployed homeowners avoid foreclosure when they can't meet mortgage payments.

Passage came after a bruising partisan battle in which Republicans sought unsuccessfully to substitute a no-cost bank deregulation measure that would have only a fringe impact on foreclosures.

In the end, the enlarged Democratic majority in this Congress prevailed against the conservative coalition that sought to block the bill. Voting for passage were 210 Democrats and six Republicans; opposed were 155 Republicans and 41 Democrats.

The bill now goes to the Senate, where a somewhat different federal loan guarantee program has been proposed with bipartisan sponsorship as part of a housing authorization bill now in the final stages of committee action.

At Senate hearings earlier this month, AFL-CIO Housing Director Henry B. Schechter welcomed the sponsorship of the measure by Senators John Heinz (R-Pa.) and Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.), while urging specific changes to make the legislation more effective.

In the House, Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez (D-Tex.) steered the mortgage relief bill to passage, incorporating various amendments to broaden support but keeping the key provisions intact.

$760 million for loans

The bill authorizes $760 million in loans to homeowners who are involuntarily unemployed, are threatened with foreclosure, and are considered to be good risks for repayment of the loan when economic conditions improve.

In effect, the government loan would be a second mortgage with interest rates tied to Treasury bonds, but not exceeding 10 percent.

The program would be triggered nationally on the basis of mortgage delinquency rates compiled by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and could remain in effect regionally if the national program triggered off. Present delinquency rates are substantially above the bill's trigger point.

Families whose incomes over the past three years had averaged more than $20,000 would have to meet an assets test that the bill's supporters considered reasonable.

The legislation would also require banks or other institutions holding mortgages to

Recovery's pace too slow to cut unemployment

Unemployment remains at "cruel and unacceptably high" levels despite some encouraging signs in the government's report that the nation's jobless rate edged slightly downward in April to 10.2 percent, the AFL-CIO declared.

"The economic recovery is proceeding too slowly to offer solace to the 11.3 million Americans still officially counted as jobless," a federation statement warned. "There is little hope in these statistics that excessively high unemployment will end soon."

Unions urge summit nations to take job-creating action

By James M. Shevis

Trade union leaders from the free industrialized world warned that rapid exchange rate fluctuations and high unemployment threaten to choke off the fragile economic recovery in the West.

"Signs of an upturn in certain countries, and especially in the United States, should not be interpreted as the automatic recovery which has been now promised for four years as a result of the goverments' tight policies," the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development cautioned. A memorandum outlining the TUAC position and recommendations will be submitted to the seven-nation economic summit scheduled later this month in Williamsburg, Va.

"Unless sustained and diversified measures are taken by all OECD countries, the small hopes of spring will turn into a bitter autumn of disappointment," the TUAC statement declared.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, a TUAC vice president, told a press conference at federation headquarters on May 12 that the labor advisory panel's key recommendation is for all industrialized nations in the free world to make full employment the goal of their economic policies to bring down the appallingly high rates of joblessness in the West.

"Only a dramatic, coordinated change in policy by all the OECD countries working together can prevent the further rise of world unemployment to the level of 40 million persons," Kirkland warned.

Stability in the international monetary system is indispensable for a climate where productive long-term investments can be

Carrying labor's message

Parade through downtown Birmingham, Ala., carried a union label, American-made message to a rally sponsored by the city's Central Labor Council. Speakers, among those shown carrying the banner, included Mine Workers President Rich Trumka, Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, and Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch. More than 2,000 trade unionists marched to protest job-gutting imports.

Anti-dumping duties sought on TV imports

A labor-industry group has petitioned the government to assess anti-dumping duties of over 40 percent on color televisions imported from Taiwan and Korea.

The 11 unions and four firms that form COMPACT, the Committee to Preserve American Color Television, charged that imported color TV sets are sold in the United States at prices well below the market cost in Taiwan and Korea.

COMPACT, in a petition filed with the Commerce Dept. and the International Trade Commission, said the two countries took 9 to 10 percent of the U.S. market last year and warned that their share could reach 13 to 14 percent this year.

Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers President William H. Bywater, COMPACT co-chairman, stressed at a press conference that if government fails to act, "you can kiss the consumer electronics industry in this country goodbye forever."

Jobs tied to color TV manufacturing have dropped from 105,000 to under 45,000 in the past decade, with just 18,000 left in direct manufacturing, he said.

In the first two months of 1982, imports of color TV sets from Taiwan doubled over the same period a year earlier while those from Korea were up by 76 percent.

A COMPACT spokesman noted Korea is selling its color TV sets in the U.S. market at prices up to 40 percent less than in Korea, while Taiwan's prices here are up to 60 percent less than in Taiwan.

Unions involved

Unions in COMPACT besides the IUE are the Allied Industrial Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Steelworkers, Furniture Workers, Communications Workers, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Independent Radionic Workers of America, and the Glass Bottle Blowers Association. The firms involved include Corning Glass Works, Well-Gardner Electronics Corp., Owens-Illinois, Inc., and Sprague Electric Co.

The petition by COMPACT is one of several actions taken by the group against imported color TV sets. A federal appeals court last week upheld the Commerce Department's 1980 settlement of dumping charges against 22 importers of Japanese television sets.

COMPACT had charged that the Secretary of Commerce exceeded his authority by settling for "10 cents on a dollar" in assessing charges of $77 million.

COMPACT attorney Paul P. Cullen said the decision of the court will "permit the Secretary of Commerce to circumvent the elaborate procedural safeguards of the 1979 act and to compromise anti-dumping duties without so much as consulting with an injured domestic industry or its workers." He indicated the group would seek Supreme Court review.

Domestic content measure pressed at House hearing

Union witnesses completed the presentation of labor's case for a domestic content requirement for automobiles sold in the United States, and the AFL-CIO pressed for early action by Congress.

Enactment of the labor-supported measure would send a strong ripple of recovery through the economy, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan stressed to a House Commerce subcommittee considering the measure.

The labor-backed bill would affect firms selling more than 100,000 vehicles a year in the U.S. market. At that level, at least 10 percent of the value of the car would have to come from U.S.-made products or labor. Firms selling more than 900,000 vehicles would have to meet a 90 percent domestic content requirement.

Top officers of the Auto Workers—the union whose members are most directly affected—opened the case for the legislation last month.

Final hearings were held May 6, after the Industrial Union Dept.'s legislative conference. President William H. Bywater of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers and IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak concluded the trade union presentation.

The AFL-CIO and the IUD testimony noted the key role the auto industry holds in the U.S. economy and the broad range of supplier industries that depend on its prosperity—from steel, tire, aluminum and glass to textiles for car interiors.

Since 1978, more than 325,000 automobile workers and some 770,000 workers in supplier industries have been thrown out of work, Koplan said.

Chatak, testifying for IUD President Howard Samuel, said the legislation is needed because the government has not been able to restrain imports effectively or to persuade the Japanese to shift significant levels of auto manufacturing to the United States.

Sheinkman and Bywater cited specific examples of the ripple effect of auto imports on U.S. employment.

Employment slump

Over the past five years, Bywater testified, the number of IUE members employed in auto-related production has slumped from 60,000 to 41,500.

He cited as an example the Youngstown-Warren area of Ohio, where "thousands of IUE members who manufacture automotive wiring harnesses are laid off. They have been forced to look for other work in a community already suffering from large-scale job losses due to plant closings in the steel industry" and with an unemployment rate over 20 percent.

Sheinkman spoke of the decline of supplier firms such as Allen Industries in Herrin, Ill. "The only product made there is soundproofing panels for automobiles," he testified. "In 1978, there were 660 employees. Mainly as a result of auto imports, fewer than 300 are still working there." The area's jobless rate is 21.2 percent.

Koplan's earlier testimony for the AFL-CIO noted the domestic content requirement would also apply to U.S. manufacturers who use foreign components. Without such a standard, he cautioned, parts production will continue to be shifted overseas and the United States will increasingly become "a mere assembler of foreign-made parts."

6 unions bargain contract gains at Disney World

Lake Buena Vista, Fla.—Members of six service trades unions at Walt Disney World have approved a new contract that will raise wages an average of 21 percent over the next 30 months.

The agreement between the park and the unions bargaining as the Service Trades Council covers about 8,000 workers in food service, custodial, hotel and other service jobs. It expires Oct. 30, 1985.

Unions participating in the joint bargaining were the Food & Commercial Workers, the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, the Railway & Airline Clerks, the Service Employees, the Theatrical Stage Employes and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

All bargaining unit members will get an immediate raise of 65 cents an hour and an additional 55 cents on July 29, 1984.

Higher gains will be earned immediately by food service warehouse workers who have been shifted into the jurisdiction of the Craft Trades Council where they will get increases ranging from $1.12 to $1.91 an hour.

Auto mechanics at Disney World gas stations will also be shifted into the crafts council where top pay for the mechanics will go from $8 to $11.40 an hour. The crafts council already represents other warehouse and vehicle maintenance workers.

Improvements were also made in vacation, pension benefits, meal allowances and seniority protections.

Metal Polishers delegates adopt per capita rise

Louisville, Ky.—Delegates to the Metal Polishers' 31st triennial convention approved a $2 rise in per capita payments and voted to lengthen the terms of top officers from three to four years.

The convention's action raises per capita payments to $6 a month, with 55 cents going to the defense fund and 25 cents to the convention fund. The increase, which goes into effect next July 1, is the first in six years, said Jim Siebert, who was reelected to his seventh term as president-secretary-treasurer.

Glenn L. Holt was re-elected vice president. Newly elected members of the executive board are Fred Brown of Grand Rapids, Mich., and Leo Bland of St. Louis.

The 53 delegates also approved a quadrennial convention schedule, instead of convening every three years. The next convention will be in April 1987.

Guest speakers included Leonard S. Smith, Kentucky State AFL-CIO executive vice president and Jerome L. Tucker, president of the Greater Louisville AFL-CIO.

Collins appointed to Region VI post

AFL-CIO Field Rep. Edward J. Collins has been named assistant director of the federation's Region VI. Collins has been on the AFL-CIO field staff since 1980. He is a former president of Service Employees Local 250 in the San Francisco Bay area.

The region comprises Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Washington.

A healthy influence

The AFL-CIO tops the list of independent public interest organizations recognized as having the most influence on U.S. health policy in the 1970s.

According to a two-year study by University of Chicago sociologists, only the American Medical Association and the American Hospital Association ranked higher among non-governmental groups in perceived influence. The AMA ranked highest of all in influence in a field of 164 organizations, most of which were federal agencies and House and Senate committees with power over health financing, as well as health-related trade and professional associations and disease research and prevention groups. The Auto Workers ranked fifth highest of the non-government, non-health-related institutions in influence.

The researchers, headed by Dr. Edward O. Lauman, chairman of the university's department of sociology, measured influence on health policy between 1971 and 1980. The study included a computer search of name mentions in newspapers and news magazines, major health-related Congressional testimony, participation in legal cases, lists of groups lobbying on health issues and nominations by a panel of health experts.

Funding for Medicare and Medicaid, national health insurance and health planning were tapped as the key health care issues of the 1970s by the researchers, who based the rankings on interviews with representatives of the influential organizations.

Equity in paychecks cited by Donahue as 'bedrock' labor issue

By Susan Dunlop

Equity in the workplace for women and minorities is a "bedrock issue" of organized labor that can be advanced through collective bargaining, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the National Committee on Pay Equity.

The labor movement, he stressed, is "literally in the business of assuring people fair and equitable treatment in the workplace."

Donahue said the history of collective bargaining is filled with examples of workers using "the power of their unions" to fight "the particular injustices practiced against women and minorities."

Organized labor did not survive its first century "by resting on its laurels at any time, and we have no plans to do so now," he said.

The one-day conference organized by unions participating in the national committee drew about 40 officers and staff members concerned with pay equity issues from the AFL-CIO, its constitutional departments and affiliated unions.

Comparable pay

The committee of unions and organizations concerned with women's rights and civil rights promotes the issue of comparable pay for work of comparable value, including re-evaluation and upgrading of jobs which have been undervalued and underpaid in the marketplace because they traditionally have been filled by women.

Donahue emphasized the importance of the alliance between labor organizations and groups concerned with the rights of women and minorities, and he praised the Coalition of Labor Union Women for its active participation on the committee and for its work with affiliated unions.

There is a newfound interest in the concept of equal pay for work of comparable value among the media, business and the academic community, but it is "far from a new topic for organized labor," Donahue pointed out.

A history of efforts

As early as 1883, the newly formed federation was publicly on record for pay equity, he noted. And delegates to the 1979 and 1981 AFL-CIO conventions endorsed strong resolutions favoring bargaining for pay equity, upgrading of undervalued jobs and an end to sex stereotyping of jobs in hiring and pay.

Donahue told the conference that while bargaining is labor's key strategy, the resolution also advocated other action including grievance filing, civil rights lawsuits, pushing for enforcement of existing laws, organizing, education of members and political action.

A combination of strategies aimed at achieving equity are needed, he said, to meet the resistance put up by employers who see the concept as "a major threat to their access to vast supplies of cheap, docile, easily exploited labor."

Donahue charged that employers have "deliberately and systematically" undervalued jobs traditionally held by women. He pointed out that opponents of pay equity who argue that "the marketplace" should be allowed to set the value of jobs cannot explain why over 80 percent of all women workers are crowded into only about 20 job classifications which happen to be among the lowest paying in American society.

Faulty theories

Donahue told the conference that organized labor rejects those explanations for pay inequities based on the faulty theories that women do not have training, skills or experience to move into higher paying jobs, or that women only work for "pin money," and that they are transients in the workforce because they leave to raise children.

In fact, he pointed out, figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics show that in 1981, female college graduates earned less on average than male high school dropouts. About 51 percent of all women 16 years of age or older work today, making up about 43 percent of the workforce, Donahue said. BLS figures also show that over the last 10 years, women accounted for more than 60 percent of the increase in the workforce and nearly half of that increase was among women 25 to 34.

Divided work force

"The pattern is clear." Donahue said, "women are almost exclusively being hired to do a restricted number of jobs, so competition does indeed help to keep wages low. We are then told by management that the pay for those jobs is low because their value is low, when the fact is that our society has divided work into 'men's' and 'women's' work and has consistently set lower values on women's jobs precisely because women do them."

Donahue also stressed that organized labor disagrees with theories that the introduction of new technology into the workplace "must be followed by the devaluation of jobs" or reductions in the workforce. Such jobs are likely to require more education, more ability to make decisions without supervision and generate greater job stress, Donahue observed.

Unions are the "most powerful force" workers have to "assure themselves a hand in controlling the pace and direction of technological change in their workplaces and in assuring some distribution of its benefits," he contended.

made and open, multilateral trade expanded, he said, stressing that the floating exchange rate system as it is now has not worked.

"We believe that the exchange rate problem is a significant and major problem facing the world economy. It is a contributing factor in all the problems we face," Kirkland said.

"The International Monetary Fund has to regain effective surveillance of exchange rates and conditions in exchange markets."

Also taking part in the press conference were TUAC Gen. Sec. Kari Tapiola, Vice President Geoffrey Houthuys, and more than a score of labor leaders from Canada, France, Germany, Britain, Italy, Japan, and the United States as well as representatives of the two Brussels-based international labor organizations, the world Confederation of Labor and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

On May 13, following a luncheon given by Sec. of State George P. Shultz, a TUAC delegation was scheduled to present labor's recommendations on sustaining a non-inflationary, full-employment recovery to President Reagan at a White House meeting.

Third World trade

A sustained economic recovery with full employment must be the basic aim of policy in all 24 OECD countries, the trade union statement stressed. And this goal must be pursued with respect to world interdependence, it said.

"In today's circumstances, individual countries which attempt to force their way to economic and employment growth meet formidable obstacles," the TUAC statement observed.

"The reluctance of one or several countries to join in action for a recovery is a heavy constraint on all others."

Coordinated action is the safest and least costly way to recovery, the statement noted: "Making positive use of the interdependence of the OECD economies, as well as that of the industrialized democracies and the developing world, will maximize the benefits for all."

The advisory panel's major recommendations include:

- Adoption of a monetary and fiscal policy which, together with labor market and employment policies, can immediately halt the rise of unemployment and start bringing it down. International agreement on the reduction in real interest rates is another essential element in a strategy of recovery.
- A targeted stimulation of public and private investments so that an increase in consumption and economic activity will make a reconstruction program firmly based.
- Governments must cease to seek a recovery through deflation, lower wages, and a dismantling of the social safety net.

"Real structural change which benefits the economy requires more than relying upon the market forces only. It will not take place through unemployment or through a polarization and a further segmentation of the labor market."

- Free collective bargaining and cooperation with trade unions are essential and integral in achieving recovery.

Jobs are the key

- Full employment and an improvement in labor standards must be recognized as a necessary condition for a properly functioning, open trading system. "Competitiveness must not be sought through unemployment and cuts in wages and living standards. Effective measures for trade liberalization are fruitless unless trade flows are translated into a net increase in jobs and productive economic activity in all trading partners."
- Trade between OECD countries and the developing world should be made into "an engine of growth." Creating and strengthening viable economic and social structures in the developing world should be promoted by making use of the idle human and productive capacities in the industrialized countries.
- Speculation in the world economy must be "starkly" reduced. "It has now become more profitable to invest in money than with money. In addition to exchange rate stability and policies for economic growth and employment to foster trade, this calls for strengthening the rules and regulations on the behavior of multinational enterprises."
- Falling oil prices must not lead to further complacency in energy policies. Rather, conservation projects and programs for alternative energy sources should be intensified, the TUAC document observed.

House votes mortgage aid for jobless notify eligible howeowners of the availability of the government program 30 days prior to instituting foreclosure proceedings. It precludes foreclosure until the individual waives the right to participate in the program or the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development rejects the application for assistance. HUD would be required to approve or reject an application in 45 days.

A key criterion would be a determination by HUD that there is a reasonable prospect that the homeowner will be able to resume full mortgage payments within three years. Sponsors estimate that about 76,000 homeowners would be helped by the legislation. Last year, 187,000 homes were lost to foreclosure—the highest toll since the Depression.

The House failed to include a parallel program to assist renters facing eviction, as the AFL-CIO had urged. It did, however, incorporate in the bill a separate $100 million program of grants to provide shelter and essential services for persons facing life-threatening situations because of lack of housing.

Another section of the bill requires the Agriculture Dept. to grant a moratorium on payment of Farmers Home Administration loans that otherwise would result in foreclosure.

The thread running through the arguments of the bill's opponents was that economic conditions are getting better and a mortgage relief program isn't "cost-effective."

In a letter urging support for the legislation, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that "the rise in defaults and foreclosures is continuing" and the need for remedial action "is strong and it is urgent."

Pilots to vote on Eastern accord

Eastern Airlines' 4,200 pilots will own a piece of the company and be given representation on its board of directors under a settlement that is being submitted to union members for ratification.

The Air Line Pilots council which bargains with Eastern has recommended approval of contract concessions over a two-year period to help the deficit-burdened carrier stay in business.

Details of the agreement were not immediately available. But the union confirmed that members will receive company securities in exchange for deferral of a portion of their pay.

The ALPA negotiators also agreed to a temporary curtailment of vacation time, for 1983 and 1984, along with a rise from 80 to 85 hours in monthly flying time for pilots.

Last year, Eastern had a net loss of $74.9 million and it reported a first quarter loss of $60.7 million this year. The negotiators heard a report from banks that have made major loans to Eastern during the negotiations.

Clothing-Textile union adopts plan to aid jobless members

New York—The Clothing & Textile Workers are gearing up to provide technical assistance, resource materials and emergency aid to thousands of members affected by layoffs and plant closings.

The ACTWU executive board unanimously adopted a resolution authorizing the program and called on "all regional, joint board and local affiliates, wherever possible, to establish comprehensive local ACTWU programs for unemployed members."

The union's general officers—President Murray H. Finley, Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman and Executive Vice President Scott M. Hoyman—said in a statement that the union had worked hard "to preserve the jobs of members and the viability of the industries in which they work," but still could not combat the impact of "low-wage imports, the Reagan Recession, plant closings and an overall depressed economy."

ACTWU Vice President Joyce D. Miller is director of the program which will be funded through contributions from joint boards, working members and staffers, health and welfare funds, special fund-raising activities and, wherever possible, matching funds from employers.

Local and regional coordinators will advise jobless members about the availability of community resources, credit counseling and how to develop job-seeking skills.

The program grows out of recommendations by a special executive board committee named in January to study the impact of unemployment on ACTWU members.

The committee pointed out that many members have exhausted their severance and vacation pay and their unemployment and extended benefits—and still have not found work. It also warned that the health of jobless members is endangered by stress at a time when their life and health insurance coverage has ended.

The board resolution listed several locals that have programs aiding jobless members, including one in Los Angeles where retired members run a food bank and one in Troy, N.Y., where a retraining program is in operation. Many locals have sponsored informational meetings where government and social services representatives inform members of their rights and of benefits available to them.

Inspections questioned

OSHA tally branded 'public relations ploy'

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has engaged in a "public relations ploy" to misrepresent OSHA's enforcement efforts, AFL-CIO industrial hygienist Margaret Seminario charged in citing a recent OSHA press release that showed 1982 inspections are comparable to those under the Carter Administration.

OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter claimed the agency carried out 63,914 inspections in 1982 and is "meeting its mandate of protecting the safety and health of workers while carrying on President Reagan's regulatory reform program."

Seminario, however, said the number of on-site, walk-through inspections was only 54,303 in 1982, with the remainder of Auchter's 63,914 figure being "paper" inspections, where inspectors check only the company's safety and health records. By OSHA's own directive, she said, citations cannot be issued on paper inspections.

The 54,303 walk-hrough inspections are 17 percent fewer than the 64,876 inspections done in the last year of the Carter Administration. And the number of workers covered by walk-through inspections also declined by 40 percent from 3.7 million workers to 2.2 million in 1982.

Seminario charged that OSHA's enforcement responsibilities have been seriously curtailed under the Reagan Administration. Inspectors are now less likely to issue citations and those they do issue fall primarily in the "other than serious" category, the mildest type of citation.

Citations drop

The number of "willful" citations are down by 91 percent from fiscal year 1980 to 1982 and the "repeat" citations are down by 65 percent.

Auchter stressed in his statement that the agency's new policy is to target its general schedule inspections in the high-hazard industries and to do "quality," rather than quantity, inspections.

But Seminario, in questioning the agency's effectiveness, noted that the number of citations are down substantially even while OSHA claims to be doing more thorough inspections in targeted, high-hazard industries.

She cited the construction industry where OSHA did 10.3 percent more inspections in 1982, compared to 1980, and yet the number of violations in excavation are down 27 percent, scaffolding down 21 percent, and in trenching down 16 percent from just two years earlier.

Seminario said OSHA's amicable relationship with employers is also reflected in other inspection figures. The number of agency citations that were contested by industry declined from 7,077, which was 20 percent of the total issued in 1980, to 1,212, or just 4 percent in 1982. The number of follow-up inspections also dropped from 11,483 in 1980 to just 1,426 in 1982.

OSHA said this reduction was planned because experience showed 99 percent of follow-up inspections turned up no "failure to correct" violation.

Seminario said the agency is playing "the numbers game" as it uses the "paper" inspections in its total number of inspections, and yet it excludes that figure when determining the percentage of citations issued.

Garvey wins vote of support from NFL player reps

Port St. Lucie, Fla.—Ed Garvey, executive director of the National Football League Players Association, received a strong vote of confidence from the union's board of player representatives. The vote to retain Garvey, who has held the key NFLPA post for 12 years, was 20 to 7 with one representative absent.

The governing body of the 1,500-member union also approved the union's budget for the coming year, developed a careers program for players, and spelled out policies for full implementation of the current contract with the league. The five-year, multi-million dollar agreement went into effect last fall after a 57-day strike.

In other action during the four-day session, the board certified sports agents who represent NFL players—other than rookies—in dealings with team owners and established fee schedules for agents to protect players from overcharges.

In commenting on the vote of confidence, NFLPA President Gene Upshaw praised Garvey's leadership and service to the union over the past 12 years.

Garvey continues as president of the Federation of Professional Athletes, the NFLPA's parent organization.

Luxury living rare among performing artists

An extensive study of the working lives of professional performers explodes the myth of the wealthy entertainer basking by an oversized swimming pool or preening in the luxury of expensive cars and lavish wardrobes.

"Some performers — actors, singers, dancers, broadcasters and musicians—do, indeed, have these things," the report observed. "Most do not."

The survey of 7,870 entertainers belonging to one or another of the five performing arts unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees found that performers earn less than other professionals and experience far greater unemployment than the rest of the nation's workforce.

The report was released by the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment, an adjunct of DPE.

Conducted with funding from the Labor Dept., the National Endowment for the Arts and the Ford Foundation, the study examined the economic lives of dancers, singers, actors, musicians, and broadcast announcers. Replies to mail questionnaires and telephone interviews found that the jobs of performing artists tend to be more intermittent than those of other working people; their periods without work are more numerous and longer lasting, and their pay is well below that of other professionals and other American workers.

Performers surveyed by an independent team of Washington economists were from Actors' Equity, the Musicians, the Federation of Television & Radio Artists, Guild of Musical Artists and the Screen Actors Guild.

"The data indicate that a successful career in the performing arts requires considerable versatility to move from one artistic discipline to another and, often, from a job as a performer to a job outside the profession which helps the artist 'subsist' while waiting for another opportunity as a performer," the report said.

Strong commitment

But despite the bleak employment picture, the surplus of job applicants, the lack of job security, and the uncertainty of financial reward, "the unionized performers that were questioned remain strongly committed to their profession as their major occupation and source of income," the report observed.

Some highlights of the report:

- Performing artists are much more prone to unemployment than other members of the workforce. In 1980, 76 percent of professional dancers, 67 percent of actors, 61 percent of singers, 35 percent of musicians, and 21 percent of performers in broadcasting occupations experienced some unemployment that year, compared to 18 percent in the rest of the workforce.
- While 15 percent of all unemployed workers in the U.S. labor force had three or more jobless periods in 1980, more than 34 percent of performing artists had three or more jobless spells.
- When comparing 1980 median income of male and female performers with that of other male and female professionals, it is clear that performers earned considerably less. Aside from broadcasters, male performers earned $6,000 to $10,000 a year less than professionals in general, while female performers made $1,000 to $5,000 less.

Substantial proportions of performers' households had incomes below the poverty level for a family of four in 1980, the report noted. Although the government-measured poverty levels for New York City ($9,070) and Los Angeles ($9,380) were below $10,000, more than one-fourth of performers and their families earned less than that for the year.

"The value of this report," DPE Director Jack Golodner said, "is that it challenges the distorted picture of these occupations portrayed by those preoccupied with the glamour and glitter of the performing arts.

"It also disputes some recent government figures which imply that artists do better than other working people. Considering the deteriorated economic situation and reports we have from the artists' own unions, we know the difficulties facing performing artists have worsened since this study was done."

Performers generally lack permanent or long-term employment, and move often from job to job. Singers, actors, and musicians are likely to have several different employers in a year, while dancers averaged at least three employers during 1980, the study found. These employment patterns affect their economic lives.

Myth dispelled

"It is sometimes said that performing artists 'survive' on unemployment insurance between jobs," the report said. "But this, too, is a myth. Despite their longer than average duration of unemployment, few performers collect unemployment benefits.

"Except for dancers, less than half of the unemployed performers collected unemployment compensation in 1980. Only 20 percent of the musicians and 25 percent of the singers who were out of work during part of 1980 received any unemployment insurance payments. This also was true for 35 percent of the broadcasters and 45 percent of the actors. . . .

"Infrequent job continuity and long periods of unemployment also may prevent performers from compiling sufficient work experience to meet the qualifications for benefits," the report said.

Bargaining against a bleak backdrop

By James Parrott

The worst economic decline since the Great Depression continues to pose a formidable challenge to union negotiators to defend the past gains of members and strengthen their job security. The present destructively high levels of unemployment and the likelihood of little improvement in coming months form an unwelcome presence at the bargaining table.

About 3.6 million workers are affected by the major collective bargaining agreements expiring in 1983. Among those major agreements—each covering 1,000 or more workers—are key contracts in aluminum manufacturing, telephone communications and equipment, and aerospace. An unusually high number of construction workers is covered by contracts expiring this year. In addition, a new contract between the Steelworkers and seven basic steel companies was signed in February, and Longshoremen reached a new agreement with Atlantic and Gulf Coast shippers in April.

Broad-based economic decline, postwar record high unemployment, and the uncertain outlook for recovery all exert a heavy influence in current contract negotiations, even in industries where extensive layoffs have not occurred.

The Reagan Administration's proposed pay freeze for 1.8 million civilian federal workers and 3 million military personnel colors other negotiations.

Yet the view, fostered in the media and by employer groups that unions in depressed industries are being forced to make major concessions is misleading. Examination of 1982 settlements in the major financially troubled industries—auto, rubber, and trucking—shows that in return for yielding some economic ground, unions generally made important gains in such areas as extended health benefits for workers on layoff and more permanent income protection for senior employees.

In some contracts, unions were able to bargain for major gains on issues where employers had previously refused to give ground.

In the auto industry, for example, General Motors and Ford agreed to restrictions on the "outsourcing" of parts to non-union companies.

Bargaining in industries less hard hit by the recession brought wage and benefit increases in numerous contracts in 1982. And major advances in job and income security were achieved at a number of firms, particularly in the electrical equipment industry.

1982 Settlements

The overall averages for wage increases in new contract settlements in 1982 were markedly affected by the concentration of bargaining in industries where the recession had a heavy impact. The average wage increase, not including cost-of-living raises, in the first year of all major private contract settlements in 1982 was 3.8 percent. But this average includes the 43 percent of the 3.3 million workers covered by 1982 settlements who are not receiving any specified pay raise in the first year of the contracts. For the 57 percent who are receiving pay boosts, the first-year pay hikes averaged 7.0 percent.

Because not all industries are suffering, a fourth of the workers covered by 1982 settlements were due to receive raises of more than 8 percent in the first year. Nearly all the workers—95 percent—not receiving specified wage increases in the first contract year

Schedule of '83 Contract Negotiations

Major bargaining

Steel: The Steelworkers' contracts with seven major basic steel companies, covering 270,000 workers, were settled in late February.

Communications: Contracts affecting 630,000 AT&T employees in telephone companies and at Western Electric expire in August. The principal unions involved are the Communications Workers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Aerospace: The Machinists and the Auto Workers will be negotiating new contracts with Boeing, Lockheed, McDonnell Douglas, and others. The existing contracts, which expire in the fall, cover 215,000 workers.

Shipbuilding: Contracts expire in June for 30,000 West Coast shipbuilders represented by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. The Steelworkers' contract with Newport News Shipbuilding, affecting 18,000, expires in October.

Aluminum: Steelworker and Aluminum Worker contracts at Alcoa, Reynolds, and Kaiser expire in May. 50,000 workers are covered.

Longshoring: A new agreement between the Longshoremen and the Atlantic and Gulf Coast shippers, covering 50,000 employees, was reached in April to succeed current contracts that expire in October.

Other contracts

Construction: Agreements covering 900,000 construction workers are due to expire in the course of the year.

Retail Food: The Food & Commercial Workers represent some 320,000 grocery store workers across the country whose contracts expire at varying times throughout 1983.

Lumber: Contracts covering some 70,000 employees in the Northwest lumber industry represented by the Woodworkers and Carpenters will expire in June.

Glass: The Glass, Pottery, Plastics & Allied Workers represent 50,000 employees at the major container companies where contracts were due to expire in April.

Utilities: The Utility Workers' agreement with Con Ed in New York City, covering 18,000, expires in June.

No bargaining this year

Auto: Contracts between the Auto Workers and the top three U.S. auto makers expire in 1984. The American Motors contract runs to 1985.

Rubber: Rubber Workers' contracts with the major rubber companies expire in 1985.

Meatpacking: UFCW contracts with major meatpackers expire in 1985.

Railroad: Contracts for 13 railroad unions with Conrail, Amtrak, and Class I railroads expire in 1984.

Postal Service: Contracts between the Postal Workers, Letter Carriers, and Mail Handlers, and the U.S. Postal Service expire in 1984.

are covered by COLAs and will receive some wage increases.

The 3.8 percent first year average boost is the smallest since the Labor Dept. began keeping track of the figures in 1968. It is down from 9.8 percent in 1981, 9.5 percent in 1980 and 7.9 percent when the same unions bargained previously, usually two or three years before.

When total wage increases are measured over the life of the contracts, the average annual boost is 3.6 percent for 1982 settlements, compared to 7.9 percent in 1981 and 7.1 percent in 1980 and 6.3 percent during the previous round of bargaining.

Two-thirds of all workers covered by 1982 settlements have COLA clauses in their contracts. Of all workers covered by major contracts, 58 percent have COLAs. Contracts with COLA clauses generally provide smaller specified pay increases than those without. When contracts without COLAs are considered separately, wage boosts average 7.0 percent for the first year and 6.6 percent annually over the life of the contract. COLAs are less prevalent in construction than in other industries. In construction, first-year wage increases averaged 6.5 percent.

Multiple-year contracts tend to yield larger gains in early years than in later years, so the average annual increase over the contract term is nearly always less than the first-year increase. For 1982 settlements, the differential narrowed compared to previous years as wage gains were more evenly spread over the term. For three-year contracts—those ranging in duration from 30 to 42 months—scheduled second-year increases actually exceeded first-year increases.

The average duration of major contracts negotiated in 1982 is 31 months, compared to 29.5 months for those negotiated in 1981. Contracts with COLAs tend to have longer terms, and among 1982 settlements these averaged 34 months compared with 26 months for other settlements.

Effective Wage Increases

Effective wage adjustments reflect increases and cost-of-living adjustments negotiated earlier as well as settlements reached during the current period. In 1982 about 7.9 million workers received wage adjustments averaging 7.2 percent. About 500,000 workers covered by major contracts did not get increases during the year. Under new settlements, increases averaged 7.5 percent. Those receiving deferred increases gained an average of 6.3 percent, and under COLA provisions alone, wage increases averaged 3.1 percent. In 1981, when inflation was greater, COLA provisions provided increases averaging 6.3 percent compared to deferred wage increases of 5.3 percent.

COLA Provisions

Cost-of-living adjustments in 1982 recovered about 70 percent of the rise in consumer prices during the period of the COLA review. The extent to which COLA provisions can protect purchasing power against inflation depends on three things: the formula used to calculate the adjustments, how often adjustments are made, and whether or not there is a "cap," or maximum adjustment.

The most common formula provides for a cent-an-hour increase for each rise of 0.3 point in the Consumer Price Index (CPI). Other formulas peg a cents-an-hour or a percentage pay increase to a specified percentage rise in the CPI.

Of the workers covered by COLAs, 43 percent receive annual reviews, 17 percent semi-annual reviews and 39 percent quarterly reviews. While about 25,000 workers who had COLA reviews in 1982 did not get an adjustment because the cap had been reached in their contracts, 100,000 to 165,000 more workers got no adjustment because the minimum change in the CPI was not reached.

Deferred Increases

Only one-third, or about 3 million, of the workers covered by major contracts are scheduled to receive deferred wage increases in 1983—the smallest number since record-keeping on this series began in 1967. In 1981, deferred increases negotiated in previous settlements went to 6.1 million workers and excluding COLA averaged 5.3 percent. In 1982, 4.3 million received deferred increases averaging 6.3 percent. In 1983, the average deferred increase is 6.1 percent, with those covered by COLAs receiving an average of 4.2 percent (not counting COLA adjustments) and those without COLAs averaging 7.2 percent.

Union and Non-union Increases

Unionized workers continue to receive substantially higher wages and fringe benefits than non-union workers. According to the Labor Dept.'s Employment Cost Index (ECI), which measures wages and salaries as well as employer costs for fringe benefits, union workers did 20 percent better than non-union workers in 1982, 7.2 percent compared to 6.0 percent.

Included in fringe benefits in the ECI are employer costs for legally mandated benefits, such as social security and unemployment and workers' compensation, and optional benefits such as paid holidays, vacations, and sick leave, and insurance and pension benefits. The ECI is a measure of the change in the total price of labor, free from the influence of employment shifts among occupations and industries.

For the twelve months ending with December 1982, the ECI increased by 6.6 percent for all workers. For the private non-farm sector, the index rose 6.4 percent, and for state and local government workers, the increase was 7.4 percent. The CPI went up 3.9 percent in the same period.

State and Local Government Settlements

Major collective bargaining settlements reached with state and local governments in 1982 covered 573,000 workers and provided average wage increases of 7.2 percent in both the first contract year and annually over the life of the agreements. Total wage-benefit packages averaged 7.4 percent a year.

Labor Dept. data on state and local government settlements are not strictly comparable with the private sector series. Only bargaining units of 5,000 or more workers are considered, compared to units of 1,000 or more in the private sector data. Fewer state and local government workers have COLA clauses in their contracts.

Auto Industry Settlements

The Auto Workers signed early agreements in the first part of 1982 with both Ford Motor Co. and General Motors which did not provide for any specified pay increases over the two and a half-year term of the contracts. Auto bargaining was conducted in the wake of massive extended layoffs and plant closings. About 150,000 of 469,000 UAW members at GM and 55,000 of 160,000 at Ford were on indefinite layoff when contracts were settled.

Wracked by the recession and record high interest rates, new domestic car sales in 1981 were a third lower than in 1978 while imports surged to capture 27 percent of the domestic market, up from 18 percent three years before. Ford lost $1.06 billion in 1981 and $1.54 billion in 1980, and while GM's profits were $333 million in 1981, it lost $753 million in 1980.

The cost-of-living provision was continued in the new contract with the existing formula intact, although payment of all or part of the first three quarterly adjustments was deferred for 18 months. All regular paid holidays were maintained, but paid personal holidays were dropped.

The major auto agreements in 1982 produced significant new provisions which strengthened job security and layoff protections for UAW members. GM and Ford both agreed to a two-year moratorium on plant closing that would have occurred as a result of "outsourcing," the purchase of parts from other companies. This provision led to the reopening of a Ford valve plant two days after the contract was settled.

The Ford contract calls for a pilot "employment guarantee" project based on a lifetime job security concept that will apply to 80 percent of the employees at two trial locations. A "guaranteed income stream" program was established to provide 50 percent of pay for workers with at least 15 years of service who are laid off after the effective date of the contract. Workers with more than 15 years of service will receive an additional 1 percent of pay for each additional year of service, up to a maximum payment of 75 percent of gross weekly pay or 95 percent of after-tax weekly pay minus $12.50, whichever is less. The payments will be reduced by the full amount of government unemployment benefits and by 80 percent of earnings from other employment. The period during which participants draw guaranteed income payments will count as regular active service for pension purposes, and workers will be covered by health and life insurance during the period. At GM, the pilot "lifetime job guarantee" program will be conducted at four plants.

The UAW-Ford agreement provided for resumption of supplemental unemployment benefit payments to laid-off workers whose benefits had been cut off because the fund had fallen below the minimum level. SUB eligibility was extended from 52 weeks to 104 weeks for workers with ten years of service. The contract called for Ford to advance $70 million to the SUB fund and to increase the company's contribution by three cents an hour per worker.

The SUB fund at GM was also strengthened through additional company advances. Eligibility was doubled to 104 weeks of SUB pay for workers on the job on or after Mar. 1, 1982, with at least ten years of service.

Profit-sharing plans were adopted at both companies.

Both major auto contracts established joint union-management skill development and training programs. These will provide "training, retraining, and development assistance for employees displaced by new technologies, new production techniques, and shifts in customer product preference." Similar efforts are to aid workers displaced by plant closings or discontinued operations. Employer contributions of five cents an hour per worker will finance the programs.

In a new contract with American Motors, the UAW negotiated an employee investment plan under which the 14,000 workers will lend the company about $110 million for new investments by deferring normal wage and benefit provisions. The effective date of the first two annual 3 percent pay increases will be deferred until January 1985, and a third-year 3 percent increase will be eliminated. The first six quarterly COLAs will be deferred until December 1984. UAW members will "bank" 21 paid holidays or vacation days until 1985. The amount that workers lose by deferring raises and "banking" vacation will be repaid, with 10 percent compound interest, beginning in 1985 and concluding not later than 1989. In addition, a company-financed legal services plan was established.

The round of bargaining in the auto industry was concluded in December when Chrysler and the UAW agreed on a 13-month contract covering 44,000 workers. The settlement followed the voting down of an earlier proposed contract in September and a strike by Canadian Chrysler workers.

The immediate 75-cent an hour increase for Chrysler's U.S. workers narrowed the pay differential of about $2.50 an hour that had developed between Chrysler and Ford and GM workers.

The new Chrysler contract restores quarterly COLA adjustments at one cent an hour for each rise of 0.26 percent in the combined U.S.-Canadian CPI. An experimental "lifetime job security" pilot project, similar to those negotiated at Ford and GM, will be tested at two Chrysler plants. The profit-sharing plan was terminated.

Rubber Industry

In the rubber industry, bargaining in 1982 took place against a backdrop of slack demand due to the auto sales slump, increased foreign imports, and continued plant closings, especially of bias-ply tire facilities. Since 1973, 25 U.S. tire plants under contract with the Rubber Workers, or more than a third of the industry total, have closed, with 16 of the closings occurring since 1979. When General Tire closed its truck tire plant in Akron in 1982, mass tire production came to a halt in the industry's former center of activity.

Last year the URW and B. F. Goodrich negotiated a three-year pact that set the pattern for settlements at Goodyear and Firestone. The other member of the industry's "Big Four," Uniroyal, agreed to accept the terms of the pattern-setting agreement, modified to reduce the cost increase by $18.3 million a year. The URW represents 37,400 workers at the four companies affected by the pattern agreement.

The Goodrich contract did not provide for any specified wage increases, but the provision for quarterly cost-of-living adjustments, won in 1976 following a 4½-month strike, was retained. Benefit improvements included a $1.50 increase in the monthly pension rate to bring it to $16.50 for each year of credited service, a $60-a-week increase in the sickness and accident benefit, raising it to $165, and a 6-month increase in the 24-month period during which laid-off workers retain their life and health insurance. The Goodrich and Firestone accords also established medical surveillance programs for early detection of job-related health problems.

Twisting Quality Circles to Bust Unions

By Guillermo J. Grenier

The concept of production teams, or "quality circles," has been offered in recent years as a new approach to improving productivity along with product quality. The theory is that involving workers more directly in production decisions enhances their sense of dignity, and thus their individual job satisfaction and efficiency, as they contribute to the improvement of the overall production process.

Quality circles have yielded promising results in a number of industries where they have been set up jointly by unions and management. Yet unions are well aware that they can also be manipulated by management as a tool against trade unionism.

This report by Guillermo J. Grenier offers a case history of the use of quality control circles as a union-busting device. It was presented originally on Apr. 12, 1983, to a citizens' monitoring committee looking into management unfair practices during an organizing campaign by the Clothing & Textile Workers at Johnson & Johnson's Ethicon plant in Albuquerque, N.M.

My name is Guillermo J. Grenier. I am a Ph.D. candidate in the Dept. of Sociology [at the University of New Mexico] as well as a Master's candidate in community and regional planning in the School of Architecture and Planning. I also hold a Master's degree in Latin American studies from UNM. I work as a data analyst for the Design and Planning Assistance Center here at the University as well as a data analyst and health planner at the New Mexico Health Systems Agency. Through this job I came in contact with Ethicon officials. At the HSA, we were developing a health-related project, trying to find out what "wellness program" services area employers were offering their employees. Soon after my initial contact with Ethicon, and after receiving an introduction to the plant from Dr. Albert Jaramillo, the plant's social psychologist, I became very interested in the plant's production team system. I wanted to learn more about this organizational approach since I could see in the topic an excellent dissertation in sociology as well as a unique case study for a social planning thesis.

With these academic goals in mind, I began research at Johnson & Johnson's Ethicon plant seven months ago. My initial interest was to investigate whether the production team system could improve efficiency through early diagnosis of employee physical, behavioral or mental difficulties which affect production. Yet, while conducting this research, I discovered some things that left me surprised and confused about the role of teams in a manufacturing environment. I feel that this committee, the community, and employees at Ethicon should know what I have witnessed at Ethicon.

I have attended meetings of 11 production teams and consulted on a frequent basis with Ethicon officials. My primary contact has been Dr. Albert Jaramillo, the plant social psychologist and personnel administrator. He is the individual responsible for the team concept.

During my third team meeting, the issue of the union campaign came up. After the team meeting I talked to Jaramillo about the union issue. In this and subsequent discussions, Jaramillo made it clear to me that the team system at Ethicon is being used as a "union-busting" tool.

For this purpose, facilitators (supervisors) are expected to remain in control of their teams while employees are made to feel that the system is "open" to their suggestions and decisions. According to Jaramillo, teams are used as part of a strategy to "isolate" pro-union employees from their fellow team members. The "isolated" individual can then be dealt with in some fashion: he or she can be fired for not having "team support" (one of the "objective criteria" for termination at Ethicon), or for a poor "attitude" or other factors ostensibly unrelated to union support. Yet, Jaramillo plainly told me that union support is a factor in termination "although we can never admit it."

Where union members are not fired, their personal isolation from other team members can be used by management (or by anti-union employees acting on behalf of management) to make union members look like "losers" to their fellow workers and to discredit the union itself.

The production team system, or "quality circle," is nationally heralded as one technique which might save American industry from foreign competition. But, as one facilitator told me, "not the way it is practiced here."

At Ethicon the team system has been transformed into a tool of employee manipulation. Jaramillo acknowledged to me that during the union drive, the teams are used to create conflict, and the growth of the team is warped. The team becomes a conflict group rather than a production group. This cannot be in the best interest of employees or industry.

This conclusion is supported by a videotape I was shown while at Ethicon. The topic was the development of work teams (quality circles) at the J & J plant in Tampa, Fla. The videotape pointed out that quality circles work just as effectively in union plants and non-union plants when they do what they are designed to do: deal with production issues. Keeping Ethicon non-union is not necessary for the team concept to work properly. Nonetheless, in answer to employee questions, management has put in doubt the future of teams if the union gets into the plant. Establishing a non-union plant is apparently management's primary goal.

Observation of production teams made me become more interested in the union issue and how it was affecting teams. Jaramillo suggested that I might wish to study anti-union strategies since that might lead to a "lucrative career . . . that [busting unions] is the battle of the '80s." With the help of Jaramillo, who kept me informed as to strategies developed at Ethicon "strategy group meetings" held weekly, I combined the study of anti-union strategies with that of teams.

Eventually I asked the question "Why must Ethicon stay non-union?" According to Jaramillo, the main reason is to keep wages low. Despite the fact that plant manager Bob Jancar has told employees that they may have to give up wages and benefits in union negotiations, management has charted a ten-year economic plan which projects a saving of $10 million every three years by avoiding higher union-negotiated wages and benefits. (This plan assumes an ultimate workforce of 500 people. At the present level of employment, the corporate plan projects a saving of $5 million every three years if the plant stays non-union.)

Psychological manipulation of employees, as well as illegal "unfair labor practices," are justified by Ethicon management in service of the non-union goal. Here are just a few of the questionable practices I noted in my seven months of working with Ethicon.

- An allegedly independent employee anti-union committee has been formed to propagandize Ethicon workers. However, this committee is surreptitiously directed by management. Since management wishes to preserve legal "deniability" when the committee makes irresponsible or unlawful statements, an amateur gumshoe technique has been devised: One of Jaramillo's secretaries has a boyfriend, working in the print shop, who is on the anti-union committee. As Jaramillo told me with a wink, "If I happen to leave some information on Cheryl's desk telling her to copy it and she takes it to her boyfriend . . . there is nothing I can do about it." The anti-union committee brings information back to management as well, identifying employees to management who have pro-union sympathies. In addition to Jaramillo and John Koller, the personnel director, two other management officials work closely but secretly with the anti-union committee.

● The company tells its employees that its wage rates, while lower than in comparable union plants, are competitive and based on a comprehensive survey of other national companies in Albuquerque. However, John Koller told me that when J & J did its Albuquerque wage survey, it obtained lower results by omitting companies like GE and Sandia because they have national union contracts.

● I was personally solicited by Jaramillo to ask my friends to spy on union meetings so I could report the discussions back to Ethicon management. Again, Jaramillo was aware of the illegality of such a request, so he put it this way: "What I suggest is that, you know, I keep you informed of what's happening and you of your own volition do something about it." Ethicon did not rely on me alone. After one publicly advertised union meeting, to which Jaramillo asked me to send a friend, Jaramillo boasted to me, "we had a whole bunch of spies set up to get information."

● Supervisors at Ethicon have been trained to observe employee conversations; if a supervisor sees a pro-union worker talking to an anti-union or neutral employee, the supervisor is to go up and interrupt the conversation. According to Jaramillo, "What I sometimes do is go up, start talking to them [pro-union people], go to break with them, take the same ten minutes they do, and go back to the floor with them. The point is to control their influence — their interactions." Jaramillo realized that such tactics constitute illegal surveillance but, as he told me, that's "really hard to prove. . . . How can you prove they (supervisors) were listening?"

● Whereas production employees previously would receive phone calls directly at the plant, Ethicon has now established a central switch point for incoming phone calls. Phone calls to pro-union people are screened, tallied and reported to management. Callers to known pro-union workers are told as a matter of policy, "she can't come to the phone now."

● One production team was eliminated because expressions of pro-union sentiment became too frequent for the facilitator (supervisor) to control.

● Martha Grey, a personnel administrator, screens job applicants to eliminate those with possible union sympathy; she raises the union issue in a variety of ways during the job interview just to see how the applicant reacts. In a further effort to prevent union supporters from influencing new employees, Ethicon revised procedures at its training center . . . (where) experienced workers are brought in to train new hires. When Ethicon discovered that pro-union workers were highly represented in the experienced group, the company increased the rotation and decreased the qualifications of trainers.

● Several months ago, many workers (both pro- and anti-union) circulated a petition complaining about an odor feared to be related to the carcinogen, ETD. Even this concern was treated as a vehicle for increasing the psychological pressure on union supporters. Pro-union employees' complaints of headaches were greeted with skepticism.

● Two union supporters were fired in December on a charge of "falsification of records," despite the fact that the company knew their offense was no greater than that routinely tolerated from anti-union employees. For example, I was told that an anti-union worker's sister called the plant to report that the worker was sick; despite the fact that the supervisor knew she had taken the day off to go camping with a fellow worker, no action was taken. Yet the company fired the two union supporters anyway. According to Jaramillo, "Jancar said it would be a good symbolic gesture, a good way to scare other pro-union employees. Even if we have to give their jobs back, it would be worth the hassle to fire them to see what the union would do and to see if it has a desired effect on the work force."

● Two other employees were fired in November for absence-related reasons. Jaramillo told me that these firings were "trial balloons" to see what the union would do when their supporters were fired. The firings were "pretty blatant," he boasted.

● Another employee, slated to be fired in January, was retained in the work force when she made known to management that she wanted to cancel her signed union card.

● Jaramillo, the plant social psychologist, developed a two-page position paper instructing supervisors on the subtleties of interrogating employees during the union drive. He refers to it as "How to make someone spill their gut — interrogation techniques." Since direct interrogation is unlawful, Jaramillo teaches supervisors a more indirect approach. Interrogation, according to Jaramillo, "is easy to do and hard to prove." For example, he suggests asking employees, "have you been harassed lately?" By posing the question, Jaramillo and his supervisors also plant the suggestion that harassment by union supporters is to be expected.

● Management rates each employee on a scale of −2, −1, 0, +1, +2. Employees rated −2 are strong union supporters; +2 employees are strong union opponents. The information on employee attitudes about the union is fed to management both by supervisors and by the employee anti-union committee. The ratings are then used to develop specific psychological strategies for each employee. In the lingo of Ethicon plant management, each employee has a "button," or a specific point of concern or vulnerability. Approaches on the union question, even public "open line" responses by management to employee questions, are tailored to each worker's "button" or preconceptions.

● A reportedly effective anti-union psychological technique is "consultations." A system of worker consultations with team facilitators was originally intended to address legitimate production or other performance problems. However, with each employee now identified in management's ratings by union leaning, "consultations" are used as a symbolic threat to pro-union people.

● The company circulated information charging that during the union campaign there had been incidents of vandalism. The company put lights on the parking lot to protect employees from union violence. Yet, Jaramillo stated to me that the company knew that this union (ACTWU) did not engage in such tactics. The information circulated by the company was designed apparently to suggest a fear which has no foundation in fact.

● The company has retained an attorney-labor consultant from Phoenix who guides their anti-union strategy. With his help, management deliberately crosses over the line of illegality. According to Jaramillo, the Phoenix lawyer "knows all the tricks." The anti-union consultants hired by the company earn their money because they "figure out how a strategy can be pushed over the line. . . . When it is wise to foray into enemy (illegal) territory." The basic management strategy, according to Jaramillo, is to "create uncertainty." "The trick is to threaten people without them knowing that they are being threatened. I do it with looks, comments." This is part of the general psychological campaign which Jaramillo has designed to be used against employees on the union issue.

● The company has a policy of restricting information they feel benefits the union. For example, when the benefits clerk from Somerville (the unionized sister-plant of Ethicon Albuquerque) visited Albuquerque to inform employees of their benefits and how they compare with the negotiated benefits at Somerville, she was instructed by management not to raise certain issues concerning worker costs. When asked by a facilitator about the amount paid into the package by each worker at Somerville, she responded, "Do you want

Trucking

When the Teamsters negotiated the National Master Freight Agreement in early 1982, 120,000 of the union's 300,000 members working in the trucking industry were out of work. The three-year contract contained no specified wage increases, and the COLA was modified to provide for annual, instead of semi-annual, adjustments. Also, part or all of each adjustment may be diverted to shore up pension, health and welfare benefit funds. Diversion of the April 1982 COLA raised the weekly employer contribution to health and welfare and pension funds to $100.50 per employee.

Some work rules were modified to allow employers to adopt "non-standard" workweeks, and restrictions were relaxed on the types of deliveries drivers make. Under the new master agreement employers are prohibited from selling, leasing or transferring parts of their operations to third parties for the purpose of evading the contract. Recall rights for laid-off workers were extended to the Mar. 31, 1985, expiration date.

Electrical Equipment

A host of improved job and income security provisions highlighted the June 1982 General Electric settlement affecting 100,000 workers. Westinghouse Electric followed a month later with essentially the same terms in contracts covering 40,000 workers. Labor was represented in negotiations at both companies by the 13-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee, led by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The electrical firms agreed to give six months notice of plans to close plants or transfer work and 60 days notice before the introduction of robots or automated manufacturing machines. Both firms have acquired automation equipment manufacturers in recent years and have announced they intend to move rapidly in the factory automation field.

The concept of rate retention, established in the GE and Westinghouse contracts, applies to production workers who are shifted to lower-rated jobs as a result of the transfer of work, subcontracting, or the introduction of new technology. These workers will be guaranteed their former rate of pay for up to 26 weeks.

Income security benefits for workers terminated by plant closings included the following:

- Lump-sum severance payments for workers with 15 years of service were increased from one week to two weeks pay for each year of service. Employees with two years but less than 15 years service would receive 1½ weeks pay for each year, with a minimum of 4 weeks pay.
- A liberalized combination of age and service requirements made more displaced workers eligible for continuing monthly severance benefits instead of the lump-sum payment. Eligibility now ranges from employees age 50 with 25 years service to those who are 55 with 10 years service. Monthly benefits equal 2 percent of monthly pay multiplied by years of service, up to a maximum of 50 percent of current pay. Benefits continue until reemployment or retirement age is reached.
- Displaced workers will receive job placement assistance, and those with at least two years of service will be entitled to up to $1,800 for education and retraining assistance.
- Employees with a minimum of 7 years service who are displaced by closings will have vested pension rights.
- Displaced workers who are at least 50 with at least 25 years service will continue to be covered by company-financed medical and life insurance until age 65 or they are reemployed.
- Displaced workers will be paid for unused sick leave and personal days.

Pension benefits at GE and Westinghouse, to which employees contribute in part, will increase in two steps from a range of $10-$15 a month per year of service to a range of $14-$19.50 by January 1984. Agreements at both companies also included general pay increases and an improved COLA formula.

Jobs and Income Security

Despite a high unemployment economy, many other unions secured additional protection in 1982 against layoffs, plant closings, runaway shops and the adverse effects of technological change. Negotiated protections took the form of limitations on management prerogatives, retraining programs and financial assistance for displaced workers.

A new accord between the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Potomac Electric Power Co. established lifetime job and pay security for employees with 12½ years of seniority. Eligible employees cannot be furloughed or reduced in pay due to lack of work, plant closings, reorganizations or technological change. In return, the union agreed to allow PEPCO flexibility in changing job content.

Advance notification of plant closings or economic difficulty and the right to negotiate over the effects of closings on union members were established by the Clothing & Textile Workers in separately negotiated national agreements covering 70,000 members in men's and boys' tailored clothing and 70,000 more in cotton garment production.

In a coordinated bargaining effort led by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. covering 3,000 workers at 11 General Telephone & Electronics Corp. plants, unions secured six months prenotification of plant closings, improved recall rights, and special early retirement benefits.

A 2½-year contract, covering 19,000 workers, between the UAW and International Harvester provides for six months notice of plant closings and for union consultation whenever a major "outsourcing" decision is being considered, with at least 60 days advance notice. The pact also established a $1 million comprehensive training program. The company also agreed to strengthen the SUB fund.

A severance pay plan was established in an agreement between the Machinists and the Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Division of United Technologies at four Connecticut plants covering 16,000 IAM members. Workers with at least three years seniority may qualify for payments of up to 12 weeks pay.

Under new contracts at RCA reached by the IBEW and IUE, employees with 30 years of service who lose their jobs because of plant shutdown or discontinuation of a product will be eligible for "layoff extension benefits" equal to half their regular pay. These benefits would continue until age 55, when an employee becomes eligible for full retirement pay. In addition, laid-off workers would be eligible for up to $1,000 in retraining assistance, and those with 30 years service will receive health insurance coverage for six months and life insurance coverage for two years. Recall rights were extended from two years to three years for workers with at least five years seniority. Nearly 16,000 workers are covered by the RCA pacts.

In an early agreement negotiated by Libby-Owens-Ford and the Glass & Ceramic Workers—now part of the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers—the company agreed to establish an $800,000 fund to be used to provide health insurance coverage for laid-off workers, early retirement incentives, or as lump-sum payments to active employees, to be decided by each local. The company also agreed not to expand glassmaking or auto glass fabricating furnaces at non-union plants.

The UAW and Rockwell International Corp. launched a pilot program to retain laid-off auto workers for jobs in the aerospace industry.

American Telephone & Telegraph's January 1982 announcement of the divestiture of its 22 local operating phone units generated uncertainty about job security among its 700,000 unionized employees. Divestiture, which was part of the settlement of an antitrust action against AT&T by the federal government, is to be completed by January 1984. Although the present contract does not expire until August 1983, the major unions at AT&T—the Communications Workers and the IBEW—negotiated a special job and wage protection agreement in March 1982. The comprehensive measure protects workers against loss of wages, benefits, bargaining representation and other rights for seven years after divestiture.

COLA Changes

Cost-of-living adjustments were under heavy attack in the industries hit hardest by the recession. In some contracts, payments were diverted to supplemental unemployment benefits, or other employee benefit funds, or they were suspended or deferred. But the COLA language was maintained in almost all contracts.

For the first time, COLA protection was extended to more than 150,000 garment workers. In a pattern-setting settlement with outerwear manufacturers, the Ladies' Garment Workers established a COLA to provide 10 cents per hour if the CPI increases 8.5 percent between June 1, 1982, and Dec. 1, 1983, with an additional 5 cents for each 0.5-point rise above 8.5 percent, subject to a cap of 25 cents an hour.

At General Dynamics' tank production facilities, formerly owned by Chrysler, 5,000 UAW members had their COLA restored under a formula calling for quarterly adjustments of one cent an hour for each 0.3-point rise in the CPI. An improved escalator formula was negotiated by the UAW at Avco's Lycoming Division in Connecticut, providing for a cent an hour for each rise of 0.3-point (instead of 0.4) in the index.

The 13-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee at General Electric and Westinghouse succeeded in improving the COLA formula to provide semi-annual adjustments of one cent an hour for each rise of 0.175 percent in the CPI. The first adjustment was to be paid at the previous rate of one cent for each increase of 0.2 percent with the new formula taking effect in June 1983.

Pensions

Pension plan gains negotiated in 1982 frequently took the form of improved formulas

and benefit levels for future retirees or lower age requirements. In some agreements, benefits for those already in retirement were increased.

In a contract between the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers and Keebler Bakeries, full pension, based on 28 years of service, will rise in two steps from $500 per month to $600. The previous minimum age of 55 for early retirement was changed to make retirement possible when age plus years of service equal 80. At the Homestake Mining Co. the Steelworkers won a reduction in the early retirement age after 30 years service to age 60 from 65.

Adoption of a "magic 85" pension clause at General Dynamics' Electric Boat Division will enable workers to retire when their age and years of service total 85. Eleven unions in the local Metal Trades Council represent 12,000 workers at the Groton, Conn., shipyard.

UAW members at Avco's Lycoming Division will be eligible for retirement at age 52 with 30 years of service. Retirement after 30 years of service, regardless of age, is now possible in plant shutdown situations under a contract between the Glass, Pottery, Plastic & Allied Workers and Owens-Illinois.

In a three-year pact with New York City area food stores covering 13,000 workers, the Food & Commercial Workers won substantial fringe benefit improvements. Monthly pension benefits for full-time workers will be increased in two stages from $11 to $20 a month per year of service and from $5.50 to $10 for part-timers. Major medical insurance coverage was increased from $100,000 to $250,000, life insurance doubled to $20,000 and vacation, sick leave, optical, dental, and other benefits were enhanced. At Stop & Shop supermarkets in Connecticut, UFCW members boosted their monthly pension from $13 per year of service to $20.

Hotel Workers' retirees in Boston will receive a $25 increase, bringing their average monthly pension checks to $73. For employees currently working, the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Union negotiated a $25 increase in full pension for 25 years service, raising it from $175 a month to $200.

Employer payments to an income security fund will rise from $6 a week per worker to $10 under a contract between the Bronx Realty Advisory Board and the Service Employees. The fund, which is in addition to a regular pension plan, is used to give apartment building workers a balanced retirement program consisting of mutual fund shares and permanent cash value life insurance.

In the construction industry, fringe improvements are generally reported as increases in hourly contributions by employers to pension and other benefit funds. Higher payments to union members result when negotiated increases in contributions raise the fund levels. In any given contract, contribution levels and negotiated increases vary with the funding requirements necessary to provide benefit payments.

For example, Sheet Metal Workers in Boston negotiated three-step increases in employer hourly contributions from $1.50 to $2.13 for the pension fund, from 75 cents to $1.50 for the annuity fund and $1.22 to $1.49 for the health and welfare fund. Laborers on Kentucky highways will see contributions increase from 70 cents to 85 cents per hour for both their pension fund and health and welfare fund. In Montana, Operating Engineers bargained increases in pension fund contributions from 85 cents to $1 and health and welfare fund contributions from 97 cents to $1.37. Southern California Roofers negotiated increases in contributions from $1.20 an hour to $1.50 for their pension fund, from 85 cents to $1.10 for their annuity fund, and from 97 cents to $1.17 for the health and welfare fund. For Carpenters in Baton Rouge, La., employer hourly pension fund contributions will increase in stages from 70 cents to $1, with health and welfare contributions rising from 65 cents to 85 cents.

Health and Welfare

Collective bargaining has brought union members health and welfare protections for themselves and their families. These protections include employer-financed health insurance and specific plans for preventive, medical, hospital, prescription, dental and vision care.

Medical care costs continue to surge despite a falloff in the general rate of inflation. In 1981, the CPI-W for all items increased by 10.2 percent and the medical care component alone rose 10.4 percent. In 1982, medical costs advanced by 10.8 percent even though the overall inflation rate dipped to 6.0 percent.

Improved and expanded medical coverage, therefore continues to be a high priority in contract negotiations. Coordinated bargaining at General Telephone & Electronics Corp. plants, led by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. increased lifetime major medical coverage to $625,000. Other improvements include full payment for third surgical opinions, medical coverage for legally separated dependents, an improved surgical payment schedule, an increase of $742 in allowances for in-hospital physician services, revised dental coverage and improvements in sickness and accident benefits and pensions. The union committee successfully resisted employer attempts to increase health insurance deductibles equal to the rise in the medical component of the CPI. Unions involved in the coordination were the Machinists, IBEW, IUE, UAW, and the unaffiliated Teamsters and United Electrical Workers.

Following the pattern set in settlements last year with the nation's major railroads, six unions representing some 130,000 workers won an increase in major medical coverage from $250,000 to $500,000. The railroad unions reaching agreements in 1982 included the United Transportation Union, Firemen & Oilers, Signalmen, Yardmasters, Dispatchers and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Operators and technicians at Western Union, represented by the Telegraph Workers, increased their major medical benefits to $250,000, improved life insurance and dental coverage, and won a new optical plan. The Communication Workers achieved similar terms in a contract with Western Union in New York City.

The Theatrical Stage Employees, in a contract with the Motion Picture & Television Producers, improved their major medical coverage from $100,000 to $500,000 and also increased employer reimbursements for medical bills and employer contributions to their dental plan. Health benefits for disabled employees were also improved. Major medical coverage will increase to $400,000 for Rubber Workers at Kelly-Springfield Tire Co.

The Machinists increased maximum major medical coverage from $300,000 to $750,000 at US Air. And at Northwest Airlines, IAM members won a new combined regular medical and major medical plan providing lifetime coverage of $1 million.

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Gulf Oil Corp. reached a pattern-setting agreement for the petroleum refining, pipeline and petrochemical industries which will raise employer contributions for family health insurance. Under terms affecting more than 50,000 workers at 400 facilities and 100 companies, monthly employer contributions will increase by $17.50 in the first year and $13.50 in the second year. This will bring the level to $151.50 at Gulf. Beyond that amount, employees will bear the additional premium cost. Under the old contract, employees had been paying $30 a month.

In its contract with the New York Stock Exchange and related employers, the Office & Professional Employees reduced the deductible for $100,000 maximum major medical from $5,000 to $2,000.

Employer contributions to the health coverage of Service Employees' dependents was increased to $35 a month in a contract with Stanford University. UFCW members in bargaining with Bradlee department stores in northern New England, increased their x-ray and hospital lab coverage to $300.

The Newspaper Guild gained new dental and optical plans in an accord with Philadelphia newspaper publishers, and an orthodontia plan was added for IUE members in their contract with Sperry Rand. Five unions representing 1,900 workers at Disneyland in Anaheim, Calif., established a vision care plan and secured additional dental coverage.

Prescription drug coverage was added by the IUE, Machinists, and IBEW in coordinated bargaining with Rockwell International. And the maximum annual prescription drug coverage was increased to $300 in Food & Commercial Workers contracts at A&P stores in New England.

In addition to the construction union settlements, other unions negotiated greater employer contributions to their health and welfare funds. In a contract between hotels and motels in the St. Louis area and the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, employer contributions will increase from $21 a month per employee to $26. Stop & Shop's contributions will rise from $75 to $133 per month under a new agreement with the UFCW in the greater Boston area. California supermarket employers, in new contracts with the UFCW and the unaffiliated Teamsters, increased their contributions by 39 cents an hour per worker, with further increases scheduled in the second and third years of the contract. Some 30,000 workers are affected.

Sickness and accident insurance helps provide replacement income to workers who suffer lost time from sickness or injury. In its contract with cotton garment manufacturers, ACTWU negotiated increases in weekly S&A benefits from $76 to $85 in the first year, $95 in the second year, and $105 in the third year.

Shorter Worktime

Reductions in worktime negotiated in 1982 took the form of additional paid holidays, longer paid vacations, and reduced service requirement for vacations.

The Ladies' Garment Workers won a 16th paid holiday in a contract with the Women's Apparel Store Association. A 12th holiday was added by the IUE to a contract with Sanyo Manufacturing Corp. in Forest City, Ark. The pact also included improvements in pension benefits, life insurance, S&A and hospitalization coverage. The ILGWU and ACTWU also added 12th paid holidays in contracts with the San Francisco dress and sportswear industry and New York City neckwear companies.

OCAW achieved an 11th paid holiday at the Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co. The Machinists negotiated additional holidays at the General Dynamics facility in Pomona, Calif., bringing the number to 10 in the first year and 11 in the second. ACTWU added an additional personal holiday at the American Enka Co.

Communications Workers at General Telephone Co. of Indiana won a 12th paid holiday, and workers with 25 years service will get an additional, fifth week of vacation.

Besides adding an 11th paid holiday, apartment building Service Employees covered by a contract with the New York City Realty Advisory Board will receive full pay for unused sick leave instead of 70 percent. Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. employees in Allentown, represented by IBEW, will be eligible for an additional day of vacation if they have no sickness or injury absences during the year.

At Colgate-Palmolive, workers represented by OCAW and the Chemical Workers will receive six weeks vacation after 25 years of service, down from 30. Service requirements for four weeks of vacation were reduced to 10 years from 12 by the Service Employees in Chicago apartment buildings, to 12 years from 15 by Paperworkers at Mead Corporation, and to 15 years from 18 by the Service Employees at the East Ohio Gas Co.

Woodworkers at Weyerhaeuser Co.'s Dierks Division will now have three instead of two weeks vacation after eight years of service. At the Gulf States Utilities Co., IBEW members will be eligible for four weeks of vacation after 17 years, instead of 18, and for five weeks after 26 years, rather than 27.

Broadcast engineers at CBS affiliate stations represented by IBEW who work on a holiday will receive a paid day off in addition to premium holiday pay. The ACTWU contract with the Clothing Manufacturers Association provides for paid leave for service on trial juries.

PAC Contributions

Union interest in negotiating payroll checkoff clauses for contributions to union political action committees (PACs) has been growing in response to the proliferation of corporate, trade association, and conservative PACs. Checkoff provisions make it easier for workers to contribute voluntary funds to their union PACs for use in supporting pro-worker candidates in state and federal elections. In its coordinated bargaining role, the IUD helped secure political action checkoffs for participating unions at Square D, Rockwell International and GTE. In its contract with the New York League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes, the SEIU also established a PAC checkoff.

In some cases, PAC checkoff clauses can be achieved on demand. Under federal election law, if a company sets up a payroll deduction or checkoff plan for political contributions from its shareholders or managerial employees, it must give the union the right to use the same type of payroll deduction system for the political contributions of its members.

Comparable Worth

Progress at the bargaining table to assure equal rights for women workers and other minorities continued in 1982. In the area of "comparable worth"—paying equal wages to workers in jobs that require similar levels of skill and effort, even if the jobs themselves are different—the New York State Civil Service Employees Association, an AFSCME affiliate, won agreement from the state to earmark $500,000 for a pay equity study. The CSEA represents 100,000 clerical, administrative, institutional, and blue collar workers.

Legal Services

Under a new comprehensive legal services plan established at General Motors by the UAW, with financing by company contributions of 3 cents an hour, legal representation will be provided by the plan's staff attorneys to workers, retirees, spouses and dependents.

The Sheet Metal Workers negotiated a legal services plan, financed by contractors' contributions of 15 cents per hour worked. Prepaid legal services were also secured by the UFCW at Stop & Shop supermarkets in Connecticut, and by the SEIU with the Bronx Realty Advisory Board.

Job Safety

Worker safety was a key issue in many contract talks in 1982. Joint union-management safety and health committees were established by ACTWU in bargaining with the Clothing Manufacturers Association, and by the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union at New York City area Bloomingdale's stores.

In its UAW contract, General Motors agreed to establish and finance an internal occupational safety and health advisory board, composed of five recognized scientists.

Office worker safety was addressed in contracts between the RWDSU and the Legal Aid Society of New York, and between the IBEW and Niagara Mohawk Power Co. Both agreements provide for free, regular eye exams for workers using video display terminals.

Other Provisions

Multilingual work rule and job posting was an innovative feature of the Boston hotel contract. The HERE in Boston represents workers from 80 countries, and the postings will be in four major languages. That contract also contained new clauses giving workers protection from sexual harassment and discrimination.

At General Dynamics' Electric Boat Division, the 11-union Metal Trades Council won a change in the investment plan permitting employees to invest 10 percent of their earnings, instead of the previous 4 percent. The company will match half the amount.

The Machinists' contract with the Motor Car Dealers of Greater Kansas City increased the tool insurance maximum to $5,000. Philadelphia Fire Fighters won an $80 annual allowance for upkeep of uniforms.

Many construction industry contracts increased employer contributions to industry promotion and advertising funds. For example, a contract between the Plumbers & Pipefitters and the Association of Contracting Plumbers in New York provides for an increase in employer contributions from 13 cents to 16 cents per hour worked. The Carpenters' contract with the Construction Employers Association of North Central West Virginia doubled the contribution to 10 cents an hour. Ironworkers in western Pennsylvania and Operating Engineers in the Ohio Valley also saw increases in employer payments to industry promotion funds.

In a contract with Health Employers, Inc., in Minneapolis-St. Paul, the Service Employees established an education development program that will pay 75 percent of the cost of tuition, required fees and books, up to a yearly maximum of $250.

These developments represent some of the important trends that emerged from major contract bargaining in 1982. They reflect the specific needs of the workers involved and the particular circumstances under which different contracts were negotiated.

Although most settlements provided for significant improvements in wages, benefits and working conditions, the state of the economy and the troubled financial condition of certain firms and industries led some unions to seek agreements that protected members from crushing job losses. Where wage concessions were made, however, unions generally were successful in securing offsetting benefits in other areas and enhanced job security provisions.

Collective bargaining in 1982 thus was characterized by innovative responses from unions that helped moderate the negative effects of both recession and long-term structural change in the economy.

In addition to the advances noted here, thousands of other improvements were achieved in contract settlements throughout the country. Some smaller contracts, for example, provided unique benefits not found elsewhere. In 1983, unions are continuing to pursue new avenues of bargaining on behalf of their members.

Twisting Quality Circles . . .

the truth or what they (management) told me to tell you?"

● According to one facilitator, management at Ethicon is using mostly "scare tactics" to dissuade employees from supporting the union. "They (management) are afraid that if you give employees information, they will vote for the union. . . . They treat workers like kids."

Regarding my research topic of teams, I consider the production team or quality circle concept to be one of the most hopeful developments in American management theory. Such a concept could result in increased productivity and worker satisfaction. It is compatible with union or non-union status. Yet, in the hands of Ethicon management, this concept has become a psychological weapon to depress wages and benefits, without regard to its effects on productivity or worker well-being.

I have been told that management must wage a "psychological battle . . . if production suffers, we have three other plants nationwide to take up the slack." I fail to see how this attitude is compatible with healthy and productive employee-management relations. Ethicon management attempts to portray an image of progressive attitudes toward employees. Yet, apparently, as one facilitator told me, "they don't do what they say. They don't even believe in what they say."

At Ethicon, social psychology, as well as the team concept, has become an anti-union tool. According to Jaramillo, "the art of social psychology, and it is an art, is that you can plant the seed that will make people think like you think. . . . So I plant the seed in you to make you think the idea of doing what I want you to do was yours."

If successful, this manipulation of worker attitudes is justified by the fact that it can save Johnson & Johnson over $3 million a year in lowered wages and benefits.

Overvalued dollar linked to trade imbalance

Labor and management share a common concern in the current overvaluation of the dollar, which is largely responsible for America's unfavorable competitive position in foreign trade, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

High budget deficits and continued high interest rates are frequently noted as major factors in the overvaluation of the dollar, Oswald said in an address to the industrial relations section of the Business Roundtable, an association of corporate executives which examines public issues that affect the economy.

Focusing on the impact of international trade and competition on labor relations, Oswald said the AFL-CIO has long urged a policy of lower interest rates, and would attack the huge deficit facing the country not only with programs to spur economic growth but also with budget policies that would lower the rate of increase in defense spending, pay for increased defense spending with a progressive surtax, and close tax loopholes to raise revenues.

Joint interest

While there are alternative approaches to consider, he said, "there is little doubt that it is in the interest of both labor and management to correct the problem of the overvalued dollar."

The rising dollar is quickly offsetting a declining trend in relative U.S. unit labor costs, Oswald warned. If international trade among industrialized countries were determined by relative labor costs, U.S. manufactured products should have been much more internationally competitive in 1981 than in 1960. For unit labor costs in manufacturing rose less rapidly in the United States than in 10 other advanced industrialized nations during the past two decades, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics data, he said.

Administration reluctance

In order to deal with the competitiveness problem the nation is experiencing, it is necessary to deal with the basic elements—high budget deficits and high interest rates at home—and not make workers' wages a scapegoat. But, he said, the Administration has steadfastly refused to take specific action to relieve the exchange rate problem.

Besides cheapening imports and increasing the price of exports, the overvalued dollar encourages U.S. firms to produce and invest more abroad rather than export from the United States, Oswald observed. He pointed out that while capital expenditures for domestic manufacturing will decline by 3.2 percent in 1983, U.S. firms plan to increase their investment overseas by 3.6 percent this year.

The matter of foreign investment is one that raises issues of transferring technology, jobs and scarce capital abroad, as well as the dependence of firms upon the demands of foreign governments, Oswald said. But the problems of trade are more than an overvalued dollar, he observed.

Successive rounds of tariff reductions have not resulted in trade "liberalization." Instead, a new array of trade-distorting practices has developed overseas, including nontariff barriers such as quotas and stringent inspection requirements, export subsidies and incentives, industrial targeting programs, and trade arrangements such as performance requirements, coproduction, offset, and barter agreements.

Meanwhile, other countries view the United States from the perspective of "buy from the U.S. what you need in order to acquire the technology and essentials to develop your own economy and treat the large U.S. market as a stepping stone to economies of scale and 'international competitiveness,' " Oswald said.

Import invasion

Import penetration has steadily increased, beginning with the most basic, labor-intensive productions in the late 1950s, through much of basic industry in the 1960s and 1970s, now reaching into the full range of the most advanced, technology-intensive products, from integrated circuits to jet aircraft, he noted.

"A disturbingly large share of these imports benefit from unfair foreign trade practices and have produced devastating injury to American industries—without any adequate response under U.S. trade law," he added.

"Considering the recent pattern of world trade, it is all too likely that economic recovery in the United States will be marked by surge after surge of imported goods anxiously seeking an outlet, leading to the paradoxical result that recovery will further erode our domestic industries," he said.

Lost jobs

The recession and the deteriorating trade situation have reduced production jobs in manufacturing by 3 million since 1979, a 20 percent contraction, he said, citing a recent Commerce Dept. analysis showing the United States lost 1.3 million export-related jobs between 1980 and 1982, with the bulk of these in manufacturing. The number of production jobs in the steel industry has declined by 50 percent, and in most other metal and machinery industries by 25-40 percent.

A common thread running through the economies of countries that have grown faster is their adoption of a coordinated industrial policy that systematically includes the views of business, labor, and the public, said Oswald.

"By contrast, the Administration would have the United States at the mercy of the 'unseen hand,' " he said, referring to Adam Smith's classical economics philosophy. "It is time to deal directly with the nation's many concrete and visible problems."

Tuition tax credit seen undermining public education

Tuition tax credits would shortchange the nation's public schools and set back efforts to improve the quality of education, the AFL-CIO and the American Federation of Teachers testified before the Senate Finance Committee.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields and AFT President Albert Shanker voiced labor's objections to a Reagan Administration proposal to give a federal tax credit to parents of children attending private elementary and secondary schools. The credit would be 50 percent of tuition up to a maximum that would start at $100 a year and rise to $300.

Effect on quality

The inevitable effect of such a tax credit would be to weaken the concept of high quality free public education, Shields testified. She noted that the $300 tax credit for private school tuition is less than the per pupil expenditure of federal aid to education in 32 states.

Shanker said the tuition tax credit would divert scarce public funds to benefit only the "10 percent of school-age population whose families are on the whole, better-off economically than the population in general."

Once enacted, he predicted, tuition credits would be expanded, with a heavy drain on federal tax revenues and an exodus of children to private schools. The public schools would then be left with a high concentration "of students with the most difficult and expensive educational and behavioral problems," Shanker warned.

The Administration's tuition tax credit proposal could also fund part of the tuition costs of sending children to schools run by assorted cults and political extremists, he noted.

Shanker questioned in his testimony how the Administration can justify a diversion of educational assistance to tuition rebates when so many of the school aid programs "serving children with the greatest economic and educational needs are being slashed and eliminated."

May Day in Israel

An American trade union delegation led by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland (front row with cap) joined marchers in the annual May Day parade in Jaffa, Israel. The delegation was the guest of Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation. To the left of Kirkland are Israel Kessar, Histadrut's deputy secretary-general and Yeruchim Meshel, Histadrut's secretary-general. Kirkland met with Prime Minister Menachem Begin and other national leaders, and, as honorary chairman of the Hapoel Games committee, officiated in the opening ceremonies.

5-year specialty steel quotas asked

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride and leaders of the specialty steel industry have asked the Reagan Administration to impose import quotas for five years on specialty steels, rather than the three years recommended by the International Trade Commission.

McBride and Adolph Lena, chairman of AL Tech Specialty Steel Corp. and of the advisory committee of the specialty steel trade association, detailed their reasoning in a letter to President Reagan, who has until July 6 to determine a remedy for the industry. If he accepts or modifies the ITC recommendation, Congress has 90 days to overrule his decision.

The Steelworkers and specialty steel companies sought relief from subsidized imports 18 months ago. In April, the ITC ruled the industry was being injured by imports and on May 6, recommended quotas for three years.

The letter by McBride and Lena contended that five years of quotas is required to permit the industry to make investments needed to stay technologically advanced and is consistent with the industry's investment cycle. It would also allow the current world excess capacity in specialty steel production to be reduced.

The letter charged the restraints recommended by the ITC are inadequate as the minimum import levels are so large that "domestic demand would have to increase substantially, to near historic peak levels, before the restraints would have any effect."

Fixed share

The ITC recommendations call for a 3-year system, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1983, that allocates a fixed share of the market to each of the major steel-producing countries involved, including France, West Germany, Japan, Spain and Sweden. The specialty steel products affected by the decision include stainless steel sheet, strip, plates, bar and wire rod and alloy tool steels.

The current import levels, the ITC recommendations and the industry recommendations are:

- Stainless steel sheet and strip: current level of 13.4 percent; ITC recommendation, 8 percent, and industry seeks a 5.9 percent limit.
- Stainless steel plate: Current, 12.4 percent; ITC, 10 percent, and industry, 2.7 percent.
- Stainless steel bar: Current, 30.1 percent; ITC, 17 percent, and industry, 13.6 percent.
- Stainless steel wire rod: Current, 50.6 percent; ITC, 42 percent, and industry, 23.8 percent.
- Alloy tool steel: Current, 48.6 percent; ITC, 20 percent, and industry 16.7 percent.

Lena told reporters that the industry's problems are not caused by failure to be competitive. "We need relief from unfair trade practices. We are by far the lowest cost producer when the total costs are considered."

John Oshinski, Steelworkers political action representative, said wages are only 8 to 15 percent of specialty production cost. It would be devastating to the nation's electronics and defense industries to lose this domestic production source.

An American tragedy

Union witnesses urge House committee support of a bill to require advance notice and government scrutiny of plant closings. Ernest J. Donnelly, who headed the Clothing & Textile Workers local in Scottsboro, Ala., testifies about the abrupt closing of the Ballet Fabrice plant there, with only four days notice to the 536 workers. He was accompanied by ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman, left, and Joe Zappa, president of Auto Workers Local 212 in Detroit. The hearings were at the Industrial Union Dept. legislative conference.

Aerospace talks to focus on IAM role in technology

St. Louis—Full participation in the introduction of new technology emerged as a key bargaining goal at the Machinists aerospace conference here.

Improvements will also be sought in wages, cost-of-living adjustment formulas, pension, life and health insurance, medical benefits, savings programs, vacations and holidays and compensation for layoffs and plant closings.

Contracts negotiated in 1980 with the three major firms—Boeing Co., Lockheed Corp. and McDonnell Douglas Corp.—all expire in October, and bargaining for new agreements covering about 200,000 workers will open in late summer.

IAM Vice President Justin Ostrow, who will direct the negotiations, told the 170 participants that the aerospace companies were profitable in 1982, and that he has already been told by Lockheed that the company does not plan to seek contract concessions.

Model contract

The conference approved a nine-point model contract provision to deal with the effects of new technology. The proposal stresses full union participation in planning and introduction of new technology in the workplace and pay and classification protections for workers.

Among the major points of the proposal is a provision recognizing that there are sound economic and social reasons for the utilization of advanced technology that will benefit both management and workers, but stressing that new technology will not be used to eliminate jobs, erode working conditions and skills or undermine the collective bargaining agreement.

Job protections

The IAM will also ask for strong provisions against layoffs and assuring that new or changed job classifications will remain in the bargaining unit at negotiated rates of pay, never to be less than rates prior to the introduction of new machinery. Employees already in the bargaining uint would be given preference by seniority in filling new or changed jobs, and employees who are displaced would be guaranteed no reduction in pay or benefits.

Management will be asked to assure employees full access to training for new or changed jobs within the company, or if that is not feasible, for jobs elsewhere in the community.

The Machinists will also seek at least six months notice and full information prior to the introduction or expansion of any "computer-aided system for information-gathering on the shop floor."

House figure higher

Senate budget limits jobless health funding

A sharply divided Senate struggled over the final shape of a budget resolution, but some early votes gave an insight into the prospects for recession relief legislation.

Early in the budget process, the Senate approved inclusion of funds for a scaled-down health insurance program for the unemployed. But first it rejected, 63-36, a labor-supported alternative that would have matched the level of assistance the House approved in its budget resolution.

The Democratic amendment to the budget, sponsored by Senators Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (Mich.), would have designated $900 million for the balance of this fiscal year to help fund a health insurance program for workers who lose their jobs, rising to $2.7 billion in each of the next two years.

Instead, the Senate approved the compromise offered by Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) for a budget figure of $200 million through September, $900 million in the new fiscal year and $700 million the following year. It was adopted by a 90-9 vote with the opposition coming from a hard core of right-wing Republicans who share the Reagan Administration's opposition to any federal funding of health care for the jobless.

Workers must pay

The Administration proposal would require employers to let workers continue health insurance coverage for a limited period after they are laid off, providing they pay for the premium cost themselves.

Dole noted in arguing against the larger-scaled Kennedy-Riegle amendment that the House had approved the higher amount and the Senate should hold to a lower level to provide "room for negotiation."

But the future of congressional budget action this year was still very much up in the air as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The Republican majority had disintegrated on the issue, with a group of five moderates holding out for a substantial rollback in scheduled tax cuts in order to keep down the deficit. This caused the White House to send an angry message that the President would rather see no budget resolution at all than a rise in taxes.

Democrats had their own plan, and both parties were divided over the level of defense increases.

Repair bid rejected

The Senate rejected an attempt by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) to repair the damage done by the last Congress to the extended unemployment insurance program. But Republicans promised in the course of debate to support a budget waiver to add money for the supplemental unemployment insurance program if the jobless rate stays high.

Meanwhile, a labor-opposed campaign to repeal the scheduled July 1 start of income tax withholding on dividends and interest threatened to add to the already huge deficit projections.

The Senate has already voted to postpone the withholding tax for at least four years, with little likelihood of its continuance thereafter. Now, a discharge petition to force a repeal bill out of the House Ways & Means Committee received the necessary 218 signatures—a majority of the full membership of the House.

The repeal measure is opposed by House Democratic leaders—and by President Reagan as well. The Ways & Means Committee will decide whether to bring out its own bill or await proceedings under the discharge petition rule.

Union campaign seeks to ease paper company's hard line

Nashville, Tenn. — The Paperworkers have launched a campaign to improve deteriorating relations with International Paper Co. that includes taking the union's concerns over the company's increasingly anti-union policies directly to its directors and stockholders.

UPIU officers and staff, as well as members of other AFL-CIO unions and representatives of community organizations, attended the company's annual meeting Apr. 12 in Los Angeles to urge IP officers, directors and stockholders to review and improve the company's relations with UPIU.

Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn, in a statement released prior to the meeting, said the union has already begun contacting its local unions, explaining the problems with International Paper and outlining the company's corporate connections with other consumer-oriented companies, financial institutions and insurance companies and major stockholders, among them several large public employee pension funds.

UPIU said about 90 of the 130 persons who attended the three-hour shareholders' meeting were present to express their support for the union's positions, and many made speeches and questioned IP Chairman Edwin A. Gee about the company's record in labor relations.

Anti-union tactics

Among the tactics questioned, the union said, were threats of plant closings, provocations of strikes, the use of anti-union consultants in programs both at organized and unorganized plants, attempts to press for decertifications, increasing "give-back" demands on health insurance and other contract provisions, and "intransigent" and "hard-nosed" attitudes toward the handling of grievances.

"In effect what we told the company was 'you have embarked upon a policy to undermine the union representation of your employees, and that policy has been consuming enormous amounts of time, energy and money—all of which could be better spent on iimproving labor relations,'" Glenn said.

In his statement in the union's newspaper launching the campaign, Glenn noted that the UPIU has had contracts with the company since the turn of the century. In the last 10 years "we have watched International Paper adopt a more hostile and antagonistic approach to the union."

Slow recovery dims outlook for jobs

tenth of a percent, seasonally adjusted, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. By another measure, which includes the armed forces stationed in the United States as part of the workforce, the jobless rate last month was unchanged from March at 10.1 percent.

But the government's figures do not take into account those Americans so frustrated by the lack of openings that they have given up searching or those working part time because full-time jobs are not to be found.

If the 1,764,000 so-called "discouraged" workers tallied at the end of the first quarter, plus half of the 6-million Americans employed part time because they can find no other work, were added to the 11.3-million counted officially as unemployed by the BLS, the nation's jobless rate would stand at 14.5 percent with 15.3-million people unemployed, the AFL-CIO calculated.

Help for the needy

"Clearly, the Congress is on the right track in expediting legislation to create jobs and to help the long-term jobless keep their homes through mortgage relief and to pay their health benefit costs," the federation said in a statement.

While the jobless rate is down from the recession peak of 10.8 percent last December, it remains much higher than the seasonally adjusted 7.2-percent rate of July 1981, when the 18-month Reagan Recession began.

Slow improvement

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that the April figures showed improvement in the overall labor market, with employment and hours of work registering gains, but acknowledged that "the unemployment rate tends to decline very slowly" as recoveries get under way because improving conditions tend to lure people back into the labor force faster than the market can absorb them.

The AFL-CIO statement found the April increase in manufacturing employment especially welcome. That sector of the economy has been hard hit by the recession. Employment in manufacturing rose 110,000 since March.

But the rise in unemployment among black workers from 19.9 to 20.8 percent between March and April is discouraging, the AFL-CIO said.

"The 20.8 percent is the same as the record high level of last winter, and the increase in joblessness among adult males to 9.8 percent shows the shallowness of the recovery."

The latest BLS report on employment showed that the total number of civilian jobs rose four-tenths of 1 percent, or 355,000, to an adjusted 99.5 million in April while the civilian labor force rose by 302,000 to 110,786,000. The number of jobless Americans decreased five-tenths of 1 percent, or 53,000, to an adjusted 11,328,000.

BLS said that employment gains last month were widespread, with nearly three-fourths of the 186 different industry groupings reporting gains. Almost all of April's employment gains were made by adult women, for whom the jobless rate declined to 8.4 percent, from 8.8 percent in March.

Hispanic rate drops

Rates for other worker categories showed a tenth of a percent decline to 8.9 percent for whites and a similar decrease to 23.4 percent for teenagers. The jobless rate for workers of Hispanic origin fell 1.7 percent to 14.5 percent over the month.

Jobless rates declined last month for workers in trade as well as manufacturing, BLS said. Construction jobs were up in April, but the industry's unemployment remained unchanged at 20.3 percent. Employment in the services industry rose by more than 100,000 for the second month in a row.

EDITORIALS

End Run at the NLRB

JUST TWO WEEKS ago, in this space, an editorial titled "Another Coop for the Fox" expressed the AFL-CIO's concern at the appointment of Hugh L. Reilly as solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board.

Was this an appropriate assignment for a lawyer recruited by the Reagan Administration from a top staff position with the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, among the most virulent of anti-union organizations?

The foundation divides its energies between harassment suits against unions and fund raising, such as this appeal to the gullible: "If we fail to raise the money we need to pay for our court battles, the Union Bosses will be able to continue to burn, bomb, blackmail—even murder—and still get off scot-free."

Another sample is a so-called "national opinion survey on union violence," whose first "question" reads: "Labor union violence—arson, bombings, vandalism, etc.—is a major cause of property destruction in the United States. Do you think federal and local judges should make labor union officials pay to repair the damage they cause?"

WHEN THE Reagan Administration came to office two years ago, it picked Reilly from this cesspool and appointed him to a responsible but low-visibility post in the Labor Dept.—surely the proverbial fox put to guard the chicken coop.

Now he has been promoted, incredibly, to the agency that is charged by law with enforcing the right of workers to organize and bargain through unions of their choice.

The appointment boggled the imagination.

President Reagan's appointees to the NLRB have undertaken a bold power grab to minimize the independent role that Congress decreed for the labor board's general counsel.

The general counsel is the only NLRB official other than board members themselves who is appointed for a set term, subject to confirmation by the Senate. The incumbent, William A. Lubbers, is a 30-year NLRB career employee. But he was appointed to his present post during the Carter Administration and therefore, by definition, is suspect to the NLRB's new majority.

The Republican members of the board voted to strip the Senate-confirmed general counsel of authority over most NLRB court actions and over most of the agency's lawyers, transferring the authority to the solicitor.

Surely there are voices from both parties that will be raised against such an outrage. Surely Congress does not intend the NLRB to operate as a political spoils system.

Is a union-free environment the goal of this Administration as well as of its big campaign contributors?

Slowdown in Congress

HAS CONGRESS lost its sense of urgency about getting America back to work because the stock market has gone up and the unemployment rate has taken a barely perceptible dip?

It would appear so, to judge by the painfully slow pace of what was supposed to be the second phase of an economic recovery program.

This brutal recession has been the longest as well as the worst since World War II and in the absence of effective government action, the nation's economic recovery will be cruelly slow and dangerously incomplete.

There was some small encouragement in a House vote for a belated program of direct loans to help unemployed homeowners avoid foreclosure. The enlarged Democratic majority in this Congress thwarted the conservative coalition that dominated the House during President Reagan's first two years, a welcome byproduct of last November's election. But it is shocking that so few Republicans responded to the need.

The misery of unemployment for more than 11 million Americans hunting work and not finding it does not diminish because the squiggle on the unemployment graph moved from 10.3 to 10.2 percent.

The election's mandate was not for a do-nothing Congress.

Forceful leader needed to inspire true mandate

By Press Associates, Inc.

Who among those seeking the White House will be willing and able to express a sense of national purpose that will inspire the voters to give him a genuine mandate?

As many people recognize by now, the "mandate" claimed by President Reagan was a myth, a public relations creation. Reagan won little more than half the vote; with only about half the voters casting ballots, he won half of one-half. Hardly a mandate.

Historian James MacGregor Burns believes that America urgently needs to break "The Deadlock of Democracy." That was the title of his book, published 20 years ago. In it, he argued, the nation must move toward the Jeffersonian model of politics if it is to solve its problems. This means real majority rule, a strong party system and a forceful leader.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was such a leader, Burns reminded veterans of the New Deal who gathered in Washington recently to commemorate the 50th anniversary of FDR's inauguration.

Burns said FDR got a bad press during his second term, but he proved his commitment to liberalism while reflecting his desperation.

Foes on all sides

Roosevelt, Burns recalled, "battled not only with his Republican and business foes but with the Supreme Court, with the barons of southern reaction and racism in the Congress, and with the more obdurate elements of the federal civil service."

FDR largely failed, said Burns, who criticized Roosevelt for his methods rather than his goals. Looking back, Burns said he now is enormously impressed with FDR's courage and commitment.

FDR's experience stands as a warning, Burns said, to any liberal Democratic candidate for the presidency who is serious about his liberalism. He will meet "the institutional slowdown and structural deadlock inherent in our curious system of government, probably the most complex, convoluted, and baffling system of any democracy."

Burns said most of today's politicians try to work within that system rather than mastering or reforming it. Such a system has much to commend it, Burns said, except that it can rarely plan in a comprehensive way to deal with the great problems of the nation.

Democracy's non-participants

Burns then offered a somber warning about "the one-half of the American citizens who are non-voters, non-participants in the greatest democracy on earth."

Isn't it extraordinary, he remarked, that after some 20 months of presidential campaigning, half the people fail to vote? After intensive media coverage, barrages of TV specials, acres of newspaper articles, the primary campaigns, convention campaigns and election campaigns—after all this, 50 percent of the voters stay home.

"History may not teach many lessons, but one it does teach, I think, is that people like this, who may seem apathetic and uncaring and uninvolved and unthreatening—people like these who seem quiet and even placid, will not endlessly remain patient but rather in the long run, even in the middle run, will turn against a system that cannot satisfy their fundamental needs, material and psychological."

Burns, who teaches at Williams College in Massachusetts and once ran for Congress in a hard-hit textile district, said he feels the people of such economically devastated areas will not tolerate many more episodes of dashed expectations.

"We have in short one more chance to make our system work—or to face an angry and disillusioned people ready to consider some other system rather than strengthening the one we have."

MEMO FROM COPE

'Confidential' GOP Plan

The first thing you have to understand about "confidential" reports like the one pictured at right is that they are mailed to millions and millions of people, making them as "confidential" as a network newscast. This kind of "confidential" report always is accompanied by a passionate appeal for funds, as this one was, and the "confidential" line makes it all seem more urgent to come across with a donation.

Nevertheless, just because it's pseudo-confidential doesn't mean the "victory plan" it unfolds isn't a serious one. It won't be the only plan Republicans come up with to win big gains in U.S. House elections in 1984, but it's the first one out of the gate and deserves some attention.

Its objective is to "lay the groundwork (in 1983) to elect from 26 to 50 new Republican members of Congress in 1984." The figures aren't plucked from thin air. Twenty-six is the total Democratic gain of House seats as a result of 1982 elections. Fifty is within a few of the over-all number of first-term Democrats elected in 1982. There were 56 of them.

The plan is the mirror image of the Democrats' campaign in 1982 based on the idea that the most vulnerable incumbents are the first-termers. In short, the newest in are the easiest to get out. It doesn't always work, but it's not a bad rule of thumb, either.

The "confidential" program includes funding this year for all GOP incumbents who do, or might, face serious challenges next year; active recruitment and training of candidates to oppose Democrats in marginal or potentially marginal situations; support services such as polling, research, use of the computerized GOP Information Network; a continuing flow of attacks against voting performance of Democratic incumbents for use by GOP groups and challengers in the home district; early funds for challengers and funds for national media ads hitting the Democrats.

The plan calls for $1 million in spending this year and $2.7 million over-all, rather modest figures in view of GOP fund-raising success of recent years, which runs in the range of 10-1 over the Democrats.

As with so many fund-raising communiques from GOP sources, "Big Labor Bosses" are used to goad contributors to cough up. GOP Congressional Committee Chairman Guy Vander Jagt not only warns that "Big Labor Bosses have already targeted dozens of Republicans for defeat," he says unless he gets his $2.7 million the GOP will be "overwhelmed by Big Labor dollars" in 1984.

Speaking of "Big Labor dollars," do you have $2 for COPE?

And then there's a letter to his huge national mailing list from Sen. Jesse Helms, with a fund-raising gimmick charitable organizations have used but not candidates. It's the old "challenge" ploy. Helms claims some of his friends gave him $10,000 for his 1984 campaign for re-election but insisted he raise another $10,000 before he could use theirs. Helms encloses in his appeal two checks for small amounts made out to himself (sample above), tells recipients to send them back accompanied by two of their checks for the same amounts. Only then does Helms get the "challenge" money, or so he says. Considering that his own personal PAC, National Congressional Club, pulled in nearly $10 million in 1981-82, Helms—with or without his "challenge" money—is expected to be the most abundantly financed Senate candidate in 1984.

The PAC Picture: Bigger Than Ever

Political action committee (PAC) contributions to candidates for federal office in the 1981-82 election cycle soared to $87.3 million, a 45 percent jump over the 1979-80 cycle, latest figures released by the Federal Election Commission reveal.

While labor PACs—288 of them in all—were able to boost their aggregate contributions 47 percent over the previous cycle to $20.8 million—they were outgunned by the $29.3 million of corporate PACs and the $22.8 million kicked in by trade associations. (The biggest single contributor of all was a trade PAC, the Realtors Association, which donated $2,115,135 to candidates.)

Ideological PACs—right wing, conservative, moderate, liberal—among them contributed $11.1 million. But the direct contributions don't begin to tell the story of their political involvement, and this applies primarily to the right-wingers.

For example, spending on so-called "independent expenditures" campaigns is not included in figures on direct contributions. But these negative campaigns are the next best thing. They attack the candidate the sponsoring PAC wants to defeat, without urging a vote for the candidate it wants to elect.

This kind of campaign is the stock in trade of some right-wing PACs, notably the National Conservative PAC. NCPAC pioneered the tactic with great success in 1980 but then wound up with egg all over its face in 1982, when only one of its negative campaign targets was defeated, a defeat in which the NCPAC campaign played a minor role.

NCPAC blew $1 million in Maryland alone trying to topple incumbent Sen. Paul Sarbanes, but failed miserably. In all, NCPAC spent $3.2 million on negative campaigns.

For all the money they take in from contributors, right-wing PACs give precious little directly to candidates. Indeed, the bulk of their money goes into mailings to raise more money. For example, NCPAC and the National Congressional Club—Sen. Jesse Helms' (N.C.) own personal PAC—each hauled in receipts just shy of $10 million. NCPAC's direct contributions to candidates totalled only 2.6 percent of receipts, $263,171. The Congressional Club gave even less—$135,264, only 1.4 percent of receipts.

The price tag for 1980 elections at all levels—presidential, congressional, state, local, ballot issues etc.—was more than $1.2 billion, according to the Citizens Research Foundation. The group's study claims the figure was double the amount spent in 1976.

The total broke down this way: $275 million for presidential campaigns (including primaries, independent committee costs, federal matching funds), $239 million for congressional races, $265 million for state candidates, $200 million for local candidates, $95 million spent by PACs, $89 million by political parties and $40 million spent on ballot issues.

But it's a mistake to look upon this imbalance within rightist PACs between receipts and direct contributions as any indication of a failure of mission. Even though they struck out at the voting booth, every mass mailing they spend money on to collect money with is a potent piece of propaganda for their various causes. They spread the word and firm up the faithful, and they turn up new donors.

Their direct mail is a form of advertising and, since it always more than pays for itself, it's the cheapest way to reach and increase their tribe.

Among them, the 511 non-connected ideological PACs took in $64.7 million in receipts—the lion's share of this for ultra-conservative operations—nearly half the total receipts attracted by 1,310 corporate, 520 trade and 288 labor PACs.

Labor PAC contributions went overwhelmingly to Democratic candidates at the 94 percent level. Corporate committees split 66-34 for Republicans and trade groups 57-43 for GOP candidates. Large amounts of the Democratic share from corporate and trade PACs, however, went to so-called "Boll Weevil" conservative Democrats who provided a solid base of support in Congress for President Reagan's economic program in 1981-82.

Odd 'n End (Singular—there's just room for one)

UP FROM OBSCURITY, George Bush emerges from under the wraps that constrain all Vice Presidents and hits the speech-making circuit as a surrogate for the President. He tells a convention of Black Grand Master Masons that Reagan is being portrayed incorrectly and unfairly as a President by and for the rich. "He cares, he hurts, he's a human being," Bush says. All of which could well be true of the President, but he's got a funny way of showing it. You don't create massive unemployment, cut food stamps, health care, housing and education programs and earn a reputation as everybody's benefactor. This has been a public hang-up for this administration since the beginning. It gives to the rich, takes from workers and the needy and wonders why so many view it as uncaring.

Immigration bill gains Senate approval, 76-18

Focus on workers

On location at the Machinists Labor Temple in Waukesha, Wis., camera crew tapes a segment of the AFL-CIO's new television series, "America Works." Here, Machinists Local 1377 President Abel Garcia, center, and IAM member Allen Levie of the Wisconsin Action Coalition discuss a program spearheaded by Levie that helps jobless workers obtain discounts on goods and services from merchants and public facilities. Penalties set for hiring of illegal aliens

By Susan Dunlop

Immigration reforms approved by the Senate contain a number of features long sought by organized labor.

By a vote of 76 to 18, the Senate passed a measure intended to curb illegal border crossing and to legalize the status of undocumented workers who are already long-time residents in this country.

The bill is similar to the one passed by the Senate last year which died when the House failed to act on its own version. A companion bill on the House side this year could come up for floor action in July.

A key provision of the new Senate measure, supported by the AFL-CIO, makes it illegal to hire undocumented alien workers and provides for fines and criminal penalties for employers who knowingly do so.

The bill would require the President within three years to develop a counterfeit-proof identification system for all legal workers. In the meantime, employers would be required to examine documents certifying a potential worker's citizenship or legal resident status.

The bill also provides for a two-step program of adjustment to legal status for illegal aliens who are already established residents of their communities. The AFL-CIO favors legalization, but has called for a more generous, one-step program.

Employer pressure

Despite strong labor opposition, the Senate gave in to pressure from agricultural employers and approved language that would relax the restrictions on the so-called H-2 temporary worker program.

The system of penalties under the bill would apply to employers with four or more employees and would impose a civil fine of up to $1,000 per illegal worker for the first offense, $2,000 per worker for subsequent violations and a criminal mis-

New triggers cut extended aid to jobless

By James M. Shevis

The shortcomings of the federal formula for determining the eligibility of jobless workers for extended and supplemental unemployment benefits was pointed up again when Ohio went off the extended program last week.

Even though its statewide unemployment rate is 13 percent, Ohio "triggered off" extended benefits because its insured unemployment rate did not meet the revised criteria put in effect last September by the Reagan Administration.

Extended benefits are paid in states where the insured unemployment rate, or IUR, is either 5 percent and 120 percent of the average of the previous two years, or 6 percent without regard to prior years. Before the Administration revised the program, with the consent of Congress, the triggers were 1 percent lower.

Jobless rate disregarded

Ohio's IUR fell short of the requirements. Its rate is 5.86 percent, and it does not meet the 120-percent level. On Apr. 30, for the same reasons, Indiana triggered off, even though its unemployment rate was 13 percent statewide and as high as 17 percent in some metropolitan areas.

Two other states — Rhode Island and Vermont—are also losing their extended benefits program because of the tight eligibility requirements, Arleen Gilliam of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said. Rhode Island, with an IUR of 5.78 percent, and Vermont, with a 5.96 rate, trigger off May 21. Neither state meets the 120-percent standard.

Once extended benefits trigger off, a state must stop paying the 13 weeks' extended benefits regardless of its IUR.

The AFL-CIO, which has long decried the inadequacy of the formula and sought remedial legislation, pointed out that it is virtually impossible for states that were hard-hit by high levels of unemployment two years ago to have an IUR that is now 20 percent greater.

"It is clear that insured unemployment rates are no measure of total unemployment, and are defective measures of the need for extended and federal supplemental benefits," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said.

"The gap between total unemployment and insured unemployment continues to widen and the magnitude of this divergence cannot be explained even by the U.S. Dept. of Labor."

Revision urged

Seidman said that long-term jobless workers should be protected against income loss during all phases of the business cycle and that, at the very least, total unemployment rather than insured unemployment should be used as the trigger.

The insured unemployment is the percentage derived by dividing the number of workers filing claims for benefits by the number of workers in jobs covered by state unemployment insurance programs.

The AFL-CIO has long advocated a permanent program of supplemental benefits at all phases of the business cycle, giving jobless workers maximum total benefits of at least 65 weeks.

House votes to cancel withholding on interest

The House voted 382-41 to cancel a scheduled withholding tax on dividend and interest income that was expected to bring in billions of dollars of tax revenue that is owed but never collected.

The one-sided vote stemmed from a scare campaign manipulated by the nation's banks, which brought an avalanche of mail to congressional offices.

Once it became obvious the repealer would pass, members of both parties jumped on the bandwagon even though the measure was opposed by the AFL-CIO and the Reagan Administration, by the Speaker of the House and both the chairman and ranking minority member of the Ways & Means Committee.

The Senate earlier passed a bill to block the withholding requirement from taking effect for at least four years. Under a law passed by Congress last year, the withholding requirement is to start this July.

But the Senate will have to act anew, since the House considers any tax action initiated by the Senate a violation of the Constitution's assignment of revenue-raising initiatives to the House.

The Administration is trying to get Congress to adopt something less than total repeal, so as to give President Reagan an escape route from his declaration that he would veto any repeal of the withholding provision.

Bipartisan opposition had kept the repeal bill bottled up in the Ways & Means Committee until a discharge petition signed by 219 House members made floor action certain. The committee then sent the measure to the floor without recommendation under a no-amendment procedure.

On the rollcall, 225 Democrats and 157 Republicans voted for the repeal of withholding and only 32 Democrats and nine Republicans voted against it.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Does Hugh Reilly have a right to work—and, if so, where?

The National Labor Relations Board was willing to let Hugh L. Reilly go back to his former job at the Labor Dept. for an indefinite period.

But the Labor Dept., it turned out, didn't really have an "urgent need" for his services and, in fact, didn't even want him back.

It was an embarrassment all around.

Reilly's background as a staff lawyer for the anti-union National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation had raised some eyebrows when he was hired for a high-level Labor Dept. staff job in 1981.

It created a swirl of controversy when Reilly was first appointed to the post of solicitor of the NLRB and then entrusted by the board's Republican majority with the important enforcement powers traditionally exercised by the independent office of the NLRB general counsel.

Then came a letter dated May 17 to NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson and other members of the labor board. It was signed by Ronald J. St. Cyr, who is acting Assistant Secretary for Labor-Management Relations. That's the Assistant Secretary of Labor post that Dotson held before he became NLRB chairman earlier this year. Both St. Cyr and Reilly, it happens, worked directly under him.

St. Cyr wrote that Reilly's departure from the Labor Dept. had left his old office in a real bind because there was no one else with the expertise to deal with intri-

NLRB order to bargain hits Equitable Life

The National Labor Relations Board found the Equitable Life Assurance Society guilty of unfair labor practices and ordered the company to bargain with Service Employees District 925.

The union represents claims processors at Equitable's Syracuse, N.Y., group benefits office, who have been trying to negotiate a first contract since early in 1982.

The NLRB's summary judgment requires the company to begin bargaining with the union within 20 days of the May 4 ruling.

District 925 President Karen Nussbaum, said the NLRB decision "destroys the company's contention that they are pursuing legitimate legal means of denying the employees their rights." Equitable "has been breaking the law all along, and they continue to violate the law," she charged.

Union hopeful

Nussbaum said the union "hopes the company will abide by the order" and begin bargaining, but she pointed out that if the company doesn't comply within the 20-day limit, the board must take the case to the U.S. Court of Appeals for enforcement.

The SEIU pledged to continue its boycott of the company's insurance policies if Equitable pursues its "legal delaying tactics to avoid bargaining a fair contract." The boycott was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in February.

The 83 claims processors, most of whom are women, voted to be represented by District 925 in February 1982, and the union was certified as the bargaining agent the following June.

The workers had contacted SEIU in the summer of 1981.

Issues in the organizing campaign were low pay, lack of respect from management, arbitrary job classifications and the introduction of new technology such as video display terminals "without regard for human needs or safety."

The company's objections to the election, the first time clerical employees in the company have voted for a union, were denied by the NLRB last October.

Exploring job hazards

Eula Bingham, former Occupational Safety & Health Administration director, tells the 175 delegates to the Machinists 1983 job safety and community services conference that worker concessions in workplace safety and health measures amount to "bargaining for death, disease and deformities." She faulted OSHA's lack of direction and total inaction under the Reagan Administration. At left are Dr. Thomas F. Mancuso, IAM occupational health consultant, and George Robinson, the union's director of safety, health and community services.

Gordon Freeman dies at 86, president emeritus of IBEW

Gordon M. Freeman, president emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, died May 13 of pneumonia at a Kensington, Md., nursing home. He was 86.

Freeman was elected president of the IBEW in 1955, a post he held until his retirement in 1968 when he was named president emeritus. He had also served as a vice president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades, Metal Trades and Industrial Union Departments.

In addition, Freeman served as vice chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped under Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon. He was a member of the Advisory Council on Social Security from 1963-65.

IBEW President Charles H. Pillard praised Freeman as "a man who lived for the labor movement, a staunch leader of the IBEW who dedicated his life to the cause of working people."

In a letter to Freeman's wife, Virginia, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue noted "the grateful and affectionate regard in which he was held by tens of thousands of IBEW members who benefited from his great gifts of leadership." For all those who "like ourselves, had the good luck to benefit from his great gifts of friendship, his memory will remain bright and permanent," Kirkland and Donahue wrote.

In a letter to Pillard, they cited Freeman's "lifetime of dedicated service" to the union, helping to make it "the strong and flexible instrument for improving the lives of its members that it is today. In so doing, he helped advance the cause of workers throughout the nation and the world."

Freeman, a native of Portsmouth, Ohio, was initiated as an apprentice wireman there in 1913. He later served Local 575 as president, business manager and treasurer, and he was business manager of the area's building trades council until he became an IBEW international representative in 1930.

In 1944, he was elected vice president of the union's Fourth District, a post he held until his election as president. The district includes Washington, D.C., Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, West Virginia and Kentucky.

During his years as an international representative, Freeman was active in organizing and servicing union members at the Tennessee Valley Authority, and he is credited with designing and putting in place the uniform apprenticeship program for TVA workers, the first such program on a government installation.

Besides his wife, survivors include one son, two grandchildren and five great grandchildren.

Unemployment in 41 states climbs above 1982 levels

The government reported higher unemployment rates in 41 states and the District of Columbia between March 1982 and March 1983, with 26 of the jurisdictions posting rates of 10 percent or more.

West Virginia, with a rate of 20.1 percent, had the highest jobless rate in the nation, while Johnstown, Pa., at 24.6 percent, continued as the city with the highest rate, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Following West Virginia at the high end of the scale were Michigan, 17 percent, and Alabama, 15 percent.

The figures are not adjusted for seasonal factors. The nationwide unadjusted unemployment rate in March was 10.8 percent. In April it dropped to 10 percent. The seasonally adjusted rate generally used by most economists was 10.3 percent in March and 10.2 percent in April.

BLS said a cutback in mining employment was the main cause for West Virginia's continuing high rate, while declines in manufacturing were the principal reasons for the high joblessness in Alabama and Michigan.

In addition to West Virginia, Michigan and Alabama, jobless rates were 10 percent and over in the following jurisdictions: Alaska, 12.1 percent; Arizona, 11.1 percent; California, 10.9 percent; District of Columbia, 10.4 percent; Idaho, 12.7 percent; Illinois, 12.5 percent; Indiana, 12 percent; Kentucky, 11.6 percent; Louisiana, 12.1 percent; Maine, 10.7 percent; Minnesota, 10.2 percent; Mississippi, 11.6 percent; Nevada, 11.3 percent; New Mexico, 10.6 percent; Ohio, 13.7 percent; Oregon, 12.2 percent; Pennsylvania, 13.9 percent; Rhode Island, 11.1 percent; South Carolina, 10.9 percent; Tennessee, 12.3 percent; Washington, 12.4 percent; Wisconsin, 12 percent; and Wyoming, 11.2 percent.

Among 234 major metropolitan areas reporting over the year, 183 experienced rising joblessness, BLS said. Five areas had jumps of at least 6 percentage points over the year: Johnstown; Duluth-Superior, Wis.; Beaumont-Port Arthur, Tex.; Peoria, Ill., and Pittsburgh.

Leading rate

Johnstown's jobless rate of 24.6 percent was down only slightly from February's leading level of 25.9 percent. Other high unemployment areas included Modesto, Calif., 22.9 percent, and Muskegon-Norton Shores-Muskegon Heights, Mich., 20.9 percent.

Nonfarm payroll employment fell in 40 states and the District of Columbia during the reporting period, BLS said. Job losses were concentrated in manufacturing, mining, construction, and transportation and public utilities. Factory jobs declined in virtually every state over the year, BLS said.

Four states reported job losses of more than 100,000 between March 1982 and March 1983—Pennsylvania, 180,000; Texas, 170,000; Illinois, 140,000, and California, 130,000. Declines in factory jobs accounted for nearly three-fourths of those reductions.

Reagan taps O'Donnell for Labor Dept.

AFL-CIO Vice President John J. O'Donnell has been named by President Reagan to the post of assistant Secretary of Labor for legislative affairs.

O'Donnell has served on the federation's Executive Council since February 1979, and from 1971 to 1982, was president of the Air Line Pilots. He is a non-voting member of the Republican National Committee's executive committee and a member of the Republican Party labor advisory counncil.

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee will schedule confirmation hearings after the nomination has been officially submitted by the White House.

On confirmation by the Senate, O'Donnell will carry out some of the duties previously held by Donald Shasteen, who was deputy undersecretary of labor for legislation and intergovernmental relations. When Shasteen moved to another Labor Dept. position, his duties were divided. Paul Russo was named in February to be deputy undersecretary for intergovernmental affairs and O'Donnell will fill the vacancy in the legislative affairs area.

He is currently on leave of absence from Eastern Airlines where he has been employed since 1956. Before his election as ALPA president, he served on a number of local and national negotiating committees for EAL pilots.

ILO conferee

Since 1970, O'Donnell has been an AFL-CIO representative at International Labor Organization sessions and conferences on aviation issues. He is also a member of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Community Services and is the labor representative on the United Way board of governors and executive committee.

O'Donnell represented the ALPA in the International Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations, the international trade secretariat. He has been a member of the Labor Dept.'s Policy Advisory Committee on Multilateral Trade Negotiations and served on many civic and professional panels.

IBEW agreement covering 3,000 signed at Hoover

North Canton, Ohio—Members of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1985 overwhelmingly approved a new three-year agreement with Hoover Co. providing substantial wage and benefit improvements, and averting demands by the company for concessions in the health care plan and in wages.

The contract, ratified by a vote of 1,902 to 98, covers 3,000 workers at four vacuum cleaner and floor care appliance facilities in the area.

The wage settlement provides a basic increase of 96 cents an hour over the life of the contract. Local union President Jim Gensley said that additional rate adjustments for workers doing piece work will bring average gains to over $1 an hour.

Under the old agreement the average hourly rate was about $10 for most workers, with piece rate workers earning up to $14.50 an hour, Gensley said.

Other improvements were scored in pensions, shift formulas, sickness and accident benefits, life insurance, dental and prescription plans, and Dec. 24 was added as a 15th paid holiday.

Although the company had sought changes in the health care plan that would have reduced benefits, they were later withdrawn from the bargaining table. The union and Hoover agreed to establish a joint committee to study the problem of rising health care costs and find ways to contain them. In addition, several improvements were won in the plan including coverage for added testing, second opinions, and for workers on leave of absence or awaiting the outcome of contested workers' compensation claims.

Employer penalties set

Immigration reforms approved by Senate

demeanor penalty of $1,000, six months in jail or both for those who engage in "a pattern or practice" of violations.

The AFL-CIO, in addition to supporting stiff penalties, has told both the Senate and the House that any final bill must have protections for legal workers who might be discriminated against for reasons related to immigration, particularly for those who happen to "look foreign." The Senate bill, however, does not provide such protections.

Under the legalization of status provisions, illegal aliens who can prove continuous residence since Jan. 1, 1977, and meet other general requirements would immediately qualify for permanent resident alien status. Persons who arrived in this country before Jan. 1, 1980, would be eligible for immediate temporary resident alien status, leading to permanent resident status after three years. Current law requires that permanent resident aliens must wait at least five years before applying for citizenship.

The AFL-CIO supports legalization on the "most generous, practical" terms and has warned Congress that a two-tier legalization program could create a "host of human and administrative problems." The House version of the bill would grant permanent resident status to those in the country before Jan. 1, 1982.

The AFL-CIO opposes a provision in the Senate bill that would prohibit legalized aliens from receiving any federally funded non-emergency, need-based public assistance for a period of three to six years. A provision in the pending bill on the House side would deny assistance for five years.

An improvement over the bill passed by the Senate last year, however, would authorize more funds for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Labor Dept. to step up enforcement of existing equal opportunity and wage and hour laws.

On the House side, the companion measure has cleared the Judiciary Committee. Four other committees that have indicated interest in holding hearings must complete action by June 27, and the bill could come to the floor by mid-July.

At hearings held by the employment opportunities subcommittee of the House Education & Labor Committee, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold stressed that the prohibition against hiring of illegal aliens is one of the "essential elements" in the immigration bill.

Gold pointed out that this prohibition cannot properly be enforced without strong mechanisms to assure employer compliance, coupled with equally strong protections to ward off discrimination against anyone legally entitled to work.

Union house

It was stormy weather for non-union hotels in Washington when entertainer Lena Horne arrived in town for a four-week engagement of her hit show, "The Lady and Her Music."

Miss Horne—after learning from Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 25 that a fund-raising reception she was scheduled to attend was booked in a non-union hotel—called the sponsor, the National Council of Negro Women, and asked if it could be moved. Then she checked out of the unorganized hotel where she had been booked and into the organized Sheraton Washington.

Local 25 Executive Sec. Ron Richardson praised Miss Horne for her concern, and he stressed that the NCNW and its president, Dorothy Height, had also been "highly cooperative" in moving the reception to the organized hotel.

Horne is a member of these unions: Actors' Equity, Television & Radio Artists and the Screen Actors Guild.

PAI wins Guild award for 'Window' column

Press Associates, Inc., the national labor news service, has won the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild's annual Front Page award for an entry by a non-daily labor or business publication.

PAI's winning entry consisted of several issues of its weekly Washington Window column, which appears in the AFL-CIO News as well as in many other labor publications. The column is written alternately by Robert B. Cooney, Calvin Zon, and Susan Zachem.

Enforcing Davis-Bacon

Attention-getting billboard is one of 15 posted in the Washington metropolitan area—including Maryland and Virginia suburbs—to assure that workers on publicly funded construction projects are paid prevailing wages required by the Davis-Bacon Act and state or local counterparts. The Washington area building trades council reported a "good response" to the billboard display.

Proxy vote on labor policies gets 'attention' of CapCities

Buffalo—It was enough to sober the countenances of the most successful and self-confident of corporate officers and directors facing the annual meeting of their company's stockholders.

And it did. Capital Cities Communications' officers and directors sat through the meeting "as stony-faced as a military tribunal," one reporter wrote.

They did so despite 1982 having been the media conglomerate's 28th consecutive year of record financial performance and 1983's first quarter producing a 17 percent gain in after-tax profits, to $21 million.

As they marched into the annual meeting, CapCities corporate leaders knew that an unprecedented 11-percent-plus of the stock proxies they had received in the mail were voted in favor of a shareholder's motion to direct them to issue a written report on the company's labor-relations policies and practices.

They also knew that a strong contingent of union and public-interest representatives, holding their own and others' stock-voting proxies, were waiting to question them closely on the same subject.

That group—which included Typographical Union members from Buffalo and Kansas City, Buffalo Newspaper Guild members and leaders of the Buffalo AFL-CIO Council—swelled attendance to more than at any annual meeting in his 28 years with the company, according to Thomas S. Murphy, CapCities' chairman and chief executive officer.

The shareholder's resolution was part of a nationwide "corporate campaign" by the Typographical Union to draw attention to CapCities' poor labor-relations record at its newspaper, broadcast and cable-TV properties. The effort has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

No contract since '80

The campaign currently is focused on the Kansas City Star where more than 140 ITU-represented employees have been working without contracts since 1980 in the face of company demands to eliminate job security and to switch from the ITU's portable pension plan to one managed by the company.

Asked if it is true that CapCities still is losing $2 million a year in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Murphy replied, "Yes, that's correct." Newspaper unions in that city have been publishing their own daily, the Citizens' Voice, since striking the Times Leader in 1978.

Arch Puddington, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy and mover of the accountability motion, told the stockholders' meeting that he considers CapCities' labor relations policies "divisive" and "mean-spirited."

"Co-workers have been turned against co-workers, neighbors against neighbors and community leaders have turned against Capital Cities managers," he said.

Consciousness-raiser

When the procession of critical speakers had come to an end, CapCities' Murphy commented: "It's safe to say, you've gotten our attention."

When the mailed and in-person proxies were tallied, 11.5 percent of the shares voted had been cast for the shareholder's motion—904,691 to 6,987,518.

After the meeting, ITU Second Vice President Robert L. Wartinger pointed to "the large number of shares voted for the resolution" as "a clear signal to the company that . . . investors nationwide are watching CapCities' labor practices."

He also expressed the hope that there now will be meaningful bargaining at the Kansas City Star and at the same time expressed the ITU's determination to "continue to make every effort and use all necessary means to get a fair contract" there.

Jobless rate outlook called 'dismal'

The outlook for unemployment, even under the Administration's overly optimistic projections, "remains dismal for many years to come," AFL-CIO Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald warned a group of business writers meeting in Washington.

According to the Office of Management & Budget, unemployment is not expected to fall below 8 percent until 1986, Oswald noted. Official joblessness is now 10.2 percent. OMB sees the unemployment rate averaging 10 percent this year, 9.1 percent next year, 8.4 percent in 1985, and 7.7 percent in 1986.

"Yet the only year prior to 1982 that unemployment was over 8 percent in the post-war period was 1975, and that was considered a severe recession year," Oswald observed. "Thus, severe recession levels of unemployment are forecast under existing policies for at least three more years.

Continuing plight

"Even in its five-year forecast, the Administration does not foresee a return to the 5.8-percent unemployment level of 1979."

Oswald, who spoke to members of the Society of American Business & Economic Writers, called on the national government to assume responsibility for eliminating the blight of unemployment.

"This is the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946, a mandate reaffirmed in 1978 by the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act," he said.

Two categories

Unemployment frequently is divided into two main categories, cyclical and structural. The first has to do with swings in the business cycle while the other involves particular industries.

"We need national policies aimed at both problems," Oswald said. "Unfortunnately, the Administration refuses to acknowledge any responsibility for cyclical unemployment even though it was the Reagan Administration's own foolish, tragic, misguided policies which caused this recession-depression in the first place.

"Furthermore, the Reagan Administration proposals for addressing structural unemployment rely mainly on more counterproductive tax subsidies and wage reductions. More tax subsidies will further erode the nation's tax base and more wage cuts will further weaken the consumer buying power on which business recovery and business profits depend."

Instead of ignoring unemployment, policies to create jobs directly should be put into effect, he said. Specifically, the AFL-CIO advocates a program to rebuild the nation's deteriorating infrastructure, to provide housing for low- and moderate-income Americans, to provide unmet public services, to provide specific youth employment and training programs, and to deal more adequately with the problems of displaced workers.

The federation also calls for relieving the suffering of the unemployed through extending unemployment benefits, as well as providing health care to jobless workers and their families.

Work goals

"Workers want a job—a job that pays well, a job that is healthy, and a job in which one has a say," Oswald said. "The AFL-CIO will continue to press for a broad range of economic policies to move America faster on the road to full employment and economic growth.

"It is clearly in the economic and social interest of the nation to put Americans who are able and willing to work into productive jobs which generate taxes, produce useful community services and community facilities, and stimulate the economy in areas of high unemployment."

Balloons at the UAW convention perk up a demonstration in support of the domestic content bill.

Bieber elected president of UAW with mandate to bring back jobs

By David L. Perlman

Dallas—Delegates to the Auto Workers convention elected a new president, Owen Bieber, and gave him a strong mandate to commit the UAW's resources to support economic policies that will bring industrial jobs into the United States and Canada, instead of exporting them.

Douglas A. Fraser, who stepped down after six years as president and more than 40 years in union leadership roles, keynoted the UAW's 27th convention with a call for enactment of domestic content legislation as an essential step in economic recovery.

"It's a battle that we have to win," Fraser told the 2,500 delegates who represented more than 1.1 million working UAW members, including 110,000 in Canada. Active membership is down from 1.5 million at the UAW's previous convention three years ago, reflecting the wave of layoffs and plant closings that have decimated the union's ranks in the automobile, aerospace and farm equipment industries.

Top priority

An international trade resolution, which urged both domestic content legislation and restoration of full trade adjustment benefits for workers left jobless, was the first measure acted on by the convention. It was followed by a call for support from all levels of the union for the UAW's community action program to meet the most urgent needs of workers who have lost their jobs.

Fraser retired under the UAW's unwritten but established policy that officers not seek a new term after the age of 65 and delegates gave him a moving demonstration of their affection and respect at the conclusion of his keynote and throughout the convention.

Fraser began his final report by recalling the struggles of the recession-plagued years since the last convention, from the successful effort to bring Chrysler back "from the very threshold of destruction" to the recently-concluded 205-day strike by 21,000 farm implement workers at 10 Caterpillar Co. plants.

"All during that struggle, not one single worker broke ranks," Fraser recounted with pride.

He attributed the union's campaign for domestic content legislation to new ventures by Japanese auto firms—a Honda plant in Marysville, Ohio, a Nissan operation in Smyrna, Tenn., and the Toyota-General Motors joint operation in Fremont, Calif.

Foreign aid

Nissan is fighting UAW organizing at the Smyrna truck plant and delegates applauded the president of the Japanese auto workers union, Ichiro Shioji, who welcomed the establishment of plants in the United States and pledged to work side by side with the UAW's organizers.

Delegates also cheered their approval when Fraser served notice that unless laid-off General Motor workers are rehired at the Fremont plant for the joint venture with Toyota, "not one single car will roll off the assembly line."

Only at the end of his speech did Fraser speak in personal terms about the change in UAW leadership.

Fraser, like his predecessor Leonard Woodcock, was a close associate of the late Walter Reuther and there had been press speculation about the end of the "Reuther era" for the UAW. When Bieber was elected shop steward of Local 687 at the McInerney Spring & Wire Co. in Grand Rapids, Mich., in 1949, Fraser was already a UAW international representative.

Bieber background

Bieber was president of his local by 1956, a full-time international representative in 1962, regional director in 1974 and was elected a UAW vice president in the 1980 convention and assigned as director of the General Motors Dept., the largest in the union. He is 53 and went into the convention with the endorsement of the UAW's Administration Caucus.

"We're going to have a change in leadership this week, but it will not be a change in principle or philosophy," Fraser told the delegates. "When I pass the torch of the presidency," he said, "the ideals and the principles of this union will be carried on."

Fraser, born in Scotland, came with his family to Detroit at the age of six. After graduation from high school, he went to work as a metal finisher in Chrysler's DeSoto plant.

"This union has been my school and my college and my education," he said. It has "opened the door to worlds that I never dreamed of," not just to meet "with presidents and prime ministers" but "to experience that greatest of all feelings—of helping those that can't help themselves—and giving me the power to right some wrongs."

Active schedule

Fraser, who was named UAW president-emeritus, will remain the worker representative on the Chrysler board of directors for a one-year transition period and will take part in forthcoming meetings of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Labor Organization. He will also teach classes at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor and at Wayne State University in Detroit.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland brought to the UAW convention a strong message of trade union solidarity for the goal of domestic auto content legislation and delegates rose and cheered the promise to "persevere with you" until it "becomes the law of the land."

President Reagan's tax giveaways may be bringing good times for "his friends on Wall Street, but there is no recovery in sight for the people we represent," Kirkland said.

Labor's effort to reach a consensus on pre-primary support for a Democratic presidential candidate is good for all concerned, Kirkland suggested.

It's good for the labor movement, "which has too often been ignored or taken for granted." It's good for the candidates, who "need to be exposed to the concerns of working people." And it's good for the Democratic Party, Kirkland added, "for the fact is that no Democratic candidate can win the presidency unless he can arouse the support of America's working people" and especially union members.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) and Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) were among convention speakers pledging strong support for the goal of shoring up the nation's industrial base.

The convention thoroughly debated and overwhelmingly rejected a proposal to elect officers by direct referendum instead of at UAW convention.

Delegates adopted the unanimous recommendation of the constitution committee, which concluded that "both procedures for electing officers are democratic" but "the convention system has served the UAW well through the years" and is best for the union.

The entire slate of UAW officers was elected by voice vote, without opposition, in an afternoon of parades, bands and balloons as delegates filed onto the platform with handshakes and hugs for Fraser and Bieber.

Majerus re-elected

Raymond E. Majerus was elected to his second term as secretary-treasurer, the UAW's second-ranking office. Also re-elected were Vice Presidents Donald F. Ephlin, Odessa Komer, Marc Stepp, Stephen P. Yokich and Robert White. The new vice president is Bill Casstevens, the regional director from Cleveland who, will succeed Martin Gerber, who is retiring.

The convention approved dropping one vice presidential post as part of a consolidation.

Regional elections, the installation of officers and completion of action on resolutions were scheduled after the AFL-CIO News deadline.

Mixed signals reflect uneven recovery pace

A batch of government reports on the economy showed a fragile, uneven recovery from the Reagan Recession emerging, but the big question was whether and for how long the turnaround can be sustained.

One report by the Commerce Dept. showed that economic growth in the first quarter of this year was less than at first estimated. The January-to-March gain in real, or inflation-adjusted, gross national product turned out to be 2.5 percent rather than the 3.1 percent originally reported last month.

The revised growth estimate in the GNP took some of the strength out of the start of the long-awaited recovery from the Reagan Recession, which last year produced a drop of 1.7 percent in real GNP, the worst annual performance since the nation demobilized after World War II.

Meanwhile, a poll of economists indicated that whatever recovery there may be is not likely to reduce unemployment soon. After four years of little economic growth, business executives have learned to get by with fewer people and are more hesitant than usual to rehire workers.

Claims rising

New claims for state unemployment benefits continue to rise. The Labor Dept. said that 483,000 Americans filed first-time claims for jobless benefits during the week ended May 7, an increase of 10,000 from the previous week.

The jump in claims, a key indicator of job market health, was the second weekly increase in a row.

Encouraging signs were seen in Federal Reserve Board reports of a 2.1-percent increase in industrial output in April—the largest rise in almost eight years—and a 1.3-percent climb in the utilization rate of the nation's factories. Also brightening the picture was a slight decline in the government's producer price index for finished goods, which measures the prices of goods ready for sale to retailers.

The pace of the nation's housing recovery slowed in April, however, as new housing starts fell 8 percent from the March level to an annual rate of 1.49-million units, the Commerce Dept. said. It was the second monthly decline in a row.

Offsetting the decline in housing starts, building permits for new starts in the months ahead rose in April by 6.5 percent to an annual rate of 1.56 million, the highest level since September 1979.

The rise in industrial production, which measures the output of the nation's factories, mines, and utilities, was widespread, showing that the recovery was beginning to reach more sectors of the economy. The 2.1-percent increase was the fifth monthly rise in a row, following a 1.2-percent rise in March.

At Senate hearings

Quick action pressed to limit health costs

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to enact immediately a comprehensive across-the-board cost containment program to clamp down on runaway health care outlays.

"In recent years, rising health costs have imposed an extremely heavy financial burden on the federal government and all health consumers," Social Security Director Bert Seidman told the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

"Frequently, senior citizens and families of jobless workers go without essential medical treatment," he said, "and in some institutions, the quality of care dispensed is directly related to the patient's ability to pay."

National health insurance

Many of the problems associated with inflated health costs, reduced access and uneven quality of care would not exist had Congress enacted universal comprehensive national health insurance as the AFL-CIO has long recommended, Seidman observed. But he said uncontrolled health care costs make immediate remedial action essential.

Labor will continue to work toward comprehensive national health insurance, but "we cannot wait to bring health care inflation under control," Seidman said. He recommended enactment of cost containment legislation introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

The AFL-CIO has called for a cost containment system that would apply to all payors, public and private, and include physician services as well as hospital care. Seidman warned that if no cost containment system is enacted the serious imbalance between the haves and have-nots will grow worse.

Also, the federation believes states should be encouraged to develop their own programs within federal guidelines. Under the labor-backed Kennedy bill, special allowances would be given to inner-city and public hospitals which are the providers of last resort for the poor, the elderly, and those with nowhere else to go.

Budget cuts

Seidman also urged Congress to reject the Administration's proposed budget cuts in the health care area, which would penalize beneficiaries and discourage them from seeking needed health care treatment while allowing problems of service to increase costs of uncontrollable rates.

He noted that the AFL-CIO vigorously supported comprehensive hospital cost containment when it was last under consideration by Congress and has given strong support to efforts to enact statewide cost containment systems.

Currently, non-labor costs account for 70 percent of the inflation in health care costs, Seidman said. Unless excessive testing and unnecessary surgery are brought under control, and incentives to reduce costs are built into the reimbursement system, there will be no end to rising expenditures, he said.

Seidman stoutly defended health care workers from charges that their wages are inflationary. Most health care workers are underpaid, he said.

He cited a Bureau of Labor Statistics study showing that non-supervisory health care workers earn almost 15 percent less than workers in other industries. Their real, or inflation-adjusted, income has been declining and in 1980 was 6 percent lower than in 1972.

"In effect, hospital workers have been unfortunate scapegoats for the real villains in the health care system," Seidman testified. In reality, payroll costs from 1965 to 1980 for supervisory and non-supervisory workers as a percent of total expenses in community hospitals declined from 62 to 49 percent. Contributions for fringe benefits also declined.

Incentives needed

He urged members of Congress to be skeptical of those who blame the nation's current health care crisis on those who work in or are served by the health care system, "for until the providers and suppliers of health services have real incentives for cost behavior, as a nation we will continue to pay a great deal more for less."

Seidman scored the Administration's approach to the current health care crisis, which has been to attack public health and entitlement programs, painting them as villians undermining the nation's economy.

"Rather than proposing thoughtful strategies to contain costs, it has given Congress a blueprint from which to slash current services and protections," Seidman said.

"Employers now have strong incentives to lay off older workers, rather than pay more for health insurance, and national immunization programs and health services for mothers and children have been drastically cut back. All of these measures are punitive and have hurt health consumers, while allowing doctor fees and hospital charges to soar to new record levels."

Participants in the Musicians' Congress of Strings rehearse with renowned conductor Morton Gould for one of four public concerts during the program.

Musicians' master classes tune up youth for careers

For many talented, young musicians, deciding whether to go for a professional career with a symphony orchestra is a little easier thanks to the American Federation of Musicians' annual Congress of Strings.

This year, the union is celebrating the 25th anniversary of the congress, an eight-week program of master classes and public concerts for young string players that helps them polish their skills and introduces them to the real world of work of the professional musician.

Some 60 musicians between the ages of 16 and 23 will attend this year's congress which opens June 20 at the College-Conservatory of Music at the University of Cincinnati where it has been held for the past 14 years. Each student attends on a full scholarship provided by an AFM local union.

Musicians' Sec.-Treas. J. Martin Emerson acts as project director.

In addition to attending high level master classes taught by a faculty of the nation's ranking stringed instrument players and music educators, students play together in chamber groups, and they will perform as an orchestra at four public concerts under the batons of renowned conductors.

The goal of the congress, AFM points out, is to give young string players the chance to study and perform with top professionals "as a means of motivating them toward careers in symphony orchestras."

Young musicians are chosen for the congress through area auditions held by AFM local unions in the United States and Canada with judging done by noted local string players and other musicians.

The auditions are widely publicized in high schools and colleges, and students from smaller communities are urged to participate, the union said.

The congress was founded in 1959 by Herman Kenin, then-president of AFM, and Roy Harris, the composer and music editor. Its original goal, AFM said, was to serve as a form of "apprenticeship program" for highly accomplished young musicians to meet a critical shortage of symphony string players at the time.

Orchestras benefit

AFM pointed out that every major orchestra in the U.S. and Canada "has benefited from the services of at least one alumnus of the program," and many of the more than 2,200 graduates have gone on to work with European orchestras, become music educators or made careers as outstanding soloists.

More than one-third of all the graduates are active, working members of AFM today, the union said.

Each of the four public concerts during the congress will be directed by a major conductor, including Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center; James DePreist, music director of the Oregon Symphony and L'Orchestre Symphonique de Quebec; composer Morton Gould, and Andrew Davis, music director of the Toronto Symphony. That performance will be taped for network transmission by the Canadian Broadcasting Co.

AFM has also invited all graduates of the congress over the last 25 years to an alumni reunion in Cincinnati during the last week of the program.

Labor to launch TV series in July

A weekly television series, "America Works," will premiere on stations around the country in mid-July, marking the AFL-CIO's first venture into regularly scheduled, commercial television.

The series of half-hour programs is being produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's television planning and production arm.

Each program will show how American workers are helping find solutions to a number of the nation's most pressing problems. The programs, now in production will combine on-location coverage that focuses on an individual worker with studio discussions among experts on the issue who will present diverse and opposing points of view. A professional broadcast journalist will moderate each show.

Among the issues that will be covered are the changing nature of the American workplace, services to the unemployed, equal pay for work of equal value, and workplace health and safety.

The stations and times for the broadcasts will be announced by LIPA in June. The institute said that it plans to place the series on stations that can reach at least 50 percent of all U.S. households.

LIPA Executive Director Larry Kirkman said "America Works" was created to broaden the public debate on the crucial issues that face the country, and to show that labor is involved.

"With the support of members of AFL-CIO unions, we believe we can build an audience for programs that feature authentic voices of working people, too rarely seen on the TV screen," Kirkman stressed.

He pointed out that there are limitations on the kinds of messages and stories that the institute can produce with "the conventions, standards and legal requirements" of commercial broadcasters. Because commercial television "has the greatest ability to reach union members, other workers and the general public," the use should be "pushed to its limits in the interests of labor," Kirkman emphasized.

LIPA is also developing plans to use cable TV "where we will have more freedom to create the full range of programming needed by our members," he said.

Each half-hour program will carry advertising from commercial and union sponsors. Local stations can offer commercial spots to businesses and labor organizations in their areas. LIPA said ad sales are necessary to defray the high costs of distribution. Local stations will be given guidelines to responsible advertising for the series, the institute said.

Sixth PATCO striker begins jail term

Fort Worth, Tex.—Former Air Traffic Controller Ron May became the sixth PATCO member jailed for striking against the federal government when he reported to federal authorities to begin serving a 90-day term May 15.

May likened his case to that of jailed members of Poland's Solidarity union and told reporters, "I'm not being sent to prison because I'm a criminal, but because I'm a political prisoner. It was either obeying the law or following the dictates of my conscience."

Other former PATCO members may face jail terms, pending appeals, and more than 70 have been fined on criminal contemps findings for their role in the strike. In April, the Merit Systems Protection Board upheld dismissals of 128 former PATCO members in leading cases expected to set the precedent for the board's decisions on some 5,000 appeals still outstanding. About 3,000 other cases are still waiting for action in Federal appeals courts.

President Reagan fired 11,000 PATCO members for striking the Federal Aviation Administration in 1981.

Public Affairs Institute issues new video bulletin

The third edition of the Labor Video Bulletin, a twice monthly videocassette service of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, has been sent to affiliates, state federations, and AFL-CIO regional offices.

It covers three topics: "Labor in the Computer Age," explaining the importance of labor's use and maintenance of accurate computer data bases; a preview of the new broadcast television series being produced by LIPA, "America Works!" and "Unions: On the Air," a compilation of eight TV spots produced by unions.

LIPA's second bulletin, released in April, covers the Molders' strike and boycott against the Magic Chef Company in Cleveland, Tenn., and an overview report on the institute, titled "A Voice for Labor in the Electronic Media."

More information on the bulletins is available from LIPA, 815 16th St., N.W., Room 406, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Service award

The National Urban Coalition's annual Distinguished Trade Unionist Award is presented to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue by Carl Holman, president of the coalition, for "exceptional contributions" to the needs of the poor and to the revitalization of the nation's cities. The presentation was made at the coalition's 16th annual "Salute to the Cities" dinner in Washington.

Labor support called vital to job rights of handicapped

The labor movement is deeply committed to assuring that handicapped and disabled people are able to participate fully in the nation's workforce, Everett Lehman, director of special programs for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, told winners of the national "Ability Counts" essay contest for high school students.

Organized labor works for the employment of the handicapped through collective bargaining and its overall equal employment and safety and health policies, he stressed.

Lehman, representing AFL-CIO Vice President Charles H. Pillard, who is a member of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, pointed out that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates are firmly pledged to working with disabled people, employers and with government to assure that handicapped people have access to training programs and job placement.

The essay contest winners, their families and many of their teachers were the guests of the AFL-CIO at an awards luncheon held during the annual meeting of the President's committee. AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller chairs the committee's labor panel.

AFL-CIO-sponsored

The students' trips to Washington for the ceremony were paid for by the AFL-CIO and its state federation.

The five national winners, along with 27 other state winners, wrote on the theme "Independence for Disabled People through Technology." The five top winners shared $6,500 in cash scholarships donated by the Disabled American Veterans.

First prize of $2,000 went to Kathleen Reid of South Carolina. Second prize of $1,500 went to Cynthia Troue of Indiana; third prize of $1,250 went to Dawn Adams of Missouri; fourth prize of $1,000 to Lee Ann Blackmon of Alabama; and fifth prize of $750 to Amanda Hetzel of West Virginia who placed first in the contest in 1982.

ALPA jobs bank launched as aid to laid-off pilots

The Air Line Pilots inaugurated a nationwide computerized jobs bank to help its laid-off members find employment.

Airline deregulation and the extended recession have resulted in some 5,100 furloughs among the 34,000 pilots the union represents at 44 airlines, ALPA President Henry A. Duffy said, adding that the need for assistance to these workers is great.

"Piloting a commercial aircraft is a highly specialized career," Duffy said. "The occupational skills that an airline pilot develops over years of training and experience can't be transferred to another line of work."

Pilots as a group are highly trained, however, and many have qualifications in technical fields or backgrounds in areas as diverse as law, business administration, and teaching, he pointed out.

"With the jobs bank, we hope to help them find piloting jobs, interim employment in other areas, or even alternative careers," Duffy said.

ALPA is asking its furloughed members to complete a questionnaire about their skills and background. The data will be fed into a computer network operated by a private concern, which will then make job referrals. The referral service will be provided at no cost to ALPA members.

The network is used by thousands of companies and search firms to locate qualified applicants, Duffy said, and job opportunities will not be limited to the transportation field, but will embrace manufacturing, retailing, construction, financial services, real estate, communications, travel, consulting, and other job categories as well.

Anybody here need Reilly?

New NLRB solicitor shipped back to board

cate matters such as the Redwood Expansion Act, the Urban Mass Transportation Act and the Airline Deregulation Act.

"Since Mr. Reilly's departure, we have suffered a loss of consistency and continuity of effort in the management of these several work products," St. Cyr wrote.

His old boss and the rest of the NLRB didn't waste any time responding to the plea for help.

The next day, May 18, the NLRB announced that it had agreed to the "urgent request of the Dept. of Labor" and Reilly's detail to the Labor Dept. would start immediately.

At the same time, it announced the appointment of a veteran career NLRB employee, Berton B. Subrin as the NLRB's acting solicitor. Subrin had filled the post for the year before Reilly's appointment.

But Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, it seems, didn't think much of the idea of getting Reilly back in the department. Press accounts confirmed that he angrily ordered St. Cyr to rescind the request.

The second letter from St. Cyr, sent just hours after the NLRB's announcement of Reilly's departure, explained that it had all been an embarrassing mistake. He said he was withdrawing "my earlier request for the temporary services of your solicitor, Hugh Reilly." The letter added:

"While I had believed that there was need for Mr. Reilly's services, upon more thoroughly reviewing the situation, I have found that not only is there not a void, but that the regulatory items cited in my earlier letter are all moving along smoothly.

"Thus, the perceived need for Mr. Reilly's urgent services does not in fact exist.

"Moreover," he added, "it has been brought to my attention that an appearance of conflict between Mr. Reilly's duties as NLRB solicitor and his potential duties in LMSA (Labor-Management Services Administration) might have been created."

The first St. Cyr letter was released by the NLRB and the second letter was made available by the Labor Dept.

An assistant to Donovan said in response to a question that the "appearance of conflict" arose from the possibility that some regulation which Reilly might work on could somehow affect some matter in which the NLRB might have a vested interest.

The NLRB had not issued any statements on the matter when the AFL-CIO News went to press. But its press office confirmed that Reilly was still the NLRB solicitor.

Repeal of withholding tax on interest voted by House

If the Senate concurs, wages and salaries will continue to be subject to withholding of estimated income tax while collection of taxes on income from stock dividends and bank interest will depend largely on the accuracy with which taxpayers report their income.

The Senate, meanwhile, continued to seek a majority consensus for a budget resolution in the face of the President's fierce attack on what he terms "tax increases."

Both the House-passed budget resolution and the differing budgets favored by most senators would provide revenue by curtailing the amount of the third-stage tax cut due this July and defer or eliminate future indexing of tax brackets.

Reagan said at a news conference that he will veto any bill that, as he sees it, "raises taxes while we're coming out of a recession." He will also veto any domestic spending increase that he finds excessive.

The budget resolution is not subject to a presidential veto. It is intended to set a ceiling on government spending for various categories of programs and a target for revenue. But the President has veto powers over much of the legislation that would be needed to implement it, including both appropriations and tax law changes.

In some other congressional areas:

- The Senate Finance Committee endorsed a labor-opposed Administration bill to establish tax-favored enterprise zones to encourage companies to set up operations in urban areas needing rehabilitation. The measure would cost an estimated $3.5 billion in tax revenues over five years, and the AFL-CIO contended it would serve mainly to shift unemployment from one area to another and reward runaway employers.
- The House voted 413-0 to cite Rita Lavelle for contempt of Congress for refusing to testify about her actions when she was a top official of the Environmental Protection Agency. Meanwhile the Senate unanimously approved the appointment of William D. Ruckelshaus as EPA administrator.

Ability counts

Punishing the Poor

THERE IS a clear path of responsibility that leads from the savage cutbacks in social programs enacted during the first years of the Reagan Administration and the emergence of breadlines and soup kitchens grimly reminiscent of the Great Depression.

Homeless families these days may not be banding together in Reagantowns comparable to the Depression-era Hoovervilles. But there are people living in rusting cars no longer usable for job hunting, and they are not Skid Row derelicts.

A recent Brookings Institution budget study pointed up the contrast between the flourishing of the affluent under the Reagan Administration policies and the worsening plight of the poor.

It noted, pointedly, that government has provided for less help for the unemployed than in the recent past.

As a Washington Post editorial noted, in 1976 almost two-thirds of the 7.6 million unemployed Americans received regular or extended unemployment benefits. But last year, when unemployment averaged 10 million, only slightly more than one-third received jobless benefits.

EQUALLY GRIM, there has been a dropoff in terms of constant dollars of all forms of direct federal aid for the poor. After adjusting for inflation, federal aid for the same programs was $10 billion less in 1982 than in 1976, even though the number of unemployed was nearly one-third higher.

Just days ago, the extended unemployment benefits were triggered off in the states of Indiana and Ohio, even though the statewide unemployment rate remains in double digits and the insured unemployment rate is over 5.5 percent.

But under the new trigger levels, states with continued high unemployment are cut off because conditions haven't gotten significantly worse over the past two years. They just stayed bad.

This is the cruel offspring of the long honeymoon between the previous Congress and the Reagan Administration.

Voting with Our Feet

OUR MOST urgent task is to strengthen our movement in every way we can—through organizing, collective bargaining, and especially through legislative and political action.

Above all, we need unity and a sense of common purpose.

We saw the fruits of unity on Solidarity Day, two years ago, when nearly a half-million trade unionists and their allies marched in Washington and began to change the political climate.

We saw the fruits of unity on Solidarity Day II—the mid-term elections last November—when union members and their families and their allies succeeded in breaking conservative control of the House of Representatives and preventing the Reaganites from widening their margin in the Senate.

We will see the fruits of unity again on Solidarity III—on Labor Day of this year.

WE INTEND to demonstrate once more, in even larger numbers, the same determination and commitment that we displayed on the Mall in Washington, but this time we'll do it where we live, in each of the 50 states, in the communities which are the wellspring of American trade union strength.

President Reagan has suggested that people who don't like what his Administration is doing to their jobs and their communities can "vote with their feet" and go somewhere else. Well, we'll go him one better. The first Monday in September, we'll vote with our feet, in marches, rallies and demonstrations in every state of the Union.

Solidarity Day III will be a warm-up for Solidarity Day IV—the general election of November 1984—when we intend to restore control of the White House and both houses of Congress to leaders who will represent all of the people, instead of the privileged few.

In 1984, with the strength of the millions we speak for and with all the allies we can recruit, we'll vote not with our feet, but with our heads.

Loss of health insurance doubles blow to jobless

By Press Associates, Inc.

For most of the nation's unemployed, the loss of a job has been accompanied by a second hardship—the loss of health insurance for themselves and their families.

More than 20 million Americans currently are without health coverage because of job loss. Millions more stand to lose their employer-based group insurance this year from unemployment.

Unable to afford the high cost of individual health insurance coverage and too strapped to pay medical costs themselves, many families have been forced to forgo treatment. The consequences often are serious. For the first time since World War II, infant mortality is on the rise in those areas hit hardest by the recession.

Moreover, the health needs of the unemployed tend to be greater than those with jobs. Studies have shown that the stresses of unemployment may produce such health problems as alcoholism, depression, family violence, exacerbation of chronic illnesses, and nutritional diseases.

National problem

The human dimension of what the American Nurses Association recently called "an enormous national health problem" has been illustrated in testimony before congressional panels. Among the victims of job and health insurance loss who appeared this year before a House health subcommittee was auto worker Judy Duperry.

Duperry had been working seven years on the assembly line at a General Motors plant in Bristol, Conn., when she was laid off in October 1981. Divorced, she is the sole support of two sons, aged 6 and 14. Her health insurance coverage continued for one year after layoff under the Auto Workers contract with GM. It was thus terminated at the end of October 1982. Her unemployment benefits ran out in May 1982.

Duperry has found occasional part-time clerical and cleaning work but, she told the subcommittee, "none of these provided any insurance benefits, and I just can't afford it on my own. This has caused serious problems for my children."

Her 6-year-old has a blood disorder. Although Duperry is supposed to take him to a specialist every six months, "it has now been over six months since our last visit. I know I should take my son back to see the doctor, but I'm having a hard time just paying our rent."

Turned away

One night last November, "my 6-year-old began running a high fever. I took him to the emergency room at Bristol Hospital, but they turned us away because I did not have any insurance coverage. I wound up keeping my son home from school for a number of days and was able to break the fever myself."

"I keep on hoping that no one in my family gets really sick or has to go to the hospital. I just don't know what we would do then. It doesn't seem fair to me that my children should have to go without health care because there are no jobs available for me now."

Subcommittee Chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) shared a letter he had received from a woman in Washington State: "I make about $3 an hour. My husband is unemployed and long ago ran out of unemployment benefits. I am going to have a baby in three months and am very worried. I make enough barely to survive."

"Now I need money for doctors and hospitals which I don't have. I have been to a social welfare center, but can't get any help. Both doctors and hospitals don't want us because I have no money. I even ask to set up payments but nobody cares. I don't know what to do."

To prevent further suffering, Congress must move swiftly to enact a program which provides adequate, affordable health services to the victims of the harshest recession since the 1930s.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

These Jobs Bills Can Speed Economic Recovery

President Reagan has pronounced an end to the deepest postwar recession and denied any need for legislation to restore jobs or provide assistance to the unemployed victims of the recession. It's obvious that he hasn't listened to the 11 million Americans who are still unemployed, the 6.5 million working part-time but hunting for full-time jobs, or the nearly two million who are so discouraged they have given up their searches for employment.

The AFL-CIO is backing legislation, outlined below, which recognizes that a speedy economic recovery will depend on real programs to boost economic activity and create jobs. In addition, the federation is urging legislation to ease the hardship on the unemployed.

COMMUNITY SERVICE JOBS
H.R. 1036 (Hawkins, D-CA)

What this bill would do: H.R. 1036 would provide about 1 million jobs for long-term unemployed people in high-unemployment areas. Priority for jobs would go to those who have been unemployed for 15 weeks or more. States and local governments would not be allowed to use these funds to pay those already on the payroll; they would have to create new jobs. H.R. 1036 includes minimum wage, job safety and health, Davis-Bacon, and other labor standards.

Eligible projects include:

Child day care programs; Nutrition for the elderly and handicapped (e.g., Meals on Wheels); Public health screening and immunization; Conservation of public lands, including erosion and flood control; Repair and improvement of public facilities, including streets and roads, bridges, public buildings, mass transit, water systems, traffic control, parks and playgrounds

Legislative status: H.R. 1036 has more than 75 cosponsors; it was reported from the House Education and Labor Committee on May 5.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Ask your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 1036.

PUBLIC WORKS JOBS
H.R. 2544 (Oberstar, D-MN)

What this bill would do: H.R. 2544 is designed to accomplish two critical goals: (1) reversing the deterioration of the United States' public facilities, and (2) in the process, speeding economic recovery by creating hundreds of thousands of jobs. The bill would put Americans to work restoring highways, bridges, rail systems, urban transit facilities, ports, dams, and water and waste treatment systems.

H.R. 2544 has strict deadlines to prevent delays in hiring new workers, and it includes "Buy American" provisions to ensure that funds are not diverted to other nations. It would target funds to areas with high unemployment. And it includes strong labor protections.

Legislative status: H.R. 2544 was reported favorably from the House Public Works Committee on May 12. In the Senate, a far weaker jobs bill was approved by the Public Works Committee on May 12.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to support H.R. 2544, and urge your Senators to support strong jobs legislation along the lines of this bill and the Hawkins bill, H.R. 1036.

Senate Panel OK's Reagan's Job-Export Caribbean Bill

The Senate Finance Cmte. approved the job-exporting Reagan Caribbean Basin bill.

The AFL-CIO has endorsed an alternative bill, H.R. 2819. (See May 9 Alert!)

WHAT YOU CAN DO: The House Ways and Means Cmte. will soon act on the Reagan CBI bill. The Memorial Day recess offers a chance to ask your Representative to oppose this bill and support H.R. 2819.

Check Your Representative on Vote To Stop Mortgage Foreclosures

The House voted 216-196 to approve H.R. 1983, the AFL-CIO-endorsed bill to help unemployed homeowners avoid foreclosure when they temporarily can't meet their mortgage payments. Voting for passage were 210 Democrats and six Republicans; 155 Republicans and 41 Democrats opposed this recession relief measure.

The bill authorizes $760 million in loans to homeowners who are involuntarily unemployed, threatened with foreclosure, and considered good risks to repay the loan when economic conditions improve. The bill also provides funds for emergency shelter for those in critical need of housing.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: H.R. 1983 now goes to the Senate. Urge your Senators to support this foreclosure relief bill. Check your Representative's vote below, and if it was favorable, be sure to thank him or her next time you write.

Council warns Reagan policies hold bleak prospect for jobless

AFL-CIO news

VOL. 28, NO. 21
SATURDAY
MAY 28, 1983

Health care protection for jobless gains

A labor-sought bill to provide basic health insurance coverage for jobless workers and their families won a strong 34-8 endorsement from the House Energy & Commerce Committee.

The Reagan Administration had opposed the measure as too costly but the one-sided vote signaled substantial bipartisan support. Health care for the unemployed is one of the ingredients of the economic program advanced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the committee-approved bill sponsored by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) came closest to labor's goals of the measures under consideration.

An AFL-CIO statement welcomed the committee action and urged "early enactment" by Congress.

States to take part in the program would get federal payments of at least 50 percent of the costs if their unemployment rate was at least 6 percent, rising to 95 percent for states with 10 percent unemployment and 100 percent federal financing for states with the very highest jobless levels. States with less than 6 percent unemployment could designate high jobless areas within the state for eligibility.

Jobless workers and their dependents would be eligible for coverage if they are receiving unemployment compensation or if their benefits have run out within the past two years, if they do not have private insurance coverage available through either their former employer or a spouse's employer, and if they are not eligible for Medicare.

Premium payment

To obtain coverage, individuals would have to pay a premium equal to 2 percent of their weekly unemployment benefit, but the state has the right to raise the premium to 5 percent.

Basic benefits, which the states could add to, include up to nine days of hospital care, up to 10 outpatient visits and any visits related to pregnancy and baby care, plus laboratory and x-ray services.

As of next January, employers with 25 or more workers who offer health insurance coverage would have to allow the unemployed spouses of their employees to Report on Solidarnosc

Continuing struggle of Poland's free trade union movement to overcome government suppression is outlined for the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Jerszy Milewski, right, of Solidarnosc's Brussels office. Milewski told council, meeting at Linthicum Heights, Md., that the outlawed labor federation retains strong popular support throughout Poland.

Maximum support asked for Polish union struggle

Linthicum Heights, Md.—The AFL-CIO will continue to work through the International Labor Organization, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and other appropriate forums to draw world attention to the Polish government's ongoing violations of trade union and human rights, the Executive Council declared.

"Free trade unionists throughout the world have an obligation to extend maximum moral and material support to our brothers and sisters in Poland," the council statement said.

"Martial law and its aftermath have not narrowed but widened the gap between the Polish state and Polish society, and because of that gap the regime is incapable of addressing Poland's fundamental economic and social problems."

The council deplored the continuing financial aid given Poland's communist government by the West, including the United States.

"Even as the Jaruzelski regime sends its thugs into churches to beat Solidarnosc supporters, western bankers continue negotiating a rescheduling of Poland's debt," the council said.

Complicity of banks

"We urge the Administration once again to end the complicity of American banks in the violent repression of Polish workers by declaring Poland in default and halting the flow of credits to the Soviet bloc."

Jerszy Milewski, a spokesman for Solidarity from its Brussels, Belgium, office, brought council members up to date on the union's activities since the authorities outlawed it 17 months ago.

Milewski, who was out of Poland when martial law was declared Dec. 13, 1981, thanked the AFL-CIO for its moral and material support of Solidarity and stressed that the movement's spirit remains alive.

Despite arrests and harassment, Solidarnosc leaders in Poland continue to communicate with members of the first free trade union movement in the communist world, the council observed. May Day demonstrations in which tens of thousands of Solidarnosc supporters took to the streets in defiance of authorities were but the most dramatic manifestation of the Jaruzelski regime's failure to destroy the union's spirit, the council said.

Solidarnosc continues to reach out to the Polish people through its underground operation of Radio Solidarity, press publications, and mass leaflet distributions,

Slow upturn is bypassing unemployed

By John M. Barry

Linthicum Heights, Md.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that the prospect of high unemployment "for years to come" confronts the nation as a consequence of the Reagan Administration's economic policies.

A council statement noted some signs of an upturn, but stressed that "the 'recovery' under the most optimistic assumptions will be too slow and too fragile to provide rapid job creation."

The federation called on Congress for prompt action to ease the plight of the unemployed, create needed job opportunities and restore fairness to the tax and budget systems.

The statement on the national economy led the agenda for the Executive Council's two-day spring meeting here at the Maritime Institute of Technology and Graduate Studies. The institute was established by the Masters, Mates & Pilots through collective bargaining to meet the professional training needs of its members and contracting shipowners.

Kirkland's union

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is a member of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, which is the maritime division of the Longshoremen, and this led to the invitation to the council to meet at the institute, situated just south of Baltimore.

Capt. Robert J. Lowen, president of the MM&P, and Capt. Robert O. Elsensohn, director of the institute, extended official welcomes to the council members and led them on a tour of the training facilities, including the new ship simulator dedicated last year.

On the opening day of the meeting, the council heard a detailed report from Jerszy Milewski, a spokesman for the Polish trade union movement Solidarnosc, on the difficulties the union has faced since it was banned by the military authorities and forced to go underground.

The council adopted a statement calling for "maximum moral and material support" for Solidarnosc and its members by free trade unionists throughout the world. (Story, this page.)

Another visitor was Reubin Askew, the former governor of Florida and a candidate for the Democratic nomination for president, who presented his views on major issues and responded to the questions

Federation sticks with plans on pre-primary endorsement

Linthicum Heights, Md. — The AFL-CIO will stick with its present plans to consider endorsing a 1984 presidential candidate at a meeting of the federation's General Board next December, President Lane Kirkland announced.

Responding to questions at a news conference on the opening day of the Executive Council meeting here, Kirkland said the council had discussed the endorsement process on the basis of a report from its Committee on Political Works.

"Essentially, we reviewed our approach to the endorsement process and decided to stand with the plans that we already have," he said. The focal point of those plans is the General Board meeting in December which will decide the issue of a pre-primary endorsement.

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO continues to call on its affiliates to refrain from making separate endorsements prior to the General Board meeting.

Kirkland said the council recognized that each affiliated union is currently following its own procedures to sound out its membership and ascertain their views and preferences on the endorsement of a presidential candidate. The results of these soundings inevitably are going to be discussed at meetings of various governing bodies, he noted.

But the Executive Council "strongly recommends," Kirkland said, that affiliates "withhold any final decision on what their recommendations to the General Board will be until after the August council meeting. Then we'll take a look and discuss the matter again."

Merchant seafarers tribute

National Maritime Day at the Maritime Institute of Technology & Graduate Studies in Linthicum Heights, Md., was observed with the dedication of a memorial to merchant seafarers who served in World War II. Laying the wreath with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is Capt. Robert J. Lowen, president of the Masters, Mates & Pilots. Other participants include Capt. Robert O. Elsensohn, director of the institute, Coast Guard Capt. J. C. Carlton of the Port of Baltimore, Rep. Robin Tallon (D.S.C.) and O. James Lighthizer, chief executive of Anne Arundel Co., Md.

Housing Investment Trust gears up for initial projects

Linthicum Heights, Md. — The AFL-CIO's new Housing Investment Trust established to finance union-built, government-insured construction projects is now active and ready to carry out its investment program, the trust fund's chief executive officer reported to the Executive Council.

Commitments to certain projects will begin within the next two weeks, John Evans said.

Evans told the council the trust has secured the first $10 million required by the Securities & Exchange Commission to activate the program. The funds were put into the trust by the Operating Engineers' Central Pension Fund, the Bricklayers Pension Fund, the Sacramento (Calif.) Area Electrical Workers Pension Trust Fund, the Carpenters Local Union & Council Pension Fund, Government Employees Local 65 of Woodbridge, Va., International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 380 of Norristown, Pa., and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Activities Fund.

Evans said that a realistic goal for the trust is $500 million and that the program hopes to have 20 percent of that amount by the end of this year.

The Housing Trust was created under the laws of the District of Columbia in September 1981. Under the SEC prospectus governing its operations, however, it could not commence its investment program until it satisfied certain requirements, chief of which was raising the first $10 million.

Only labor organizations and union pension funds are eligible to invest in the trust, which has its headquarters in Washington.

Union objectives

"The Housing Trust seeks to promote important objectives of the American labor union movement by encouraging the construction of housing projects and by promoting additional and continuing employment for union members in the construction trades and related industries," the prospectus states.

"The Housing Trust proposes to achieve these union objectives by limiting its mortgage investments to union-built housing for which federally insured or guaranteed mortgage financing may be available, including housing for veterans, middle- and low-income families, and the aged."

Evans said HIT's initial emphasis will be on loans for single-family housing units. The AFL-CIO's Mortgage Investment Trust, which will continue to operate, lends the bulk of its funds for multi-family construction.

Eventually, as the program gets under way, projects will be financed in all parts of the country. Evans said that the trust fund is aiming at an investor's return of a rate "somewhere between U.S. Treasury bills and notes and corporate bonds," currently a range of approximately 10.5-12.25 percent.

Evans is the trust's financial manager. From 1968 to 1974, he headed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs.

Fund chairman

The trust's 15-member board is chaired by Floyd H. Hyde of Washington, a former Under Secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and a former director of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Union trustees include AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Carpenters President Patrick J. Campbell, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney, Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, and President Robert Georgine of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Further information about the trust is available from Evans or William Tutt, the trust's deputy financial manager, at AFL-CIO headquarters, (202) 637-5314.

Unions spotlight Polish regime's rights violations

the council pointed out. It noted that the overwhelming majority of Polish workers has refused to join the new government-controlled unions, and that even representatives of the former official unions have joined with Solidarnosc Chairman Lech Walesa in demanding repeal of the current trade union statute.

Passive resistance to the military regime is widespread, the council observed. In a strategy called the "Front of Refusal," Solidarnosc has successfully appealed to the Polish people not to take part in the regime's front organizations. Farmers, students, writers, actors, and intellectuals, along with the Roman Catholic Church, continue to show support for Solidarnosc.

Last week's arrest of one of the union's outstanding leaders, Bronislaw Geremek, who was charged with organizing illegal meetings and spreading false information, attests to the regime's insecurity and to the courage of the men and women leading Solidarnosc, the AFL-CIO said.

Council praises former members for contributions

Linthicum Heights, Md.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council expressed its gratitude and appreciation for the service of Vice Presidents John J. O'Donnell and William Konyha, who resigned from the council.

The council noted that O'Donnell resigned to accept nomination as an Assistant Secretary of Labor for legislative affairs. He served as president of the Air Line Pilots for 12 years and had been both a local and national negotiator for the pilots at Eastern Airlines.

O'Donnell represented both the pilots and the federation at functions around the world, and since 1979, had been a member of the council, serving on the international affairs, defense and community services committees.

Konyha's resignation from the council was effective at the end of the mid-winter meeting. His replacement on the council is Patrick J. Campbell, who succeeded him as president of the Carpenters when Konyha retired from that post on Jan. 1, 1983.

The council noted that Konyha had served his union for over a half-century as a local organizer, local president, general representative and first vice president before becoming the union's president in January 1980.

The statement said Konyha "provided energy, encouragement and wise counsel" which aided immeasurably the work of the council since 1980.

Faberge, Inc. slapped with new boycott

Linthicum Heights, Md.—A nationwide consumer boycott of products of Faberge, Inc. was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at the request of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

In its statement urging support of the boycott, the council condemned Faberge's efforts to destroy a long bargaining relationship with OCAW through plant shutdowns, and the "mistreatment of its workers and its runaway tactics to avoid its statutory and moral duty to negotiate in good faith with the union."

The council's action reinstitutes a boycott first begun in 1979 after Faberge ran away from its contract with over 500 OCAW members at its plant in Ridgefield, N.J., to open a new non-union plant in Raeford, N.C.

Helping members

The boycott was lifted by OCAW in July 1982 as a means of helping some 100 members of the union's Local 6-409 at the company's St. Paul, Minn., plant "re-establish decent labor-management relations."

Faberge's response, the statement stressed, was to demand that those employees yield $800,000 in wage and benefit concessions. When that demand was rejected, Faberge closed the St. Paul facility in March 1983 and moved the operations to Raeford.

Subsequently, the company offered to pay $102,000 and contractual layoff benefits to the 100 discharged workers, but only on the condition that OCAW, the AFL-CIO, or any other union would not boycott Faberge.

The members of Local 6-409 "decisively rejected this insulting proposal and OCAW has reinstituted its boycott," the council reported.

Faberge products being boycotted are sold under these brand names: Aphrodisia, Aqua Net hair spray, Babe, Brut, Cavale, Ceramic Nail Glaze, Flambeau, Great Skin, Grande Finale, Just Wonderful, Macho, Kiku, Partage, Tip Top accessories, Tigress, Woodhue, Xanadu, Zizanie de Fragonard, Caryl Richards, Farrah Fawcett and Faberge Organics.

Brooklyn Bridge called monument to workers

Linthicum Heights, Md.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council saluted the 100th anniversary of the opening of the Brooklyn Bridge during its meeting here on May 24.

The council called the bridge a monument to the skill, ingenuity and craftsmanship of American workers.

The council noted in a statement that the historic achievement of building this national landmark could not have been possible without union craftsmen.

of council members. Askew's visit was part of the council's effort to meet with as many prospective candidates as possible before the AFL-CIO reaches a decision on whether to make a pre-primary endorsement in the 1984 presidential campaign.

The council reviewed its approach to the endorsement process and determined to maintain its present course pointing to a meeting of the federation's General Board in December where the question will be decided. (Story, Page 1.)

In other business, the council accepted the resignation of Vice President John J. O'Donnell to take the post of Assistant Secretary of Labor and hailed his service to the federation and the Air Line Pilots. The council also took note of the retirement of Vice President William Konyha following the February meeting and welcomed his successor, Patrick J. Campbell, both as a council member and as president of the Carpenters. (Story, Page 2.)

Other actions

Other statements dealt with programs to tap the talents and energy of retired union members, the observance of Flag Day, the 100th anniversary of the Brooklyn Bridge, the reinstitution of a consumer boycott against the products of Faberge, Inc., and the designation of the Liberty Glass Co. of Sapulpa, Okla., as unfair.

The council voted approval of three mergers: The Granite Cutters into the Tile, Marble & Terrazzo Finishers & Shopmen; the Hat, Cap & Millinery Workers into the Clothing & Textile Workers, and the Graphic Arts International Union with the Printing & Graphic Communications Union to form the Graphic Communications International Union, effective July 1, subject to a membership referendum now in progress.

The statement on economic policy cited Administration projections that unemployment—currently at 10.2 percent—will hover around 10 percent for the rest of the year, 9 percent in 1984 and will still be more than 8 percent in 1985.

High rate persists

At his news conference on the opening day of the meeting, Kirkland stressed that this would leave the jobless rate higher than at any postwar time except for the depths of the 1975 recession.

"And if that's the best we're going to do in the full bloom of a recovery," he observed, "then we have a major and deeply troubling prospect ahead of us . . . a generation of working people who will not expect to find employment at any level approaching their capacities, plus the prospect facing young people entering a labor market that is as bleak as it's ever been since the Depression."

The council reviewed and reaffirmed the economic program it set forth at its February meeting calling for measures to provide jobs for the unemployed and greater fairness in federal tax and budget policies.

Program elements

The program includes needed public service jobs, accelerated public works, expanded housing programs, broader job training and placement for youths, greater assistance for displaced workers, continuation of extended unemployment insurance, mortgage foreclosure relief and health care protection for the unemployed.

The council called on Congress to reject any further budget cuts proposed by the Administration for non-defense programs and to remove "unreasonable barriers" that prevent "millions of jobless workers and their families from receiving assistance vital to meeting minimal family needs."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland fields reporters' questions.

To pay for these programs and reduce federal deficits in future years, the federation said Congress should set a $700 cap on the individual tax cut scheduled for fiscal 1983, repeal the future indexing of tax rates, and close loopholes of particular benefit to wealthy persons and corporations.

The statement noted that the AFL-CIO has called for limiting the real growth in defense spending to a range well below the Reagan Administration's proposals and for a progressive surtax on income to pay for that growth.

The council stressed that interest rates must be brought down much further, that trade policies must aim for fairness and the maintenance of "a viable and diverse U.S. economy," and that the government must adopt a national industrial program that will involve business and labor in the revitalization of the nation's basic industries.

"Some of the AFL-CIO proposals are now progressing through the Congress," the council statement noted. "We believe that policies which alleviate the suffering of the unemployed, offer job opportunities for the jobless and restore fairness to the tax and budget systems must be the highest priority for this Congress and the nation. We urge the Congress to get on with the task."

A series of background papers on various aspects of the AFL-CIO economic program accompanied the statement.

Delegation to Israel

Kirkland reported on the recent visit to Israel of an AFL-CIO delegation which he led and on the recent meeting of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development in advance of the economic summit meeting at Williamsburg, Va.

Vice President Thomas W. Gleason gave an account of the general board meeting of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the visit of a federation delegation to Cairo for the dedication of a workers' university under the sponsorship of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation.

Interim reports of council committees were presented by Vice President Douglas A. Fraser on retired union members, Lloyd McBride on the U.S. Labor Dept. and J. C. Turner on regressive legislation.

A new film promoting Solidarity Day III next Labor Day as an occasion for rallies and demonstrations in every state was presented, along with a report on other plans for the events, by Kenneth Young, executive assistant to Kirkland, and Charles McDonald, assistant director of organization and field services, who is Solidarity Day III coordinator.

New TV series

The council also viewed the first program of a new AFL-CIO television series, "America Works," developed by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs. LIPA Director Larry Kirkman and Associate Director Nick DeMartino described the production of the series and its promotion among broadcast outlets and advertisers.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue reported on the state of the federation's finances, and the council approved budgets for the coming year of $1,512,000 for the George Meany Center for Labor Studies and $80,000 for the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, both representing reductions from the budgets for the current year. Supplemental allocations of funds were approved for the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Coalition of Labor Union Women.

Contributions were voted to the Citizens/Labor Energy Coalition, the Industry-Labor Council of the National Center for the Handicapped, the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness, Economic Education for the Clergy, and the 20th Anniversary March on Washington.

The next meeting of the Executive Council will be held in Boston, Aug. 8-10, 1983.

Endorsement timetable reaffirmed

A resolution calling the meeting of the General Board and setting a date and place will be drafted for the federation's convention next October. Under the AFL-CIO Constitution, the board consists of members of the Executive Council plus the principal executive officers of national and international union affiliates. For purposes of the endorsement meeting next December, the council has voted to expand the General Board to include the chief officers of state and local central labor bodies, each of whom will have a single vote.

Voting by affiliated unions will be weighted according to membership per capita payments to the AFL-CIO, and Kirkland will cast the votes of Directly Affiliated Local Unions on the same weighted basis.

Two-thirds vote

A two-thirds vote will be required for an endorsement in keeping with the rule that applies to all COPE endorsements.

Kirkland reported that the council had also considered the question of "cattle shows and straw votes" being taken at various state party conventions and conferences and had decided to deal with them on a case-by-case basis.

He cited the success of labor's position at the Massachusetts Democratic convention, where the State AFL-CIO urged union members among the delegates to coalesce behind the issue of jobs in the straw poll for candidates. Kirkland observed that the result demonstrated "strong support for unity of action and solidarity" while underscoring "the primacy of the issue of unemployment and jobs in the minds of our members."

Wisconsin poll

As for the upcoming Wisconsin Democratic convention, Kirkland said AFL-CIO affiliates will be urged to suggest to members among the delegates that they vote their own preference without any instructions or influence by their unions.

A visitor to the council meeting was former Florida governor Reubin Askew, a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, who presented his case and responded to questions from council members. Askew was the fifth presidential prospect to meet with the council. Earlier discussions were held with Senators John Glenn (Ohio) and Gary Hart (Colo.) last August and with Senators Alan Cranston (Calif.) and Ernest Hollings (S.C.) in February.

At his news conference, Kirkland rejected various published suggestions that labor's support might be detrimental to a candidate.

"What I'm puzzled by," Kirkland said, "is that, as nearly as I can make out, they would exclude from any role in the attention of candidates such elements of our society as working people, women, minorities and youth, which they elect to identify as special interests. Now, if you extract those groups from the voting public and then extract all others that happen to be Republican, that leaves rather small element of our society which is supposedly, I guess, to run the country."

Kirkland noted that former President Jimmy Carter, in addressing the AFL-CIO General Board on Sept. 4, 1980, had this to say about the value of labor's endorsement:

"I can tell you without any fear of being contradicted that we would not have been elected without your endorsement and your support in 1976, and we know it. We will always be grateful. But I looked on that endorsement and that support not as a gift but as an obligation on my part to be a good President for the working people of this country."

Broad concerns

Far from being a special interest group, "the trade union movement represents the interests of working people in all aspects of our life in this country and abroad," Kirkland declared, underscoring his remarks with another quotation from President Carter at the 1980 General Board meeting:

"The AFL-CIO has helped lead this country through a half-century of unprecedented social and economic progress. Every advance in this half-century—social security, civil rights, Medicare, aid to education, one after another—came with the support and the leadership, not just the support but the leadership, of American labor. You have represented all the people, not just your own members."

Liberty Glass Co. placed on unfair list

Linthicum Heights, Md. — The AFL-CIO Executive Council placed Liberty Glass Co. of Sapulpa, Okla., on the federation's unfair list, and expressed support for locked-out members of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers attempting to gain a contract.

The council acted at the request of the union whose 350 members were escorted out of the plant by the company's security force just two hours before the three-year contract was to expire on April 1. The company has been advertising nationally for strikebreakers, the council said.

In condemning the company's attempt to end a 45-year bargaining relationship with its employees, the council urged the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and the labor press to publicize its anti-union activities.

The company's out-of-state security force "harasses locked-out workers by videotaping their movements recording auto tag numbers and using other techniques of intimidation," the council charged.

Trade ruling hit as free ride for subsidized shoe imports

The International Trade Commission's decision to revoke the long-standing countervailing duties on shoes imported from Brazil, Spain and India drew a sharp rebuke from labor and management leaders who said they were baffled by the actions.

The ITC voted on May 10 by 2-1 to lift the countervailing duties against Brazil and Spain and by 3-0 to remove the duties against India.

Presidents of the Food & Commercial Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers, both of which represent workers in shoe manufacturing, rebuked the commission's actions.

'Unconscionable' action

UFCW President William H. Wynn charged, "This is yet another blow to the battered shoe industry. The ITC decision is simply unconscionable in the face of the current dismal situation" in the industry.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley added, "Since termination of import relief by President Reagan on June 30, 1981, the U.S. shoe market has been flooded by imports, and import penetration has risen to record levels well in excess of 60 percent. Job losses have been staggering and unemployment levels are massive. This wholly negative determination by the ITC at this time is mind boggling." He promised that the unions will review the commission's report when it is released and examine the "courses of action to be taken to save this industry from virtual elimination."

Under U.S. trade law, countervailing duties can be levied to compensate for the amount the manufacturer of a product is subsidized by the government of the exporting nation.

The ITC held that the subsidies the three countries provide for their non-rubber footwear industries are not causing or threatening "material" injury to the U.S. footwear industry.

Overall imports of shoes into the U.S. jumped from 375 million pairs in 1981 to 480 million in 1982 and reached 160 million in the first quarter of 1983.

At the same time, the average number of workers in the U.S. footwear industry fell from 142,000 in 1981 to 128,000 in 1982, a 10 percent decline, while footwear industry unemployment jumped from 12.5 to 19.4 percent last year. Since 1968, employment in the industry in America has been cut in half and some 400 factories have been forced to close permanently.

The Commerce Dept. found subsidies of nearly 20 percent on Brazilian footwear, 15 percent on Indian and 2.5 percent on Spanish footwear. Spain and Brazil are among the top six foreign footwear suppliers to the United States, last year shipping a combined 64 million pairs.

Market penetration was 47 percent in 1977 when, under the Carter Administration, the industry won import protections against Korea and Taiwan. The Reagan Administration in 1981 rejected the unanimous ITC recommendation to continue trade restraints on Taiwan, the top foreign supplier. Since the restrictions were lifted, shipments from Korea have more than doubled to 90 million pairs and those from Taiwan are up 55 percent to 183 million

Imports cost jobs

UFCW's Samuel Delfino, director of the manufacturing division, said, "The termination of import relief for this industry in 1981 has clearly led to excesses in imports to the detriment of our workers. This week's ITC decision will compound these problems. We expect Brazil, Spain and India to continue and possibly increase subsidies to their shoe industries."

ACTWU Vice President Angelo Georgian, director of the shoe division, charged that "shoe workers have been let down by our government once again. Despite the fact our workers are the most productive in the world, it is difficult for even the most efficient industry to compete against products that benefit from foreign government subsidies."

'Their turn to give'

UAW's Bieber sends message to industry

Dallas—Companies that owe their survival to contract concessions by the Auto Workers were put on notice at the UAW convention that "it's their turn to do some giving" after they return to profitability.

"We have given all we are going to give," UAW President Owen Bieber assured 2,500 convention delegates who broke into his inaugural address repeatedly with applause and standing ovations.

Bieber, elected by acclamation to succeed Douglas A. Fraser at the helm of the 1.1 million member union, pledged to continue the UAW in the progressive path shaped by his predecessors.

He called for "new approaches to organizing" to build the union's membership and warned against the false economy of retrenching on union education programs or neglecting improved means of communicating with union members.

"In the short term, we must continue to halt the hemorrhaging of our jobs," Bieber said. But the long-term fight is "for an economic system in which work is a right, not a privilege."

Over the past three years, Bieber noted, the UAW has shrunk in membership because of the wave of layoffs and plant closings in the industries where its members work. And at the bargaining table, "we found ourselves dividing up scarcity rather than sharing prosperity."

But there has been no decline in the UAW's resourcefulness or commitment, he stressed. "Adversity has made us tougher as a union."

Political action

In the political arena, "we've got to turn Ronald Reagan out of office if he runs again because he's redistributing money from working people and the poor to the very rich," Bieber said. "We've got to retake the Senate and that means going out now and beginning the work at the grass roots."

Elements of key resolutions adopted by the convention were incorporated into a "UAW Blueprint for a Working America."

Bieber and Fraser presented highlights of the proposal and answered questions from reporters on a televised news conference beamed from Dallas to 11 cities with heavy concentrations of UAW members. Questions came from reporters covering the convention and were phoned in by the news media in the targeted cities.

The thrust of the UAW proposal is "rational planning" by government, industry and labor to achieve full employment and strengthen the nation's industrial base while developing new industries to meet future needs.

In convention action, delegates approved a constitutional change affecting the dues formula and the UAW strike fund.

In the past, 30 percent of dues has been earmarked for the UAW strike fund, which totaled $516 million before the convention.

Starting in July and running through June 1984, the strike fund contribution will drop to 15 percent. Ten percent of dues will be rebated to the locals and the remaining 5 percent will go to the UAW's operating expenses. The full 30 percent figure will be reinstated next July until after the 1984 round of major bargaining is completed. Thereafter, the reduced rate formula will go into effect when the strike fund reaches $550 million and the full payment will be reinstated when it drops below $500 million.

Strike benefits

Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus announced during the debate the executive board's intent to raise the basic strike benefit from $65 to $85 a week, effective for current strikes.

The convention approved salary increases for UAW officers that had been voted three years ago but never put into effect because of wage freezes under UAW contracts. It brings the salary of the UAW president to $74,894; $67,252 for the secretary-treasurer, and $56,625 for vice presidents, plus quarterly cost-of-living increases.

Bieber announced changes in areas of responsibilities for a number of union officers.

Vice President Donald F. Ephlin, who has headed the UAW's Ford Dept. will replace Bieber as the union's top negotiator with General Motors. Vice President Stephen P. Yokich will be in charge of the Ford Dept. and also be responsible for the union's organizing operations. The newcomer among the vice presidents, Bill Casstevens, will be in charge of dealings with agricultural implement firms, Mack Trucks and Volkswagen. Vice President Odessa Komer will take over the UAW's independent parts and suppliers department. And Vice President Mark Stepp, who heads the Chrysler Dept. will also supervise the technical, office and professional department covering white-collar membership.

Walesa honored

Dallas—Lech Walesa, who founded and inspired Poland's Solidarity trade union federation, was honored with the UAW's Social Justice Award at the union's convention here.

"Behind Lech Walesa stand 10 million workers and all of Polish Society," Douglas Fraser said on behalf of the UAW. An exiled Solidarity leader, Mirek Chojecki, accepted the award for Walesa. But Walesa, who has been denied travel rights by Poland's rules, sent a message to the convention thanking the UAW for treating the struggle of Polish workers "as a universal issue relevant to the entire democratic trade union movement around the world."

Short course offered on computer basics

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies is offering an introductory course to computers June 14.

Participants will hear about the development of computers, about hardware and software and will be introduced to the principles of programming.

Instructors for the one-day seminar—Computer Literacy for Unionists—will be Dianne Martin and Rachelle Heller who teach the subject at the University of Maryland and the Smithsonian Institution.

The course is open to any member or staff member of an AFL-CIO affiliate. The cost is $15.

Broader role for retirees pressed

Linthicum Heights, Md.—Greater organization of retired workers, particularly union retirees, can make a significant contribution to the achievement of labor's goals, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

"Retired union members are a great national resource," the council observed in a statement. "Organized labor must make the fullest use of their wisdom, talents, and skills."

Many retired union members already are deeply involved in legislative and political programs, and have made a valuable contribution to labor's political and legislative efforts through aggressive campaigns of letters, telegrams, and participation in demonstrations, the council noted.

It said much credit should go to the National Council of Senior Citizens and Concerned Seniors for Better Government, which have worked closely with organized labor in behalf of programs of benefit to the elderly and to all Americans.

A major objective of the AFL-CIO has been to encourage its affiliates and state and local central bodies to keep in touch with retired members through senior citizen clubs that are organized with union backing, the council noted.

Many affiliates recognize that amendments to their constitutions are required to implement effective programs that will maintain a continuing relationship with their retired members. Often, these same unions find themselves unable to undertake desired programs until a scheduled convention makes appropriate action possible.

While the policy with respect to their retirees is a matter for each union to determine, the council said, it urged national and international unions to work with the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Ad Hoc Committee on Retirees, and to:

- Establish retired members' clubs and affiliate them with the National Council of Senior Citizens.
- Encourage cooperation with the activities of Concerned Seniors for Better Government.
- Designate at least one person, preferably on a full-time basis, to work on retiree activities.
- Support national, state, and local programs providing opportunities for retirees to engage in creative services to the community and nation and for political education and participation.

The council urged affiliates to take required action to facilitate achievement of these objectives.

Women bearing brunt of Reagan's budget cuts

Los Angeles—President Reagan's economic policies are unfair to women—especially the elderly and the minorities, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller told the Women in the Work Force Conference here.

"Mothers and their children, young girls, working women, those seeking jobs, and women in their senior years should not be expected to bear the burden of the Administration's plan for the nation's economic recovery," Miller stressed.

But the message that emerges from the Reagan budget "is clear and disturbing," she warned.

In keynoting the three-day conference sponsored by the California AFL-CIO and the Coalition of Labor Union Women, Miller charged more cuts are in store for maternal and child health and nutrition programs and in Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC).

The Administration is also pushing a subminimum wage for youth and work fare schemes involving dead-end minimum wage jobs with no skill training provisions, she stressed.

"If enacted, the 1984 Reagan budget will have a devastating effect on women at every stage of their lives. The gender gap, documented by the pollsters, exists because federal policies like these are cementing it," she said.

Miller, who is also a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and president of CLUW, cited grim statistics showing:

- The jobless rate for female teenagers is more than double that for males.
- Between April and June 1982, women, who make up 29 percent of the federal workforce, suffered 46 percent of all federal job cuts.
- The median income for older women in 1981 was only $4,757, about 58 percent of older men's income of $8,179. Seventy-two percent of the elderly poor are women.

Reagan message

The bottom line is that "the Reagan budget is unfair to women," she stressed.

California AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning stressed that union women in that state are assuming more leadership positions, pointing out that 12 women now serve either as presidents or secretary-treasurers of the state's 26 central labor councils.

Henning noted achievements in women's rights made in California, including extension of full unemployment disability insurance benefits to women workers under California's unemployment disability insurance program and enactment of the first pay equity legislation in the nation.

He reported that the state federation had obtained promises from all 28 Democrats and one Republican in the California congressional delegation to support passage of a new Equal Rights Amendment.

Murray Seeger, AFL-CIO information director, told the conference that organized labor's media problems can be divided into two sectors: bias or outright animosity toward organized labor, and ignorance, both in knowing little about organized labor and ignoring labor's presence.

While bias must be fought at every turn, Seeger said, the bigger problem for organized labor is ignorance in the media.

He noted that with the creation of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO itself "is now well on the way to improving its skills and adding to its resources for better communications," through the use of television as well as its traditional information and education programs.

Rights champion

The conference included a presentation of a dramatization of the life of Susan B. Anthony, the 19th century fighter for women's right to vote.

The conference also featured a series of workshops on developing leadership skills, organizing, pay equity, the CLUW Empowerment Project, arbitration, communications skills, lobbying for legislative objectives, and a panel discussion on technological change and its impact on women workers.

Speakers included Ellen Wernick, director of the CLUW Center for Education & Research, who outlined the coalition's leadership training program for trade union women.

Randolph Institute speakers urge stronger rights alliance

Philadelphia—Delegates to the A. Philip Randolph Institute's 14th national conference were urged to strengthen their organization and solidify the links between blacks and labor unions.

"The labor-black alliance must be at the center of any strategy for black progress," Institute President Norman Hill told over 800 black trade unionists and community leaders at the three-day meeting here.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, said the election of Chicago Mayor Harold Washington "was a test of our relationship with labor's traditional coalition allies, and I think we all passed that test."

The Chicago election also stimulated serious discussion of a black presidential candidacy, Young noted. But he cautioned that "if there is to be a black candidate, let it be a candidate in the Democratic primaries, not the candidate of a third party."

Third parties

"A black party makes no more sense than a labor party," he said. "Either would be destructive, by driving the Democratic candidate more to the center—to show voters a clear distinction—and by depriving a serious Democratic contender of the ballots needed to defeat a Reagan."

Also addressing the conference were Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.); Philadelphia's Democratic mayoral candidate, Wilson Goode; Rep. William Gray (D-Pa.), a leader of the Congressional Black Caucus; APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin; Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Dr. Bernard Anderson, director of social sciences for the Rockefeller Foundation.

Guest speakers

Other speakers and leaders of workshops were AFL-CIO Information Director Murray Seeger, AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Frederick O'Neal and Barbara Hutchinson, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard, Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO President Julius Uehlein, Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch, and Service Employees Civil Rights Director Velma Hill.

APRI's Hill reminded delegates that this year marks the 20th anniversary of the historic March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom organized by Rustin and A. Philip Randolph.

"In the 20 years since the march, blacks have won the right of access to jobs," he said. "Yet access alone is not enough. For blacks to fully participate in our nation's life they must participate fully in its economic life."

The emotional high point of the conference came on the final day, when Andrew Zulu, vice president of the Federation of South African Trade Unions, and Norman Middleton, an organizer for the Confederation of Unions of South Africa, addressed the conference.

The two black trade unionists detailed the struggle to organize South Africa's black workers and spoke of continuing efforts to eliminate racial segregation and create democratic majority rule in that country.

Another highlight of the conference was presentation of the 1983 A. Philip Randolph Freedom Award to black opera singer Marian Anderson for her contributions to the cause of civil rights and social justice.

Achievement award

The institute's Achievement Award went to William Burrus, executive vice president of the Postal Workers, for his contributions to the cause of trade unionism and civil rights in the tradition of A. Philip Randolph.

APRI's Special Recognition Award was presented to William Bowe, treasurer of the New York City AFL-CIO, and a longtime leader of the Sleeping Car Porters.

The A. Philip Randolph Institute is a national organization of black trade unionists, which conducts voter registration drives, voter education programs, a trade union intern program, and grass roots legislative lobbying efforts.

Unionists urged to join in national Flag Day pledge

Linthicum Heights, Md. — All union members have been urged to "pause for the pledge" and join in the national observance of Flag Day, June 14.

The federation's Executive Council noted in a statement that local observances will be held nationwide that coincide with ceremonies held at Fort McHenry in Baltimore harbor, where Francis Scott Key was inspired to write the Star Spangled Banner during the War of 1812. The pause for the pledge to the flag is timed for 7 p.m. (EDT).

The AFL-CIO will be represented at the Fort McHenry ceremonies "as befits the national pride and patriotism of American workers and their unions."

The council statement pointed out that union members "traditionally open their meetings with the Pledge of Allegiance" because workers know "how great a treasure we have in this democracy in which the right to assemble freely and to organize in pursuit of common goals makes our free trade unions possible."

Arizona state fed broadens ranks to retirees, auxiliaries

Tucson, Ariz.—Delegates to the Arizona AFL-CIO convention shaped plans for a Solidarity Day III march in Tucson on Labor Day, and amended the federation's constitution to admit auxiliaries and union retiree groups as voting affiliates.

Keynoting the three-day session, Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock declared that the Solidarity Day I march in Tucson, which coincided with the massive 1981 demonstration on the National Mall in Washington, "was the spark that ignited the campaign" that sent Jim McNulty (D) to Congress to represent the people of the new 5th District. Aycock predicted that Solidarity Day III, with marches, demonstrations and other events in every state, "will prelude the election of a new and more effective and compassionate national administration and Congress in 1984."

Larry Spitz, president of the Union Clubs of Arizona, told the nearly 300 delegates that the union retiree organizations look forward to affiliation with the state federation and "direct participation with the labor movement on major issues and campaigns throughout the state."

Delegates unanimously approved a strong economic resolution that called on Congress and the President to "resurrect the Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act of 1978 from its present burial ground," and to "vigorously and without delay implement" its words and intent.

The resolution stressed the importance of a united labor campaign for full employment, noting that "organized labor is the only force in this country capable of now ensuring that the Humphrey-Hawkins program is carried out.

President Pete McGhee, Aycock, three vice presidents and 10 executive board members were elected to two-year terms without opposition.

Convention speakers included Rep. McNulty, President Albin J. Gruhn of the California AFL-CIO; State COPE Director David Gregory; AFL-CIO Region VI Assistant Director Ed Collins; Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; HRDI Field Representative Kenneth DeBey; Laborers Vice President Mason Warren; Grace Carroll, coordinator of the Rocky Mountain Labor School, and Stephanie Kamieniecka of Solidarnosc.

Lane Kirkland named to broadcast board

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has been named to the Board for International Broadcasting, an independent federal agency that supervises the operations of Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe.

Kirkland's nomination was announced by President Reagan.

The agency, with headquarters in Washington, was created by Congress in 1973. Radio Liberty broadcasts transmissions to the Soviet Union while Radio Free Europe beams programs to Eastern Europe.

Minnesota message

Billboards in Minnesota spell out the message that U.S. jobs depend on consumers buying American-made products. It's all a part of the consumer education campaign sponsored by the State AFL-CIO, local central labor councils, and participating union employers. One hundred of the billboards are spotted in key locations across the state, including 30 in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area. Gov. Rudy Perpich declared May as the "Buy American" month for the state.

Stronger federal role pressed to aid vocational education

The AFL-CIO and a panel of union witnesses urged Congress to strengthen the federal commitment to vocational education and to reject an Administration proposal to substitute block grants that states could use for other purposes.

An AFL-CIO statement, submitted to a House Education & Labor subcommittee, stressed the American labor movement's close involvement with school vocational programs from its origins.

The educational function of the program should not be neglected, the AFL-CIO urged. High school students should continue their core academic subjects while receiving skill training, the AFL-CIO urged. "Vocational education should be held to the highest possible standards in both the practical and academic education offered to their students," the statement emphasized.

The AFL-CIO opposed consolidation of the program with adult basic education designed to improve functional literacy and urged federal support for measures to assure minority and inner-city youngsters equal access to quality vocational education institutions.

It urged the importance of broadly representative state and local vocational advisory councils that include labor representatives. Organized labor's input can prevent "overtraining for a few popular programs where there is already an oversupply of workers, while at the same time encouraging the development of programs where there is likely to be a need" for workers, the statement noted.

Issue of interpretation

The AFL-CIO protested the Reagan Administration's interpretation of the requirement under existing law that the National Advisory Council on Vocational Education shall include persons who are "representative of labor and management." There has been no appointment from labor ranks to the council, the federation said, and the council's staff "interprets the law to mean either a labor or management representative."

It urged Congress to make clear that the council should include knowledgeable persons from "both organized labor and management." The subcommittee heard testimony from:

- Reese Hammond, education and training director of the Operating Engineers, who stressed the importance of performance standards to assure quality education.

Candidates for apprenticeship coming out of vocational schools, Hammond urged, should be able to read technical manuals; have a basic understanding of trade mathematics; be able to "reason out" a problem and have had the benefit of education for public service and education for life, as well as for work.

- Paul Cole, vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, who said federal investment in vocational education "will more than repay its costs."

Training in vocational skills is just "one component in a comprehensive vocational education curriculum," he said. Most graduates of such a program will change jobs several times in their working lives, he noted. "Thus, they need generalized vocational and academic skills that will allow them to make the transition from one job to another successfully."

- James E. Tinkcom, technical director in the Apprenticeship & Training Dept. of the Carpenters, said a function of vocational education should be to give young people an introduction to a broad range of possible trades and skills.

Bipartisan plan

Congress unfreezes funds for MX missile

Both the House and Senate approved a resolution, supported by the AFL-CIO, that will allow funds appropriated last year to be used to develop engineering plans for the basing of the MX missile and for flight tests.

Congress last December voted to hold up the $625 million funding for the program until the President proposed a new basing plan for the MX and both the House and Senate agreed to a resolution making the funds available.

The House adopted the resolution by a 239-186 vote and the Senate followed through the next day with a 59-39 vote.

Approval followed President Reagan's endorsement of the recommendations of a bipartisan commission chaired by retired Air Force Gen. Brent Scowcroft. The panel had proposed as an immediate step deployment of 100 MX missiles, each armed with 10 warheads, in restructured Minuteman silos. At the same time, development would be begun on smaller single-warhead missiles while efforts are intensified for arms control agreements.

In a letter to both House and Senate members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the Scowcroft Commission proposals are consistent with the findings of the AFL-CIO Defense Committee in its report to the federation's Executive Council earlier this year.

He said the AFL-CIO backs development and deployment of the MX in the context of the Scowcroft Commission report and urged Congress to support the report in its entirety.

Defense budget

Still ahead, however, is House action on the Defense Dept. authorization bill for fiscal 1984, which would provide funds for the actual procurement of the MX missile. That bill is expected to come to the House floor in early June.

In other congressional developments, a House-Senate conference committee began the search for a consensus on a budget resolution setting overall spending ceilings and revenue targets for the fiscal year starting on Oct. 1, 1983.

The House has passed a labor-endorsed budget resolution that would provide substantially more funding for domestic programs than Reagan had proposed while canceling scheduled tax cuts or closing loopholes to bring the projected deficit substantially under the President's figure.

With the President insisting he would veto any tax increase or spending bill he considered excessive, the Senate first failed to get a majority for any of three proposed budgets.

It finally adopted, by a 50-49 vote, a version shaped by a group of Republican moderates that comes closer to the Democratic House version than the President wanted. Both measures would hold he increase in defense spending below the after-inflation 10 percent rise sought by Reagan. The House version would cut the real increase to 4 percent and the Senate resolution would hold it to 6 percent.

Veto possibility

With the Senate splintered on the issue, the conference committee faces a more difficult task than usual. Reagan can't veto a congressional budget, but he can veto appropriations or tax bills enacted to carry out its provisions. In other action:

- Labor's campaign for a domestic auto content bill got a boost from a House Energy & Commerce subcommittee which approved H.R. 1234, moving it up to the full committee agenda.
- The Senate Finance Committee approved, 11-7, a labor-opposed Administration bill to provide tax credits for parents who send their children to private elementary and secondary schools. It faces a possible filibuster on the Senate floor.
- The AFL-CIO wrote House members urging support for an alternative to the Administration's Caribbean Basin Initiative. The labor-backed bill by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and other co-sponsors would set tight standards to assure that benefits go to the people of the Caribbean region and not to job-destroying multinational corporations.

labor studies

Organizing techniques and the use of computers in union administration will be the principal topics for study at the George Meany Center during June. The schedule:

Union Computer Users, June 15 — A session for union officers to exchange experiences, costs and needs on methods to cut costs and provide specialized programming. By invitation.

Computers for Local Unions, June 26-July 1 — A one-week institute with hands-on demonstrations for union leaders who are thinking of buying a computer to keep membership records, financial accounts and other data.

Organizing Techniques I, June 26-July 1 — A basic course in organizing, covering plant section, in-house committees, house calls, winning issues and countering employer hostility.

Seven AFL-CIO unions will use the Silver Spring campus during June for staff training: District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, June 1-3; Food & Commercial Workers, June 6-8; State, County & Municipal Employees, June 8-10; Carpenters, June 12-17; Air Line Pilots, June 19-21; Boilermakers, June 26-July 3, and Teachers, June 26-July 1.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will have two groups on campus during the month: 24 union leaders from Bermuda, June 4-11, and 40 Spanish-speaking trade unionists from Latin America, June 19-July 22.

The center's July offerings will feature a class on Corporate Research for affiliates of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Dept. and an institute on Arbitration Techniques.

Additional information about these and other courses is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Clothing Workers improve security in new Xerox pact

Webster, N.Y.—Unionized production workers at Xerox Corp.'s manufacturing plant here ratified a new three-year agreement that exchanges concessions to management for greater job security.

Approved after two contract extensions, the pact covers some 3,100 members of the Clothing & Textile Workers. ACTWU was the predominant industrial union in the Rochester, N.Y., area when the plant began operating in the 1930s and won representation rights at that time. The Webster plant is Xerox's largest manufacturing facility.

The new contract calls for a freeze on pay and cost-of-living adjustments the first year of the agreement. In addition, it provides for work rule changes, a strict absenteeism plan, greater employee contributions to health care coverage, and the elimination of six personal paid holidays.

Other provisions include guaranteed employment for all workers for the life of the contract and an increase from $45,000 to $50,000 in life insurance coverage.

The company said reductions in labor costs, cost containment, and productivity improvements were needed because it had been "hit very hard by competition from Japan."

Under the pact, hourly pay of $11.80 will be frozen in the first year. Pay will rise by 1 percent in the second year and by 2 percent in the third year of the agreement. A cost-of-living provision calling for one cent for each three-tenths of a point rise in the federal consumer price index will be suspended for one year.

The health insurance plan under the old contract provided 100 percent of hospital and surgical coverage and 80 percent of other services with a $100 deductible—$200 for families. Under the new agreement, the deductible will be 1 percent of pay, and workers will pay 20 percent for all services up to 4 percent of pay.

Government for the people

THE ACHIEVEMENTS of the Tennessee Valley Authority are a symbol of what responsible government can accomplish.

No investment, public or private, has brought richer returns for so many Americans.

TVA provided jobs for thousands of people made desperate by the Depression.

It provided low-cost power and transportation, fertilizer and new crops for farmers. It brought social and economic progress.

How do you calculate the cost benefit of the diminished risk of flood, the decline of once-rampant malaria, the proliferation of recreational facilities and schools?

Earlier this year, we celebrated another 50th anniversary—that of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's first inaugural address.

In that address, Roosevelt declared, "Our greatest primary task is to put people to work. This is no unsolvable problem if we face it wisely and courageously. It can be accomplished in part by direct recruiting by the government itself, treating the task as we would treat the emergency of war, but at the same time, through this employment accomplishing greatly needed projects to stimulate and reorganize the use of our natural resources."

The activist government of Franklin Roosevelt was viewed with suspicion and distrust by business leaders and politicians. Then, as now, there was fierce opposition to the idea of government acting in the interests of all citizens.

Yet we continue to live off the capital created by those New Deal programs.

Franklin Roosevelt believed that the federal government had a higher duty than to sit on its hands, issue cheerful forecasts, and keep count of the unemployment and foreclosure rates.

The New Dealers embraced the right of free association that enabled workers to organize and negotiate with their employers.

They curbed exploiters of child labor, and established the minimum wage and unemployment insurance.

During this period, the federal government developed the substructure of our economy: the roads, the highways, the market facilities. Our land was reforested and restored. The Public Health Service made the elimination of disease a national priority.

OUR NATION'S needs are no less urgent now than 50 years ago. They cannot be addressed constructively by a government that believes and argues that government itself is the natural enemy of the people.

We in organized labor do not agree with that proposition. We think government should be the people's partner in progress.

We think that TVA is proof that the federal government can play that role, and meet its constitutional responsibility to promote the general welfare.

We have therefore put before the government wide-ranging proposals aimed, in the short run, at putting America back to work.

We have urged the creation of a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board—including representatives of labor, business, and government—which would develop a balanced program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities, while at the same time encouraging the development of new industries with promise for the future.

We have urged creation of a financing agency, patterned after the Reconstruction Finance Corp. of the 1930s and 1940s, which would be authorized to make and guarantee loans to finance approved reindustrialization ventures.

That is the kind of approach to the realities of modern life and to the responsibilities of representative government that made TVA a reality.

That is the kind of action that Americans must demand of their government once again.

In a democracy of, by and for the people, government—not on our backs but at our side—has an inescapable responsibility to channel our vast unemployed human resources into the rebuilding of America.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the TVA 50th anniversary observance, Knoxville, Tenn., May 18, 1983.

Blame shifted to victims of job-connected diseases

By Press Associates, Inc.

Readers of the labor press are all too familiar with the subversion of occupational health and safety protections under the Reagan Administration. Many workers know first-hand.

What may be less obvious is an escalating propaganda offensive by industry and its "deregulation" allies in government to shift the blame for work-related disease and injury from the workplace to the worker.

At a recent Machinists conference on safety and health, scientist Samuel S. Epstein titled his talk, "Blame the Victim—An Evolving Strategy by Industry and Its Consultants."

Epstein, professor of occupational and environmental health at the University of Illinois School of Public Health, is a recognized authority who has been a consultant to congressional committees, federal agencies and organized labor.

Epstein said that by most estimates, some 100,000 American workers die each year from past exposure to toxic chemicals. No one knows what the final cost will be in human lives, disease, birth defects and infertility caused by avoidable hazards in the workplace. As for the financial costs, Epstein said, in the long run, "failure to regulate is far more expensive than to regulate."

Administration aid

But this fact has not slowed many corporations, now aided and abetted by what Epstein called "a lawless Administration," in their tireless efforts to get "government off our back."

As a key component of the deregulation drive, Epstein said, industry has been heavily promoting such blame-the-victim schemes linked to the worker's lifestyle. "If you get cancer, it's your fault. It's your smoking, your drinking, your diet, or because you chose the wrong parents."

Smoking, of course, has been shown to be a major cause of cancer. But industry and its highly paid "experts" have been "using smoking as a smokescreen to divert attention from a wide range of occupational exposures" to cancer-causing and suspect substances, said Epstein.

Lung cancer among non-smokers, said Epstein, has doubled since 1959. For some half-dozen occupations, such as uranium mining, the lung cancer rates of non-smokers is about the same as for smokers, he said.

Industry study

Epstein cited a study by the American Industrial Health Council which concluded that between 20 and 40 percent of all cancers are due to occupational exposures. He said the industry-funded council commissioned other scientists to refute its own study, but in vain.

As organized labor and other groups became more knowledgeable about workplace hazards, industry sharpened its own tools.

Methods include "manipulation and distortion of scientific data" as well as outright "suppression" or "destruction" of information not to its liking. An example is the recent news that Industrial Bio-Test Laboratories, owned by a chemical firm, falsified the results of safety tests of more than 200 pesticide chemicals.

Industry's hired hands now are trying to draw a fine line between carcinogens which are known to cause genetic damage and those which have not been so shown to, said Epstein. The aim is to convince regulators and the public that they shouldn't worry much about the second category.

Eula Bingham, who headed an active Occupational Safety & Health Administration under President Carter, told conference delegates that it would take "at least three or four years of building for each year of tearing down" OSHA by the Reagan Administration.

"This means that what a union does is more and more important," said Bingham. "Demand and negotiate health and safety in the workplace."

NLRB solicitor retained ties to anti-union group while at Labor Dept.

By David L. Perlman

Hugh L. Reilly didn't cut his ties with the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation when he went to work for the Labor Dept. in 1981.

Only after he moved to the National Labor Relations Board as its solicitor did he withdraw as the lead counsel in a "right-to-work" case against the Communications Workers, informing the court just two months ago that his new duties at the NLRB "may be thought by some" to conflict with his continued participation in the case.

Court papers cited in newspaper and press service stories show Dotson's active participation in the anti-union lawsuit at the same time he was working as executive assistant to Donald L. Dotson, then the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations.

When Dotson became chairman of the NLRB, he brought Reilly along to become the agency's solicitor.

Reilly's appointment to the NLRB post put the spotlight back on his past employment with the anti-union "right-to-work" group, especially after the board majority voted to give him added enforcement litigation powers previously held by the independent office of the general counsel.

Then came a comedy of errors in which a second-level Labor Dept. official who had worked with Dotson and Reilly asked the NLRB to let Reilly come back for a time to his old office, where things were in a mess. The NLRB promptly agreed to do so and immediately named a non-controversial career employee as acting solicitor.

Rejected recall

But Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan squelched that deal almost before the ink was dry. The department could get along very well without Reilly, it seems.

Meanwhile, stories by Patrick Owens of Newsday's Washington bureau and by Robert B. Cooney of Press Associates, Inc., made clear that both the Labor Dept. and Dotson had known of Reilly's unpaid moonlighting before he went to the NLRB.

Reilly reported his connection with the case in a financial disclosure statement he signed May 17, 1982. He said he was the "unpaid counsel" and that expenses in the case were being paid by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation.

The news stories quoted a Labor Dept. official as saying that Reilly's supervisor, who at the time was Dotson, was responsible for determining whether his outside activities violated the department's ethics code. Employees are barred from outside actions that would jeopardize "the appearance of impartiality" in their official duties.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was asked about the NLRB situation at a news conference on May 24, during the federation's Executive Council meeting.

Beyond the farce of the attempt to shunt Reilly back to the Labor Dept., Kirkland said, is the serious issue of Administration appointments that threaten to turn the NLRB "into an instrument of anti-union employers."

Dotson was a management lawyer before joining the Reagan Administration and he was appointed to the NLRB after the Senate failed to confirm the President's first choice for chairman, a management consultant with a union-busting record.

Changing rules

Kirkland said in response to questions that both the Dotson and Reilly appointments mark "a major departure" from past practices on selections to the labor board—a violation of the "tacit understanding" of the limits of partisanship.

Labor had not sought to stack the NLRB with partisans in other administrations, Kirkland noted. But the Administration's use of NLRB appointments "to carry on an anti-union vendetta," Kirkland suggested, frees labor to take a comparable course in the future. But he would regret such an "unfortunate" change in the rules.

Health coverage for jobless gains widening support

join the company group plan on the same terms offered to employees. After Oct. 1, 1985, employers would have to continue health insurance coverage or at least provide the basic benefit package to laid-off workers for the first three months of their unemployment.

The bill would also authorize grants to public hospitals to finance services to low-income workers.

The entire program would expire Oct. 1, 1986, unless Congress chose to renew it.

At House hearings on the Waxman bill, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed that voluntary treatment of the needy by doctors, while commendable, does not come close to meeting the health care needs of millions of jobless.

The recession has cut deeply into the lives "of millions who have never been jobless, who have never been without health care protection," Denison noted. And while the ideal situation is a recovered economy, "in the meantime we must minister to the victims, the wounded of our national economy's breakdown."

McBride presses legislation to restrict plant shutdowns

The Steelworkers urged Congress to enact "responsible plant-closing legislation" to protect workers from sudden job loss due to capital flight and management decisions to relocate operations in areas of low-cost labor.

Testifying before a House subcommittee on labor-management relations, USWA President Lloyd McBride said that workable plant-closing laws must deal with such issues as public and corporate assistance to workers, public intervention, and advance notice of shutdowns.

Of particular importance, McBride said, is the need for "public intervention into corporate decision-making and its relationship to industrial policy."

The House panel is considering a bill by Rep. William Ford (D-Mich.), which would require employers to give advance notice of a decision to close down or relocate a plant, to explore alternatives to closing, and to ease the financial impact on workers and communities.

Steel mill layoffs

The plant-closing issue directly affects the steel industry. Production employment in basic steel mills has dropped from 400,000 in 1974 to less than 200,000 today. More than 150,000 workers are now on layoff status, and many are not expected to return to their former jobs.

McBride told the subcommittee that capacity utilization in the industry has declined from 93.7 percent in 1974 to 47.3 percent in 1982. He submitted a list of more than 200 steel facilities that have closed during this period.

"The steel industry is in the throes of a restructuring process—aggravated by this terrible recession," he said. "It will result in more closings and shutdowns. Steelworkers and steel communities are facing uncertain futures and the time has come for help from the federal government."

Collective bargaining agreements in the basic steel industry already provide some of the benefits called for in Ford's bill, McBride noted, but benefits in other industries are not as good. "There are other groups of workers who receive little or nothing when plants close," he added.

While the proposed legislation would not stop a plant from closing if the owner is determined to cease operations, "it will provide a good beginning in opening up the decision-making process to some degree of public examination," McBride said.

And USWA District 7 Director James N. McGeehan, warned that 3,000 American jobs would be wiped out under the proposed arrangement between U.S. Steel Corp. and the government-owned British Steel Corp. to import steel slabs into the United States for finishing at U.S. Steel's Fairless Hills, Pa., plant.

The "potential for wounding the American economy goes far beyond the impact" at Fairless Hills, McGeehan said. The competitive pressures generated by the arrangement would eventually make this country "merely the steel finisher for steel-producing plants around the world," he said.

AFT wins bring majority among Florida teachers

The American Federation of Teachers has become the majority union for public school employees in Florida after winning back-to-back representation elections in Sarasota and Broward counties. The Broward County system is the nation's tenth largest school system.

The AFT affiliate, Broward Teachers Union, won by 3,386 to 2,886 over the National Education Association affiliate, Classroom Teachers Association. This was AFT's fourth attempt since 1976 to represent the 7,600 teachers in the Broward County system, which has 130,000 pupils. It came close in 1979 when it got 45 percent of the votes.

AFT represents the nearby Dade County school system, covering the Miami area, where it successfully beat back an NEA challenge in late 1982 by a 2-1 ratio.

The AFT affiliate challenged for representation rights after the NEA unit's inability to reach an agreement allowed the school board under state law to impose a contract on the teachers which did not provide retroactivity.

Sarasota's teachers and non-instructional workers, members of the independent Sarasota Classified & Teachers Association, voted May 11 by 901-404 for AFT representation for the 2,300-member unit.

AFT President Albert Shanker said the Florida teachers "have sent a clear signal to the school board and the community that professionalism and excellence must be the cornerstone of Broward's educational policy."

Consumer price index spurts in April

Consumer prices jumped six-tenths of 1 percent in April—the sharpest increase since last July—after several months of little change or actual decline.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that a surge in gasoline prices resulting from the 5-cent per gallon tax which took effect in April was the primary cause of last month's increase in the consumer price index. But there were increases in other prices as well, particularly for food and shelter.

If the CPI were to continue to rise at the April rate for the next 12 months, the inflation rate would translate out at 7.2 percent. As it is now, the CPI stands 3.9 percent higher than it did a year ago.

Chairman Martin S. Feldstein of the President's Council of Economic Advisers said in a statement that rising oil prices could keep the CPI rising more rapidly for a while.

Many private analysts expect consumer prices to climb at an annual rate of about 5 percent for the remainder of 1983.

The seasonally adjusted six-tenths of 1 percent rise in the CPI for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W), which is used to calculate wage and benefit increases due under union contract cost-of-living provisions and government entitlement programs, was the same as in the CPI for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U).

Rental charges jump

The CPI-U, covering about 80 percent of the nation's population compared to about half the populace under CPI-W, uses BLS's new "rental equivalence" measure, which rose eight-tenths of 1 percent in April, to measure shelter costs of homeowners.

Homeownership in the CPI-W, which uses house prices, mortgage interest rates, property taxes, property insurance, and maintenance and repair costs, rose three-tenths of 1 percent in April.

Food prices last month rose five-tenths of 1 percent, the same increase as in March. Medical care costs also rose five-tenths of 1 percent, up slightly from the previous month. Transportation prices rose by a sharp 1.4 percent, after declining two-tenths of 1 percent in March. Other goods and services rose six-tenths of 1 percent.

In a separate report, BLS reported that real, or inflation-adjusted, average weekly earnings rose seven-tenths of 1 percent in April and were up 1.2 percent from the same month a year earlier. Average gross weekly earnings of production or non-supervisory workers in the private sector last month were $277.90, but in constant 1977 dollars eliminating the impact of the inflation rate the figure was only $171.12.

Signing up voters

State, County & Municipal Employees Local 420 members Joanne Gray and Anthony Carrion register voters at the kickoff of a 1983 voter registration drive outside Woodhull Hospital in Brooklyn. The local, which represents municipal health care workers, chose the site "because problems at the hospital underscore the need for every eligible voter to be able to vote." The dispute centers on management staffing policies.

ILO inquiry calls Poland to answer for union-busting

Geneva—The International Labor Organization will set up a semi-judicial commission of inquiry to investigate Poland's suppression of trade union and worker rights.

Establishment of the commission — the strongest action open to the ILO — was ordered by a 44-to-6 vote of the ILO Governing Body, with five abstentions. The action had been recommended by the ILO's Freedom of Association Committee.

The panel, to be composed of independent legal experts, will consider charges that the Polish government's union-busting violates its ILO commitments.

In a maneuver to forestall establishment of the commission of inquiry, the Jaruzelski regime said it would agree to receive an ILO official. But the ILO turned down the proposal after it was denied authority to meet with Lech Walesa and other leaders of the outlawed Solidarnosc free trade union movement.

On the decisive vote, the free trade union and employer members of the tripartite Governing Body voted solidly for establishing the commission. Only the Indian government delegate joined the Soviet bloc representatives in opposition.

The Polish issue had been extensively debated at previous ILO sessions so the Governing Body moved quickly to a vote on the report of its Freedom of Association Committee.

An influencing action

Earlier, however, U.S. worker delegate Irving Brown made the point that ILO action can influence developments. Brown, who is director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, noted that condemnation of the Pinochet dictatorship in Chile by a similar commission of inquiry had brought new hope to the oppressed trade unions in Chile.

The ILO's steady pressure for restoration of trade union rights, Brown said, having all of the authority of an intergovernmental agency with its unique tripartite structure, can help workers "struggling to regain their basic human rights and restoration of freedom of association."

Brown said ILO support had helped bring unity among Chilean unions which recently mounted impressive demonstrations for restoration of worker rights in Santiago, Chile's capital.

The Soviet delegate, Dmitri Kolesnik, angrily protested Brown's equation of the right-wing dictatorship of Chile's Gen. Pinochet with the communist dictatorship of Poland's Gen. Jaruzelski.

Since Poland did not exercise its right to be represented when the Governing Body acted, the Soviet delegate spoke for the puppet regime.

He charged that the whole "Polish affair" was a creation of the Western media and insisted that establishment of a committee of inquiry would be a "misuse of ILO procedures" and interference with "the internal affairs of a member state."

Kolesnik went on to claim that "Polish unions have better rights than unions in countries that are accusing Poland here"

Lawsuit challenges EPA on ties to pesticide firms

Labor and environmental groups have asked a federal court to overturn Environmental Protection Agency decisions made in closed-door meetings with pesticide industry officials and to bar such practices in the future.

The AFL-CIO and the Natural Resources Defense Council told the court that the cosy relationship between EPA and the pesticide industry has allowed life-threatening chemicals to stay on the market. A California farmworker exposed to pesticides is one of the plaintiffs in the suit, which was filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

EPA's new administrator, William Ruckelshaus, has promised to end the closed-door decision making of the agency's previous scandal-ridden leadership. Margaret Seminario, the AFL-CIO's health and safety specialist, said the lawsuit was intended to assure that the EPA does in fact "put pesticide evaluation and regulation back in the public view, where it belongs," and reconsiders its earlier decisions on toxic chemicals.

Private meetings

Under former EPA Assistant Administrator John Todhunter, the suit contends, private conferences with industry representatives were substituted for the public process required by law for evaluating hazards of pesticides and regulating their use.

Thus the public was inadequately protected against chemicals that have been linked to such health hazards as cancer, birth defects, genetic mutations and nerve damage.

The lawsuit also challenges EPA's adoption, without opportunity for public comment, of revised cancer risk criteria.

It asserts that EPA flouted its obligations under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide & Rodenticide Act by bringing industry representatives into the decision-making process. And it charges violation of the Federal Advisory Committee Act in that the meetings between industry and the agency were "held behind closed doors" and "were not fairly balanced" in terms of representation by affected groups.

The suit asks the court to require EPA to submit a plan for reassessing the actions taken improperly.

Meanwhile, in a separate case, the Supreme Court agreed to review a regulatory change the EPA proposed in 1981 that would allow states to ease restrictions on new sources of air pollution. A federal appellate court blocked the new rules from taking effect but the Administration and industry groups have asked the Supreme Court to reinstate them.

Aluminum pacts keep pay scales, improve benefits

Unions representing nearly 43,000 aluminum industry workers resisted employer demands to slash wage levels and reached agreement on similar but not identical three-year contracts.

The Steelworkers accord, which includes higher supplemental unemployment benefits and other improvements, covers more than 25,000 workers at Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., Aluminum Co. of America and Reynolds Metal Co. It was ratified May 29 by a 35-19 vote of the union's Aluminum Industry Conference.

Agreement was reached the next day by the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers covering 10,100 workers at Alcoa and 7,400 at Reynolds.

Not only were there no cuts in wages and salaries, as the firms had sought, but there were no concessions in the group insurance plans either, the Steelworkers said. Other features of the USWA pact include a special one-time retirement "window" for

Marches and rallies

Labor gears up for Solidarity Day

The American labor movement laid the groundwork for Solidarity Day III, promising that at Labor Day rallies, picnics, and parades in every state of the union it will speak out and be heard on jobs, trade, health and safety, education, and all the other issues that affect working men and women.

At a meeting of the AFL-CIO National Advisory Committee on Solidarity Day III at federation headquarters, Charles McDonald, national coordinator for the event, outlined the range of activities planned at more than 130 locations across the country. Every state will have at least one and some, like California and Wisconsin, are planning as many as 15 separate events, all sponsored by central labor councils.

The advisory committee, composed of representatives from 50 unions, will approve the plans of the national coordinating team, headed by McDonald, and will aid in getting information to state and local trade union groups.

McDonald's coordinating team includes federation staff members and at least one field representative from each state. Similar teams and committees will function in each state.

'Will be heard'

The central theme for Solidarity Day III is "Across America—We Will Be Heard."

McDonald advised union coordinators that all promotional items should be printed in blue and white, using the artwork that has been developed by the federation.

Thus far, the national coordinating team has developed promotional artwork, a how-to manual for staging events and a planning structure aimed at gaining maximum grass roots participation.

Earlier this year, the Executive Council launched the idea for Solidarity Day III, gearing it toward local involvement, as a show of strength and as a steppingstone for getting worker involvement in the 1984 elections.

In a letter to officers of all AFL-CIO central labor councils, Federation President Lane Kirkland recalled that Solidarity Day I, the giant rally in Washington in 1981 that drew 400,000 trade unionists from all over the country, "gave voice and visibility to our opposition to the disastrous Reagan policies.

"In the march to the polls on Solidarity

Mobilizing coordinators

The AFL-CIO National Advisory Committee on Solidarity Day III, composed of representatives of 50 unions, reviewed plans for over 130 Labor Day events which will require extensive grass roots involvement. Participating in the session were, from left, George Daitsman of the Allied Industrial Workers; Charles McDonald, national coordinator; Kevin Kistler of the national coordinating team; William Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, and Bernard Demczuk of the Government Employees.

II, in 1982, we made significant changes in governors, state legislatures, and the composition of the U.S. Congress," he said.

"Solidarity Day III will begin the mobilization for the 1984 election. It will be the first step in building the organizational structure to carry a united labor movement into the primary areas and caucuses and then on to victory in the general election."

The Solidarity Day III theme will be woven into traditional Labor Day celebrations. National union leaders and other speakers will spell out labor's agenda, and insist on labor's role in the nation's political process.

Some of the events in the works:

- Cleveland plans its usual Labor Day parade, but this year it will end with a rally at Cleveland AFL-CIO headquarters. Last year's parade drew 3,000 people. Solidarity Day III organizers expect even more this year.
- Milwaukee's Solidarity Day III celebration will take place at the city's Lake Front, where union members will picnic and take part in a parade.
- Atlanta's celebration will start with a parade and end at the Atlanta-Fulton County Stadium where participants can finish the day at an Atlanta Braves baseball game.

In all the events, unions will seek to send the message to the American public that the nation needs its industries rebuilt, unfair foreign trade must come to an end, and there must be a return to an even-handed, caring government.

In his talk with advisory committee members, McDonald said the promotional artwork can be printed locally on buttons, caps, T-shirts, bumper stickers and other items. Space is provided for local sponsoring unions to imprint their name or message, he added.

A short film about Solidarity Day III is available from the federation and its regional offices for screening at union meetings, conferences and seminars, McDonald told committee members.

Manual available

A "nuts and bolts" manual giving the background on Solidarity Day and how-to advice for organizing a Labor Day event is available. The manual incorporates experiences of the planners of Solidarity Day I and includes sections on coalition-building, timetables, budgets, accounting procedures, media coordination, security, site selection and volunteers.

McDonald enlisted the advisory committee's help in scheduling officers of their unions for the Labor Day activities.

A newsletter will be sent out periodically to update unions on the events.

AFL-CIO Assistant Information Director Rex Hardesty briefed the union public relations representatives on the Solidarity Day III plans and on efforts to coordinate a media campaign and inform their members about the day's activities.

In job seniority case

Supreme Court backs contract enforcement

A unanimous Supreme Court agreed with the trade union position in a case that centered on enforcement of a clearly lawful seniority clause of a union contract.

On the losing side was an employer who contended that an arbitrator's award of back pay to workers laid off in violation of seniority should be set aside because the company promised the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to raise its ratio of women workers.

The union involved was Local 759 of the Rubber Workers, which represents employees of the W. R. Grace & Co. plant in Corinth, Miss. It sought to enforce its seniority clause through the contract grievance procedure, and first had to go to court to reaffirm its right to bring the issue to arbitration. The case that reached the Supreme Court involved enforcement of an arbitrator's award against an assortment of company objections.

In his decision on behalf of the entire court, Justice Harry A. Blackmun made these principal points:

- A federal court may not "second-guess" an arbitrator and substitute its view of the merits of the dispute so long as the award derives from the collective bargaining agreement.

Back pay entitlement

- Even if a court had required compliance with the EEOC agreement, which was briefly the situation before an appellate court ruled otherwise, the arbitration award for contract violation would still stand. The Supreme Court noted that the arbitration decision didn't tell the company what to do in future layoffs. It merely found that the company had violated the contract and that the employees affected were entitled to back pay.
- Enforcement of the arbitration decision will not adversely affect public policy for voluntary compliance with Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Supreme Court held. "In this case, although the company and the commission agreed to nullify the collective bargaining agreement's seniority provisions, the conciliation process did not include the union," the decision noted. If the rights of workers under a lawful collective bargaining agreement could be signed away by the company without the union's consent, "such a result would undermine the federal labor policy that parties to a collective bargaining agreement must have reasonable assurance that their contract will be honored."

In another case, however, the Supreme Court disagreed with the union position and the position taken by the National Labor Relations Board. The case involved an employer's civil damage suit that the Labor Board saw as retaliation against a waitress who tried to form a union at a Phoenix, Ariz., restaurant.

The NLRB had found that the manager of a branch of Bill Johnson's Restaurants had committed a series of unfair labor practices including firing waitress Myrland Helton because of her efforts to organize her fellow employees, illegally questioning another worker about union activities, and threatening to "get even" with Helton after she and several supporters picketed to protest her discharge and passed out leaflets listing grievances.

Libel suit

The employer filed a $500,000 libel suit in state court and the NLRB ordered the employer to withdraw the suit and reimburse the workers for their legal expenses. It held that the suit violated federal labor law by punishing workers for exercising their rights under the law. The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals backed the NLRB's position in the case.

But the Supreme Court held that the NLRB could not halt the prosecution of a lawsuit brought in state court, regardless of the motive, unless the suit lacks a reasonable basis in fact or law.

Thus a frivolous suit could still be enjoined, and the NLRB might so decide on reconsideration of the issue. But in such a case, the board would have to find that no reasonable jury could uphold the employer's claim, according to the decision by Justice Byron R. White.

If a suit is decided against the plaintiff, the court said, the NLRB could then consider whether the lawsuit was filed as retaliation and order appropriate relief.

ULLICO assets reached $1 billion mark in '82

The assets of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. topped the billion dollar mark in 1982 setting a record high for the union-owned insurer, Board Chairman J. Albert Woll reported at the annual shareholders' meeting.

Assets of $1,034,000,000 in 1982 compared to $893 million a year earlier and mark a tenfold increase since 1971 when ULLICO reported assets of $100 million.

Woll said the company, whose stock is principally owned by AFL-CIO affiliates, local unions and state and local central bodies, is the largest underwriter of jointly managed health and welfare funds.

Flint Glass pact ends 8-year strike

Sapulpa, Okla.—Flint Glass Workers Local 716 has won a contract with Bartlett-Collins Co., capping a 40-year struggle on behalf of workers at the bitterly anti-union glassware company and bringing to a successful end a strike that has lasted eight years.

Production and maintenance workers in the company's forming department voted 17-2 on April 21 to accept the terms of an agreement worked out between the union and the company more than nine years after the union won a representation election.

The terms of the 30-month contract will provide wage increases, some increases in health benefits, dues check off, set rates of overtime hours and pay and, for the first time in the plant's 69-year history, three paid holidays for workers.

AFGW President George Parker hailed the settlement as a victory "in a long and historic labor battle for dignity."

He said that the union was lifting its boycott of Bartlett-Collins products and he asked the AFL-CIO to remove the company from the federation's "do not buy" list, ending a campaign that began in 1977.

Parker pointed out that while the new agreement covers some 75 workers in the forming department, the successful end to the dispute with Bartlett-Collins is likely to pave the way for organization of workers in other departments.

Parker said that the union first won an election at Bartlett-Collins in the early 1940s but no agreement was reached, and a similar win in the early 1960s by the Glass & Ceramic Workers met the same fate. Both attempts had been chilled by the company's campaign of threats and intimidation, he said.

1974 organizing win

After getting indications from workers that there was renewed interest in a union at the plant, AFGW began a new organizing drive in early 1974, winning an election in March and certification by the National Labor Relations Board in June.

After repeated attempts to obtain a contract, the members of Local 716 began the strike Sept. 15, 1974.

The union brought numerous unfair labor practice complaints and refusal to bargain charges against the company to the NLRB which issued complaints and bargaining orders that the company appealed unsuccessfully all the way to the Supreme Court. The high court upheld the NLRB's original findings in 1981.

Parker noted that the major roadblock to achieving a contract had been the entrenched anti-union attitudes of the Bartlett family which held total control of the company.

In December 1981, the company was sold to Lancaster Colony Corp. of Columbus, Ohio, and after a series of meetings with the new management, terms of a contract were set.

Parker said AFGW has contracts at other Lancaster Colony plants, and the union expects to improve conditions in Local 716's new agreement in future bargaining.

Under the agreement, workers in the bargaining unit will get an across the board wage hike of 30 cents on Oct. 1 and an additional 30 cents on Oct. 1, 1984.

Approximately 75 workers who struck in 1974 have the right to reinstatement under an NLRB order, but about two-thirds have already taken other jobs or left the area.

Compensation proposed for asbestos ills

A new bill to set up a national workers' compensation system for victims of asbestos-linked diseases has been introduced by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), and the House Labor Standards subcommittee he heads plans early hearings on the measure.

Miller said he is "totally committed" to getting legislation enacted in this Congress.

The AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept., and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. joined in a statement welcoming Miller's sponsorship of the measure and stressing labor's desire to work closely with the subcommittee to shape the best possible program for workers and their families.

Urging stronger positions

"Federal legislation to compensate workers and their families who have become victims of asbestos and other toxic processes in the workplace is urgently needed," the statement affirmed.

Unions will suggest strengthening some of the provisions of the bill at subcommittee hearings June 13 and 14, the statement indicated.

One crucial issue in dispute is the right of victims of asbestos-related diseases to press lawsuits against manufacturers. Two leading asbestos manufacturers, Johns-Manville Corp. and Unarco Industries, filed for Chapter 11 debt reorganization in bankruptcy courts last summer for the avowed purpose of blocking action on thousands of pending lawsuits.

Miller said his proposed Occupational Disease Compensation Act would replace "the 51 contradictory, complex and ineffective state systems" for compensating victims of job-related diseases.

Initially, it would cover only asbestos-related diseases. But other occupational ailments would be covered if the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health found that the incidence of disease among exposed workers exceeded the ratio for the general population by at least 30 percent.

Funded by industry

Under the Miller bill, benefits would be funded by an industry-wide fund, administered through the Labor Dept. Persons totally disabled would be entitled to compensation for all medical expenses associated with asbestos disease and payments equal to 80 percent of the national average weekly wage in the industry where exposure to asbestos took place, with an annual cost-of-living escalator.

The burden of proof would be on the claimant to show that asbestos exposure was a "significant causative factor" in the illness.

Benefits would be paid to survivors for five years after the death of a worker incapacitated by asbestos-related diseases. Inhalation of asbestos fibers has been linked to serious respiratory diseases and to various forms of cancer. The diseases are generally not detected until years after exposure to asbestos.

Betting on solidarity

Massive march supporting unions trying to win new contracts with Las Vegas hotels, casinos and food stores is joined by 5,000 union members along the city's "Strip." The march followed a rally for Operating Engineers Local 501 and unaffiliated Teamsters Local 995, which are bargaining with the Nevada Resort Association, and Food & Commercial Workers Local 711, whose members are locked out of most area grocery stores. Since the rally, the OEIU and IBT reached settlements with all but two hotels, but the lockout of UFCW members continues.

Steel executives denounce plan on slab imports

U.S. Steel Corp.'s plan to import steel slab, putting some 1,800 American workers out of jobs in the process, came under sharp attack from top executives in the industry itself.

At the American Iron & Steel Institute's annual meeting in New York, industry leaders reacted with dismay and outright hostility to the plan.

"It's a step backward," said Chairman Frank W. Luerssen of Inland Steel Co., the industry's seventh largest producer. "It's counterproductive to our relations with the union."

The Steelworkers, which has lost thousands of members to the Reagan Recession, strongly oppose the plan announced by U.S. Steel in March to import semi-finished steel from the government-owned British Steel Corp. Under the deal, U.S. Steel would close out its basic steel production at Fairless Hills, Pa., and concentrate instead on rolling the imported slabs into finished products.

"We've received thousands of cards and letters from our workers who are concerned about the U.S. Steel plan," said Armco Inc., Chairman Harry Holiday. Stressing that any steel shipped from British Steel would be illegal because it is produced with the help of large government subsidies, he warned, "If you allow these products to come in unfairly, anything can happen."

Robert F. Alexander, chairman of Hanna Mining Co., argued that the importation of steel slabs for finishing not only would adversely affect the steel industry but also the iron ore, coal and other steel-related industries.

$422,000 penalty imposed on security firm for spying

Toronto—A Canadian security firm has been ordered by the Ontario Labor Relations Board to pay damages estimated at $422,000 for its role in planting an agent to spy on Steelworkers Local 7105 and report to a union-battling management.

The provincial labor board acted against Securicor Investigation & Security Ltd., whose undercover agent was blamed for prolonging a bitter six-month strike against Automotive Hardware Ltd. that ended early last year. The spy reported regularly on union strategy and morale to the firm's management.

It was the first case before the board in which a security firm acting for an employer during a strike was the subject of an unfair labor practice complaint.

The board ruled that the infiltration of a trade union by an employer during a strike or lockout or in anticipation of a strike or lockout is by itself a violation of the Ontario Labor Relations Act, and that such action is unlawful for any reason.

By its conduct the security firm had struck at the heart of the collective bargaining process, undermining the union's exclusive bargaining rights, the Ontario board said.

It found that the security firm's agent provocateur unlawfully prolonged the strike at least five weeks by his actions. It ordered Securicor to pay 380 workers half the money they lost in wages and benefits during this period and to reimburse the union half the amount of strike benefits disbursed to members in the same period. The union withdrew its unfair labor practice complaint against the company as part of the strike settlement.

The board also ordered Securicor to give written notice within 24 hours to any trade union in Ontario when it has been retained to represent an employer during a strike or lockout or anticipated strike or lockout.

Illegal tactics

Securicor's undercover agent testified that he had regularly reported to management concerning union strategy and that he had attempted to create dissension within the union.

The board also found that the agent had incited strikers to undertake unlawful activities and had tried to set up the local president on a charge of theft of company property. He had routinely challenged the union leadership and had committed such acts as throwing eggs, tomatoes and rocks at management employees, placing nails under the tires of cars attempting to enter the plant and counseled union members to trespass on company property.

The Ontario board cited decisions of the U.S. National Labor Relations Board which held that companies that employ agents to infiltrate unions violate the rights of employees under federal labor law. But U.S. decisions have dealt primarily with the actions of employers rather than citing the security firms for violations of the act.

Specific findings

The provincial board made five specific findings against Securicor for interfering with the administration of the union by attempting to compromise the local president; reporting to the employer the views of rank and file members and of the leadership; reporting union strategy to management; fomenting dissent within the union, and by the actions of its agent that contradicted the union's advice to members to conduct themselves peacefully.

If employers are permitted to infiltrate trade unions during strikes, workers will be inhibited in their exercise of their rights under the law, the board stated.

"This is a result which is clearly alien to the scheme and purpose of the labor relations act," it stressed.

17,000 in Ohio vote to affiliate with AFSCME

Columbus, Ohio—The 17,000-member Ohio Civil Service Employees Association and the State, County & Municipal Employees signed an affiliation agreement, creating the largest public employee union in the state with a combined membership of 50,000.

OCSEA members voted to affiliate with AFSCME by an 8-to-1 margin in a May 14 election supervised by the American Arbitration Association.

The affiliation agreement was signed after a federal district court in Cleveland lifted an order that had temporarily barred OCSEA from announcing results of the membership referendum.

At a special affiliation convention that preceded the vote, AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee pointed out that OCSEA and AFSCME have a long history of cooperation in winning better wages and conditions for state and local workers, and he stressed that the organization will launch "a tremendous campaign to pass a public employee collective bargaining law and organize Ohio public employees."

The Ohio senate approved a collective bargaining bill in April, and the measure is now before the state's house.

Benefit adjustments set

The nation's 36 million social security beneficiaries will get a cost-of-living increase of 3.5 percent beginning next January to compensate them for inflation in 1983. But based on April's rise in consumer prices, inflation was running at an annual rate of 7.2 percent.

The Social Security Administration reported that the COL adjustment is the smallest of the 14 increases over the past 15 years.

The increase will be paid in January 1984, instead of this July as provided for in the $165 billion social security reform package that became law Apr. 20. Future COL adjustments will be made in January, instead of July.

The increase will go to the 36 million social security recipients receiving old-age, survivor and disability checks, four million on supplementary security income, and one million railroad retirees.

To compensate for the six-month delay in the COL increase, aged, blind and disabled supplementary security income recipients will get an across-the-board benefit rise in July of $20 for single persons and $30 for couples.

Study finds American workers 'more willing'

By Susan Dunlop

American workers are more satisfied with their jobs and more willing to work harder to help their companies succeed than Japanese workers, according to a study by Indiana University researchers.

The 1982 Indianapolis/Tokyo Work Commitment Study measured the attitudes of 3,549 manufacturing workers in central Indiana and 3,638 workers in a comparable industrial area of Japan, as well as nearly 700 management employees.

The findings, the researchers stress, contradict several popular conceptions about the dedication to work among American and Japanese workers. The preliminary results of the study indicate that American workers as a group have significantly higher levels of work commitment than their Japanese counterparts.

In a report on their findings, the IU researchers point out that 81 percent of the American workers surveyed said they were satisfied with their jobs, compared to 53 percent of Japanese workers.

And, American workers showed "significantly greater" willingness to work harder than they had to in order to help their companies do well by a margin of 68 percent compared to 44 percent of Japanese workers in the study.

In another finding contradicting widely held assumptions, more American workers, 36 percent, said they accept the goals and values of their companies as their own than did the workers surveyed in Japan where only 15 percent agreed with that statement.

A family feeling

The researchers also called "surprising" data that shows 88 percent of the American workers expressing the belief that a company and its employees are like a big family and a company should take care of its workers. Yet only 36 percent of the Japanese workers agreed with that idea, the survey indicated.

The study was conducted in the two countries during 1981 and 1982 by Indiana University's Institute for Social Research and its School of Business. The principal researchers were sociology professors Dr. Arne L. Kalleberg and Dr. James R. Lincoln, and associate professor of management Dr. Janet P. Near.

The survey matched 52 firms in the United States with 46 in Japan in seven major industries — transportation equipment, electrical machinery, non-electrical machinery, food, chemical, printing and publishing and pre-fabricated metals.

From the results, "It is clear that recent commentary saying Japanese workers had higher morale, were motivated to work harder and were more committed to corporate values needs re-evaluation," Lincoln said.

Kalleberg observed that the preliminary evidence also suggests that differences in productivity between U.S. and Japanese industries "cannot be attributed to workers' attitudes and motivation as everyone seems to think."

Near pointed out that early analysis of the data shows a link in both countries between workers' attitudes and management's practices and attitudes toward its employees.

Results of the U.S. study show that workers had significantly more negative attitudes toward their jobs where employers had initiated layoffs and extracted wage concessions.

In U.S. plants, the survey showed, the most positive responses were logged in plants where management's attitude was perceived as positive and employee-centered and where management personnel interviewed "seemed to go out of their way to communicate to us the general respect they had for employees."

The most negative attitudes, the researchers said, were linked to plants that were physically dirty and old, where jobs were hard, routine and unpleasant and in those companies where management's attitude "seemed unsympathetic and unsupportive . . . where for example, the researchers heard negative comments about workers' intelligence and diligence."

Recommendable job

Other findings indicated that 62 percent of the American workers said they would recommend jobs like theirs to their friends, but only 15 percent of Japanese workers would.

American workers also said they were more satisfied with their supervisors than the Japanese by a margin of 78 percent to 50 percent, and more satisfied with the tasks they do at work by 83 percent to 53 percent for the Japanese.

And 67 percent of the American workers surveyed also indicated they would choose the same job again compared to 20 percent of the Japanese workers.

Air supervisor's firing puts chill on free speech

In a move that could chill federal workers' exercise of First Amendment rights of freedom of speech, the Merit Systems Protection Board has upheld the firing of an air traffic control supervisor who publicly expressed support of the 1981 controllers walk-out.

The Federal Aviation Administration fired Harold Brown, a supervisor at the New York Air Traffic Control Center, after his remarks to a small group of striking Air Traffic Controllers were televised on a national newscast.

In a two-to-one decision, the MSPB overturned a finding by a presiding officer that would have reinstated Brown. The board held that the FAA had the right to dismiss him for "misconduct" and because his own supervisors said his action caused them to lose confidence in Brown as a member of the management team.

The majority opinion, issued by MSPB Chairman Herbert L. Ellingwood and member Maria L. Johnson, said that Brown's free speech rights as a "citizen-employee" were outweighed by the rights of the "sovereign-employer" in the light of the "national emergency" created by the PATCO strike.

But in a dissenting opinion, MSPB member Dennis Devaney said that such remarks were protected by the Constitution, and even if they were not, dismissal was an "unreasonable" penalty, inconsistent with lighter punishment handed out by the FAA in comparable situations.

Devaney also warned that the decision effectively strips other federal employees "of free speech protections accorded by the First Amendment."

25-year veteran

The firing of the 25-year veteran controller was based "on a single sentence expression of his personal opinion made while off duty," Devaney stressed.

Brown, talking to a group of PATCO members the day after the Aug. 3 walk out, told them, "I'm so happy that you're together—stay together please—because if you do, you win."

Devaney said the statement is simply an assertion of the right to strike, and the right to make such assertions has already been upheld by the courts. He also charged that the televised remarks were taken out of context, pointing out that Brown also told the group that the strike was illegal, and that he wished they would return to the job "because I'm too old to be working these long hours."

In his dissent, Devaney also said the FAA's contention that Brown's remarks caused his supervisors to doubt his ability was not supported by any evidence.

Picketing for recognition

Campus rabbis and directors of Hillel Foundations at colleges throughout the country mount an informational picketline at B'nai B'rith headquarters in Washington to protest the organization's refusal to bargain with the Hillel professional staff organization, an affiliate of District 1707 of the State, County & Municipal Employees. They noted that B'nai B'rith has recognized the rights of other staff groups to bargain collectively.

Extension backed on bonds to finance home mortgages

A law that allows state and local governments to issue tax-exempt bonds that are used to finance below-market mortgages for first-time homebuyers should be extended but not made permanent, the AFL-CIO urged.

The authority to issue the mortgage revenue bonds was enacted in 1981 and will expire at the end of this year. A bill being considered by a Senate Finance subcommittee would make the authorization permanent.

In a statement to the subcommittee, the AFL-CIO noted its "long-standing policy" of opposing tax-exempt financing. Benefits flow primarily to higher-income taxpayers, the statement noted, and the federal government loses tax revenues needed to finance other programs and to hold down the deficit.

Because high mortgage interest rates had made housing "unaffordable for almost all families," the AFL-CIO did not oppose the 1981 authorization for tax-exempt bonds.

Even though interest rates have come down, there still is a "need to catch up with the unmet demand for homes," the federation statement noted. "The great majority of families, especially those of moderate income, still cannot afford to buy a home."

The best approach, the federation suggested, would be to extend the bond-issuance authority for an additional two years, through 1985, but not write it permanently into law.

The AFL-CIO statement also endorsed a bill before the subcommittee intended to curb abuses of the tax-exempt features of industrial development bonds.

It would close a loophole that allows receipts from tax-exempt industrial development bonds to be used to purchase certain federally insured certificates of deposit to bring about a situation where the after-tax yield to the investor is significantly greater than on a taxable bond issued by the U.S. Treasury.

The end result is to push up interest rates generally, the AFL-CIO contended in urging remedial legislation.

IUE gains accord covering 2,400 at appliance plants

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers overwhelmingly approved a new three-year contract with the White-Westinghouse Corp., providing wage and benefit improvements for some 2,400 members.

The settlement was reached May 20, the day the old contract expired.

The accord covers IUE members at plants in Mansfield, Columbus, and Newark, Ohio; Metuchen, N.J., and Miami-Ft. Lauderdale, Fla. IUE struck the company during the last two rounds of bargaining before settlements were reached.

The agreement calls for yearly wage increases of 15, 17, and 18 cents per hour for all workers in the first, second, and third years. Hourly pay under the old contract averaged $9.10.

COL adjustment

A cost-of-living adjustment provision calls for semiannual payments of one cent for each two-tenths of 1 percent rise in the federal consumer price index, with a "corridor" of 7-9 percent in the first year and 10-12 percent in the third year, but none in the second year.

Monthly pension benefits would rise from $12 to $14 per year of service immediately, and early retirees would receive a monthly supplement of $7 per year of service until eligible for social security benefits. Weekly sickness and accident benefits would increase from $150 to $185.

The IUE negotiating committee, led by IUE President William H. Bywater, successfully fought off company efforts to take away the COL provision, certain health insurance benefits, and to freeze wages and reduce shift pay.

White-Westinghouse is a division of White Consolidated Industries, which bought out Westinghouse Corp.'s appliance division in 1976.

Vicious campaign

In other IUE bargaining, Bywater accused Rowe International of resorting to a vicious union-busting campaign by taking advantage of the recession to force its 340 workers to strike.

IUE struck the Grand Rapids, Mich., juke box and currency changer manufacturer Apr. 21, after the company unilaterally put its "final" offer into effect and refused to negotiate further with Local 981 bargainers.

Despite solid profits, Rowe has asked workers for steep economic concessions, including a $2.25 hourly wage cut, elimination of cost-of-living provisions, and the right to subcontract work out of the plant, IUE said.

In new contract talks

Job security, wages key bargaining issues

By James M. Shevis

Wage and benefit improvements, as well as employment security, are high on the priority list of union bargainers as negotiations for new contracts got under way in the communications, aerospace, lumber, and petroleum industries. Thousands of workers will be affected by the outcome of the talks.

In the largest labor negotiations of 1983, the Communications Workers seek "a substantial wage increase which reflects increases in worker productivity and living costs" and a benefit package based on the current profitability of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

"The workers in the industry — our members — are responsible for a good share of the company's profitability because of their ever-increasing productivity," said CWA President Glenn E. Watts, who co-chairs the union's bargaining committee.

At stake is a new three-year national contract for some 525,000 Bell System employees. The present contract expires on Aug. 6.

CWA negotiators presented the union's collective bargaining program to the company at a meeting in Washington May 19. June 16 was set as the tentative date for resuming the talks. The union holds its national convention in Los Angeles from June 6 to 10. Negotiations on local agreements open July 6.

Emphasizing the company's profitability, even under the AT&T divestiture plan which goes into effect in January 1984, Watts said the union will be aggressive in its bargaining. He cited the sound financial condition of the telecommunications industry and worker contributions to high productivity.

Output up

"Productivity increases have been averaging nearly 7 percent a year, compared with a national average of nearly 2.5 percent," he pointed out. "Our members deserve a piece of that pie."

The CWA contract proposals, adopted earlier this year by the union's 82-member Bell System Bargaining Council, include improvements in pension and disability benefits, relief from job pressures, broader health and life insurance coverage, and a number of other fringe-benefit improvements.

In the employment security area, the union has proposed establishment of a jointly managed career development and training program financed by company contributions and by one-half of all productivity gains from labor-saving technology. The program would provide training and retraining for workers affected by new technology, new product lines, and changing market conditions.

Meanwhile, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers formulated bargaining goals for some 50,000 workers covered by more than 300 separate contracts due to expire next Jan. 7.

At a meeting of the union's National Oil Bargaining Policy Committee last month, negotiators resolved to seek a shorter workweek and greater protection for employees affected by plant closings.

Union goals

OCAW's bargaining objectives, drawn up by the 12-member committee after a three-day meeting of some 250 delegates, include a "premium-free" health-care plan, an improved pension plan, extension of health insurance coverage to laid-off workers for a period equal to their recall rights, contract language allowing checkoff for contributions to political action funds, and broader protections in the event of plant shutdowns.

Little progress was reported in negotiations covering some 50,000 workers at seven major Northwest lumber firms represented by the Woodworkers and the Lumber Production & Industrial Workers, an affiliate of the Carpenters.

The two unions are bargaining jointly with the Weyerhaeuser Co., Champion International Co., Crown Zellerbach Corp., Georgia-Pacific Corp., Simpson Timber Co., Boise Cascade Corp., and Publishers Paper Co.

IWA's Region 3 Western States Regional Council has called an advisory meeting for June 6 to make recommendations on strategy. On June 7, the council's executive board will meet to make any decision on future actions. Workers currently are working without an agreement.

Talks in the aerospace industry, which are slated to begin late this summer, are expected to focus on the effects of new technology on workers.

The Machinists will seek to replace existing contracts with Lockheed that expire Oct. 1, with Boeing on Oct. 3, and with McDonnell Douglas on Oct. 23. The Auto Workers will be involved in the McDonnell Douglas talks since it also represents workers employed by the company. UAW also will bargain for new contracts with Rockwell International Corp.

Commitment to equality

Brotherhood Citation of the National Conference of Christians & Jews is presented to Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts, right, by Carl Holman, president of the National Urban Coalition, during an awards ceremony in Washington. The award cited CWA's efforts in improving human rights. Irena Kirkland, wife of the AFL-CIO president, also presented an achievement award to Maryland Gov. Harry Hughes.

Attack on federal pay rules sets stage for political test

The Reagan Administration plans to forge ahead with major changes in the Civil Service system despite strong objections from federal workers and Congress and in the face of a legal opinion that its actions would violate federal law.

Office of Personnel Management Director Donald Devine told House and Senate committees he will only briefly delay a scheme to abolish rules providing automatic in-grade pay raises for lower- and mid-level federal workers as well as proposals to link promotions to performance appraisals by supervisors rather than to seniority.

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock called the proposed changes unfair and warned that they would force federal employees to submit to OPM's "political ideology" just to get a raise or even keep their jobs.

After Congress threatened to block the revisions, Devine agreed to pull back on them until Aug. 1, but in a memorandum to government officials he emphasized that if Congress doesn't come up with legislation by that time "that achieves our goals, he will issue final regulations that do meet the Administration's goals.

Among OPM's proposals are a broadening of the Administration's "management rights" to give OPM the power to decide what are "appropriate" bargaining issues in federal employee contracts.

Blaylock pledged that "as long as the Administration is committed to these proposals—regardless of OPM's schedule for consideration of them—AFGE is committed to fighting their implementation."

In an opinion sought by Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, Comptroller General Charles A. Bowsher said OPM's actions would violate a 1945 law that prohibits the same kind of "merit" pay raise scheme the agency is planning.

Raises linked to ratings

Devine's scheme calls for workers in the top three of the 10 pay levels in a civil service grade to receive a higher performance rating from supervisors than is now necessary before getting a raise. Workers in the first seven steps would still qualify for raises under the current rating system.

Bowsher warned that the changes would set up a "double standard" for federal employees in violation of the law. Any such change would be illegal without a new law, he noted.

Ford said the Comptroller General's opinion should "put the Administration on notice that it cannot unilaterally change the law in pursuit of its reckless goals."

He accused the Administration and Devine of "monumental arrogance in their assault on federal employees."

Devine called the opinion a "monumental misreading of the law," contending that a 1962 statute gives his agency broad authority to set levels of competence for federal workers.

about 700 workers, and slight modifications in the cost-of-living adjustment formula under the old agreement.

Facing a May 31 strike deadline, the management negotiators backed down from their insistence on wage cuts and instead offered a freeze. Base hourly wage rates, which range from $11.40 to $14.76, will be frozen for three years.
